Mr. W. said he would go into no further detail as to the contents of these papers, nor would he stop to consider the pertinency of the facts he had stated to the salt bill in the hands of the committee. It was enough for his purpose that the statements were made, that they were laid before the Senate and the committee as facts, that they rested upon responsible authority, and that they were deeply interesting to the whole country. These considerations were sufficient to induce him, as a member of the committee, to recommend the printing, and would induce him, as a member of the Senate, to vote for it.

The charges against the manufacturers of, and dealers in, salt, are grave and particular. Are they founded in truth? If so, the public ought to have full possession of them. Are they false? They ought to be made known that they may be met and refuted. Why then should we refuse to print the papers? Upon what grounds was the motion opposed? Strange as it might seem, principally upon the ground that the printing would be an infringement of the rights of the States!

An infringement of the great State Rights principle, in our system, for the Senate to order the printing of these papers? Papers, if true, developing the most wicked system of frauds and impositions, in reference to one of the necessaries of human and animal life, which has ever been developed to an intelligent people? And how is this objection to the printing sustained? By a reference to his own State! He is told here that she is the greatest monopolizer of salt in this Union, and that the printing of these papers will damnify her important interests in the article. Is this so? No, sir; no. Her interests in her extensive and useful salt works are not to be injured by developing the frauds and impositions practised elsewhere. On the contrary, her direct interest is to have these papers printed, and the truth known in reference to the whole matter, and especially that she may thus show the superiority of her system of police upon this subject. She has not submitted the manufacture of salt, at her works, to speculators and monopolizers, so far as the purity of the article is concerned. That power she has retained in her own hands. Every drop of water boiled, or evaporated, is supplied by State agents and under the supervision of State officers, and every bushel of salt made is carefully inspected by a competent State officer, and its purity thoroughly tested, before it is permitted to seek a market among the consumers. Without fraud and perjury in these officers, or smuggling on the part of the manufacturers, no imposition can be practised upon the public in the quality of the New York salt. The same police is a perfect defence against the monopolies complained of in these papers. They could not exist without the knowledge of the officers referred to, and they would be faithless to their duty to suffer them to exist for a day without being made known to the whole State and to the whole country. This obligation would arise from their moral duties as public servants; but there is another obligation upon them more direct and immediate. The State imposes a duty per bushel upon the salt made, and to guard and protect and foster that revenue, is the especial duty of these officers. Any association, therefore, to diminish the quantity of salt made, would be, to the same extent, a conspiracy to diminish the State revenue, and would, in that way, come within the especial jurisdiction of those officers, and call upon them for prompt exposition.

It is not new to the experience of that State that great frauds may be practised in the adulteration of the salt made, nor is it that extortion in the price of the salt may be attempted by the manufacturers. Hence the retention by the State of its minute control over the whole matter, and its constant and continued efforts to furnish a pure and wholesome quality of salt. It is not enough, upon this point, that frauds and intended adulterations are guarded against. Expense must be incurred, the nicest processes of manufacture must be adopted, and the extremest vigilance used to expel from the water its impurities, and make it yield a pure salt. To these points the constant attention of the State inspectors have been directed, and the results, within the last twenty years, have been triumphant.

Is that State, then, to be told that her interests depend upon secresy in these matters?—that her revenue is to be destroyed by the publication of these papers, and the exposition of abuses such as he had pointed out, existing elsewhere? Are her dignity and sovereignty to be infringed by such a publication, a proclamation of frauds connected with other salt works in the country, similar to those which her experience has taught her would exist at her own, but for the vigilant supervision which she has been wise enough to retain over them?

No, Mr. President, (said Mr. W.) New York has no such fears to entertain from this harmless motion. She has, however, a direct interest in the publication of these papers. Her salt is a pure article. It goes into the market without combinations to raise the price. Her works can supply any quantity for which a fair market can be found, and her revenue is graduated by the quantity manufactured and sold. If, then, it be shown that, in consequence of frauds at other salines, she can furnish a better and cheaper article to their customers, her interests are promoted by the development. What is the fact now stated by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY?) That he has, for the last year or two, obtained his supply of salt from the New York works, and that he has received a pure article, at a fair price. Where are the Kanawha works, compared with those of New York, in reference to him? And if the New York salt can descend the Ohio to the point required to supply the honorable Senator, what portion of the country is there, accustomed to depend upon the Kanawha works for a supply of salt, which cannot be supplied from Onondaga? Let the facts be known, then. Let it be understood that a wide and open market exists for pure salt within the reach of the New York works, and he would be responsible for the injury to her interests, her feelings, or her sovereignty, from the publication of the fact.

Suppose, sir, that the charges contained in these papers were directed against the New York salt manufactories. Would it be my duty to rise in my place here, and resist their publication? No, sir. Whether true or false, that State would exact no such duty from her Representatives here. It has never been her practice to conceal any attempts at fraud, connected with her extensive and rich salines. On the contrary, she has always sought to give to every imposition upon the public the most extensive publication, and she will not require of those who represent her here to attempt to make secrets of that information in relation to others, which she invariably makes public in relation to herself.

Another objection to the printing of these papers is urged, not less singular than that which has just been considered. It is said that the motion savors of agrarianism; that the attempt to expose these monopolies and frauds here, by a publication of the proof of their existence and extent, is acting upon a principle which, carried out in practice, would lead to the distribution of property, and the other levelling doctrines of the agrarians. Mr. W. said it would be difficult to make any distribution of property by which he should not be benefited in a pecuniary sense, but it was nevertheless a doctrine which he repudiated, and he should be compelled to vote against the motion, if he could see that principle in the order to print. He could not, however; and he was surprised to hear the opinion advanced. No legislation is proposed, and all that is asked is the simple publication of most important information upon a subject of universal interest. If the statements contained in the papers be true, he was sure no one would attempt to justify the practices complained of. Should they not then be made known?

Suppose it were charged here, with the authenticity of this testimony, that a number of farmers in Western New York had combined to raise and control the price of provisions, and that to accomplish their object, they had hired three-fourths of the farmers of that fertile wheat growing region not to cultivate their farms for a given season. Would it be his duty, as a Representative of the State here, to resist the publication of the fact? No. It would be his duty as well to his State and the people he represented, as to himself, to give it publication, to proclaim it to the world, and thus do all that it is in our power to do to arrest the intended evil.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] had said that we do not represent the people here; that we are the representatives of the sovereign States, not of the people of the States; that one Senator may represent a million of population, and another one hundred thousand, and yet we are all equal here. This is true; and yet where rests the sovereignty of the States, but in the people? Who are the sovereigns of the States but the people? And would he have those of us who represent populous States forget our increased obligations growing out of the increased interests committed to our charge? Would he make us unmindful of the fact that we represent millions instead of thousands, and of the interests, the wishes, and the safety of those millions?

[Here several Senators, among whom the voices of Mr. WEBSTER and Mr. CLAY were heard, said "Yes, that is the rule; we ought to represent the people of our respective States."]

Mr. W. said he thanked the gentlemen for reminding him of the tendency of his remark. It would save him a future explanation. He had said upon that point precisely what he intended. He held it to be his duty truly to represent the wishes and interests of the people of the State which had honored him with a seat here, and he should continue to govern his acts and votes by what he believed to be those interests and wishes, unless arrested in his course by the command of another and a controlling voice. He hoped this explanation would satisfy the gentlemen upon the other side of the House, who had manifested so kind an interest in his faithfulness to his constituents.

Mr. WEBSTER said he had no objection to the printing of these papers. The time is coming when this subject will be dispassionately considered, and at that time, though he would throw out no challenge, he would endeavor to prove that the present moderate duty on salt was necessary to keep the article at fixed and uniform prices, and that it had no tendency to produce or aggravate the high prices which were complained of.

Mr. CALHOUN said, that as the question was about to be put, he desired to make a few remarks on the motion, before he gave his vote. In the first place, he wished to know from the chairman of the Committee of Finance [Mr. WRIGHT] whether the proposition to print these papers at this time, is intended to have any practical bearing; or, in other words, is it the intention of that committee to report the bill now before it, to repeal the duty on salt, for the action of the Senate this session?

I understood from the declaration of the Senator who introduced the bill, [Mr. BENTON,] that it was intended to press the passage of the bill this session.

[Mr. BENTON said, yes.]

Well, then, I shall vote against the printing, because, among other reasons, I am opposed to the repeal, or any other action on the subject, at this time. According to my view of your finances, we shall have not a cent to spare. The most rigid economy will scarcely be sufficient to carry us through the year without borrowing, or, what is the same, in effect, resorting to our own credit; and if the duty on salt should be repealed, the deficit would have to be made up by laying a corresponding duty on something else, or to borrow money to make good the deficit, to either of which I am opposed. I ask the chairman if my impression as to the state of the Treasury, and what must be the consequence of a repeal of the duty, is not correct?

[Mr. WRIGHT assented.]

I now ask the Senators from that portion of the Union, for whose benefit it is proposed to make the repeal, and through which the Cumberland road passes, whether they are prepared to vote the burden off their shoulders, at this time, and to ask us, in the next breath, to borrow money to carry on that road for their accommodation? I hope not; and, if not, that they will add their vote against the useless expenditure, at this time, of printing these papers.

But, sir, this is not my only objection to the repeal, even if it should be found to be expedient when the question comes fairly before us, as it must in a short time. The compromise act is taking off the duty on salt as rapidly as the interest of commerce and the community will permit. It is now about six cents the bushel, and will be reduced, in the course of the next two years, to two cents the bushel, making the reduction, at the end of the period, compared to what it is at this time, equal to 100 per cent. per annum, which is sufficiently rapid, one would suppose, to satisfy the warmest friend of repeal; and certainly as rapid as is consistent with sound commercial principles. I need not tell the most ignorant of the laws of trade, that all sudden transitions are ruinous to the regular and fair trader, as well as injurious to the general interest of the community, and ought to be carefully avoided, even where the change is, in the end, expedient.

There is another decisive objection, not only against the repeal at this time, but the agitation of the subject itself. It is well known that there must be a general revision of the duties on imports at this or the next session, under the compromise act, which ceases to operate in 1842. It is vastly important that the adjustment to be made should be such as will place the system of duties on the most equal and permanent basis, looking to the general interest of the country in the broadest light. To do this, we must come to the great work calmly and dispassionately, with the whole subject before us, free from previous sectional agitation or commitment as to the articles in regard to which the several portions of the Union may be particularly interested. It is thus only that the whole subject may be fairly considered, and satisfactorily adjusted. Every one, who knows any thing of the difficulty of the task, must feel and acknowledge the correctness of these views; and I would now ask, is it fair for any one portion of the Union to ask to be relieved of its burden, in advance of the rest? Would it not give it an advantage, when the general adjustment comes under consideration? And is the West disposed to seize on such advantage at this time? Would it be either right or manly in her to ask this concession from the other portions of the Union at this time? We must not deceive ourselves. If salt is to be exempt from duty, some other article must bear an additional tax; and, as a Southern man, deeply interested in this question, I would wish to know, when it is taken off salt, on what other article it is to be laid. Is it to be laid on iron, or cotton bagging, or some other articles as objectionable at least as that on salt, as objectionable as it is to us? These questions, so deeply interesting to us, can be answered, practically and satisfactorily, only on a general revision, to which time, justice, equity, and fairness, demand that the subject should be postponed. The delay can be no serious injury to any interest, more especially as the duty is going off as fast as it ought, on sound principles.

But it may be said that the information contained in these papers is calculated to throw light on the necessity of repealing the salt duty, and that they ought to be printed, to enable us to act with intelligence when the general subject of revision shall come up. Admit that they are so calculated, I still object to their printing, even it that view, at this time; because it is plainly an attempt to forestall public opinion, on a single article, said to be particularly oppressive in one portion of the country, in order to give it an advantage over all others, when we come to the general discussion. I am, sir, against all forestalling as unfair and injurious, whether it be forestalling of public opinion as to the repeal of the salt duty, or the forestalling the article itself, of which the mover so loudly complains. Of the two, the former may prove by far the most exceptionable and injurious, if it should contribute to prevent a fair and satisfactory adjustment of the duties.

But, sir, if I had no other objection to the printing of these papers, there is one, growing out of their character, if I understand their contents correctly, which, with me, is decisive. I know nothing of their contents, except as drawn from the statement of the Senator himself. I infer from it that a large portion consists, of correspondence and other evidence, calculated to show that the manufacturers of domestic salt, who supply the West with the article, are guilty of the most odious monopoly, fraud, imposition, and oppression, for which reason it is proposed to repeal the duty on the imported article. I confess I do not see how the repeal of the small duty still remaining, and the still smaller that will, after a short period, can have the effect intended; but, be that as it may, I utterly oppose the principle on which it is proposed to place the repeal, and cannot give it the countenance which the voting for the printing of the papers would give. The principle involved, according to my conception, is precisely the same as that contained in the bill of the Senator from Kentucky, which was condemned by so decided a vote of this body at the last session. What did that bill propose? That the President should dismiss Federal officers who should interfere in elections. And on what principle was it voted down? That the right of suffrage was a reserved right, left by the Constitution, under the regulation of the States respectively, and that it belonged to them, and not to us, to say who should and who should not vote, and under what regulations they should vote, and that it was not for us to supply any supposed defect, or omission, on the part of the States, in the exercise of their power. This was the solid basis on which we rested our objection to the bill, and on which it was voted down by so strong a vote. Now, sir, if we turn to this case, we shall find, if I mistake not, the same principle apply with equal force. The salt works, with their production, and those employed in them, are under the exclusive legislation of the States within which they lie, and are exclusively subject to their regulation, as is the right of suffrage. This no one will deny. If, then, there be monopoly, fraud, imposition, or oppression in their management, it belongs clearly to the States, where the works are, to correct the abuse, and not this Government. None will deny this. In fact, the Senator himself acknowledged this, when he asserted that the State was competent to make the acts of which he complains, and which he proposes to establish by these papers, a felony. I now ask what greater right have we to assume in this case that the States have neglected or omitted to do their duty, than in the case of the right of suffrage; and, on that supposition, to modify our legislation so as to remedy the evil, and punish the supposed delinquents? Can any one point out any distinction in the two cases? How, then, could we reconcile our vote at the last session with a vote that would give countenance to the principle proposed to be established by these papers? I protest solemnly against an act that could lead to such an inference. If the duty on salt ought to be repealed on financial principles, or considerations of general expediency, let it be repealed. In that case, these papers would not be worth a farthing. But if not—if the repeal is to be placed on the supposed defect, or omission of duty, on the part of the States, a more dangerous and unconstitutional ground could not be assumed. It would make this Government the supervisor of the State Governments. If these papers have any value at all, they ought to be sent to the Legislature of Virginia, now in session, which only is competent to correct the supposed abuses of the salt establishments on the Kanawha and elsewhere within her limits, and which constitute the main object of their attack. As great as would be the unconstitutionality of ordering them to Richmond, to be laid before the Legislature of Virginia, I would consider it far less so than to make them the basis of our legislation.

With a few remarks on a single point, I shall close what I intend to say. It is proposed, with the repeal of the duty on salt, to repeal the fishing bounties, which, it is alleged, originated in the former. I do not intend to enter into that question; I leave it to others to decide on their origin. I place my refusal to a repeal of these bounties, at this time, on a wholly different basis. The great navigating, like the planting interest, has felt the heavy hand of your protective system. It has had, like the planting interest, to meet foreign competition abroad, not only without protection, but under the weight of oppressive duties, many of which still remain. I, for one, whether the fishing bounties are right or wrong in the abstract, will not agree to repeal them till you are prepared to do justice to that great interest. Take off your duties on iron, on hemp, and on lead, which fall so heavily on it, and then I shall be prepared to consider the expediency of repealing those bounties, but not before. Justice and equity are higher considerations than expediency. I stand up for them. While I insist on justice for the interest I represent, I would be ashamed to stand by and see injustice done to any other; and in this, I feel assured, I but speak the sentiments of those I represent.

Mr. BENTON could answer the question put to the chairman on Finance [Mr. WRIGHT] with more precision than he had done it. He held in his hand the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury to the question; for the Secretary had been applied to for information as to the operation of the Salt bill on the finances. The answer shows it will save money—that it will save the Treasury from loss. The bill is to repeal the salt tax and the fishing bounties and allowances founded upon them. Now, the question is, what is the product of the tax, and what the amount of the bounties and allowances; and the answer is here, (holding up a sheet of paper.) The answer is, that for this year the tax exceeds the bounties and allowances only by 110,000; and after 1842, when the compromise act takes full effect, will fall short of these bounties and allowances about the one half! This was an effect of that act, passed through Congress without leave to amend it; and by which duties are reduced without a corresponding reduction of drawbacks and allowances founded upon them. But he would not go further into that subject at present: the time was at hand when he should show, with the proof in hand, the operation of that act, which was made out of doors, and rushed through Congress without allowing an i to be dotted, or a t to be crossed. Mr. Verplanck's bill to reduce and regulate the duties was baffled for months, that the Administration should not have the credit of settling the question which the Presidential election had already decided; and while that bill was baffled in the House, another was concocted out of the House, which was not a settlement, but an adjournment of the tariff question—which adjourned it from the time when the country was ready to settle it, to a time when they will not even be thinking about it! That compromise act expires in June, 1842; and is the South and the West even thinking of the renewed contest to which it is to give rise? That act was a master stroke for the high tariff party! It took the question away—laid it by to recruit—and plunges us again into it in 1842. It conducted the tariff to a point at which it cannot remain—from which there will be reaction. Every interest will be dissatisfied, and there will be a general union of all interests, to renew the high duties.

Mr. CALHOUN. I rise simply to correct the erroneous statement of the Senator who has just taken his seat. He affirmed, as a fact, that the two extremes united to defeat the bill to reduce the tariff, introduced by Mr. Verplanck, in the session of 1832-3—meaning the advocates of the protective tariff and the State Rights men of the South. Now, sir, I hold the journals of that session in my hand. I hastily turned to votes on the bill while the Senator was making his remarks. I have looked at two decided votes, in which the yeas and nays were called, on that occasion, the only ones that I had time to examine; and I find that Mr. McDuffie and my other friends, as far as I have had time to examine their names, voted with Mr. Verplanck himself, and I will leave it to the Senate to decide whether he opposed his own bill or not.

The truth is, the bill failed in spite of our support; and its failure, notwithstanding the urgent necessity of avoiding civil conflict at the time, is proof conclusive, let who will say to the contrary, that nothing short of the means resorted to by South Carolina would have brought to the ground the odious and oppressive system against which it was pointed.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, FEB. 17.—The question recurring on the motion to print certain documents in relation to the salt duties, Mr CLAY and Mr. DAVIS withdrew their opposition, and they were accordingly ordered to be printed.

SPEECH OF MR. SEVIER,
OF ARKANSAS,

In Senate, Thursday, February 20, 1840—On Mr. GRUNDY's report in relation to the assumption of the debts of the States by the Federal Government.

Mr. SEVIER addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The resolutions of the Senator from Missouri, upon the subject of State debts, though modified by the committee to whom they were referred, are resolutions wholly of a negative character. Neither the originals or the amendments contemplate any legislation; but, on the contrary, the objects of both are avowedly to prevent legislation. These resolutions, though negative, unusual, and extraordinary, lead us into the consideration of the policy and condition of the States; their wisdom, solvency, integrity, and, I will add, their capability of managing with prudence their own local and private affairs. They lead us, also, into the consideration of banking and internal improvements, as now existing in, and carried on by, the States; and of the consequences, past, present, and future, of such systems upon the general affairs of the States, as well as the influence they are calculated to have upon the policy and welfare of the whole Union.

The first resolution presented for our consideration, is, shall we pay those debts of the States, (or which is the same thing, shall we assume them,) which have been contracted by them exclusively for local and State purposes? I answer, No. I answer, that I am unwilling to agree to any such measure. I answer, that we have no such power conferred upon us by the Constitution; that no such measure was ever contemplated by the framers o that instrument, and that no such power was ever exercised by Congress. The two cases put in this debate, the one of the assumption of the debts of the States by Congress, shortly after the adoption of the Federal Constitution; and the other, of the deposite of the surplus revenue with the States in 1836, are not such cases, in my estimation, as warrant the just conclusion that Congress ever did assume or pay the debts of the States, or any of them which were contracted for local purposes. In regard to the first of these, I will state that if I have properly understood the nature of those debts, they were debts of that character which Congress would now pay, with perhaps less division of sentiment than there was upon that question at the time it was done. These debts were contracted, not for local or State purposes, not for private banking or local internal improvements, but for the common defence. They were contracted by our ancestors in the prosecution of the war of the Revolution; they were contracted by them in resisting the tyranny of George the Third, after they had manfully thrown off their allegiance, and boldly defied his power. They were contracted in sustaining themselves in the sanguinary struggle which ensued, in warring against his troops, his tories, his foreign mercenaries, and savage allies; they were contracted for such purposes as these, out of which have sprung our political and religious freedom, our greatness and glory, and our beloved country itself. There were debts not of a local character, nor were they paid in violation of either the letter or spirit of the Constitution.

In regard to the deposite of the surplus revenue with the States in 1836, or of a distribution of the surplus revenue with the States, at any time, (which I concede with the Senator from Missouri, for all practical purposes,) to be one and the same thing, I have to say that I consider the deposite, or distribution of the surplus revenue with the States in 1836, was neither a payment by Congress of the debts of the States, nor was it so intended, nor was it unconstitutional. And this leads me to consider the nature of the relations subsisting between the State and Federal Governments.

The Federal Government is not, as has been alleged in this debate, the parent, but is the child, or offspring, of the States. The Federal Government has no progeny over whom to exercise its solicitude, its sympathies, or its cares. It is a trust Government, whose objects and powers are defined and enumerated in the Constitution; and for many valuable purposes, for the benefit of all the States, this Government has been invested by the States with valuable incomes; and among these are the revenues arising from the customs, and from the sales of the public lands. Well, sir, should it so happen, that this trust or Federal Government shou'd, from these sources, or from any other, get into its possession more money than was needed for the full accomplishment of every object entrusted to it by the Constitution, and should have a surplus remaining in its possession, after those objects were consummated, what shall be done with this surplus? Whose money is it? Shall the agent fob it, or return it to its principals, from the pockets of whose peop'e it was received? Sir, in a case of this sort, it seems to me that justice and common honesty alike require that it should be returned, in the most equitable manner it could be done, to those from whom it was received; and in doing this, I can see no violation of the Constitution; no germs of consolidation, or destruction to State sovereignty or independence. No, sir; I can see in this no such hideous monsters, so much to be dreaded. But, sir, I am arguing an extreme case—a contingency, to say the least of it, which I consider very remote and improbable; and one, I will add, which I hope never to see existing in this country. I hope never to see existing in this country the absurd, expensive, and ruinous policy of raising a surplus by collecting taxes from the people, with the intention of paying those taxes back to the people again. Whatever may be the specious reasons urged in its justification, I would prevent this; I would avoid it, by giving to the Federal Government not a farthing more than was absolutely necessary for the consummation of the great purposes for which it was created. If I saw too much money accumulating in its vaults, I would lower the impost duties, and the price of the public lands; and if necessary to accomplish this object, I would abolish duties to the proper extent, and give away the lands. I would remedy the evils of a surplus in this manner; and if I failed to accomplish it, and, in spite of me, there would be a surplus, I would give it back to the States, to dispose of according to their will and pleasure—in making banks, or internal improvements, or in any thing else. I would give it back to the States unconditionally.

But, sir, we are not contending how we shall dispose of a surplus revenue, for we have none to dispose of. We are considering the propriety of raising a revenue for the purpose of paying the debts of the States, or of assuming them, which will produce the same result. And this leads me, Mr. President, to consider the manner and means of raising this revenue. How shall we raise it? Shall we raise it by direct taxation? Sir, that would be idle talk. No one among us is bold enough for such a proposition. Shall we raise it by increasing the price of the lands? No, sir: I fancy not. It is known to all of us, that such a proposition would be met and resisted at the threshold in the new States, with as much firmness and determination and perseverance, and, if necessary, to the same extent, that their ancestors resisted the stamp duties and the tea tax. What, then, remains from which we can raise this revenue? The tariff, that universal panacea for every pecuniary complaint; and are we prepared to increase the duties for such a purpose? Is the country ripe, in this period of universal embarrassment, for the renewal of high duties—of that odious and exploded system of traffic, plunder and oppression, which has proved so fatal to every interest of our common country; and that, too, for the sole purpose of dividing among the States?

What has the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] shown you? He has shown the Senate, I think, most conclusively, that high duties are alike fatal to the agricultural, the shipping, the planting, and manufacturing interests. He has, to my mind, most satisfactorily accounted for our present and past difficulties, which we all grievously feel and have felt; but which many of us before were unable to trace, or correctly account for. A high protective tariff, he has most conclusively shown to be the main cause of our embarrassments. I will not weaken, by repeating his argument; but I refer to it, and, with his permission, will adopt its principles for my own. And here let me entreat every farmer, planter, navigator, merchant, manufacturer, and mechanic to read and understand that argument, and then tell me, if he is prepared for inflicting the scourge of a high tariff upon the country; and yet, Mr. President, it must be done if we assume the debts of the States. We can pay these debts in no other way that I know of.

And this brings me, Mr. President, to the consideration of the second question I propose to consider; and that is, ought we to divide the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States? As well might we, Mr. President, as the Senator from Missouri has most truly stated, divide the proceeds of the customs. In my view, one of them is just as constitutional and as unexceptionable as the other. Wherever we have power to give land, we can give money also, and vice versa. I know of no distinction; and yet I might often be willing to give land where I would not give money; for the best of all reasons, because I might often have land to give, when I had no money to spare; but I can give neither, unless for a constitutional object. And to show the fallacy of this popular error, as I conceive it to be, about the lands, let us go back to the early history of our country, and we will find that so, early as 1777, a little over a year after the declaration of our Independence, the subject of the public lands claimed the earnest attention of the States, and presented a formidable obstacle to their harmonious action. The claim of Virginia to all the waste lands, lying between certain lines, extending from the Atlantic to the South sea, and of North Carolina and Georgia, from the Atlantic front to the Mississippi river; lands which were waste, uncultivated and unsettled, by any other than by Indian tribes, was a fruitful source of jealousy and discord to many of the States, and particularly so to Maryland, Rhode Island, and New Jersey. The complaining States saw and felt that if Virginia and the other States should hold all the lands they claimed, it would give to those large States, a preponderating and dangerous influence in the confederacy. They insisted, that their safety required that these large States should be restricted to proper and reasonable boundaries, and that all beyond should be made into free and independent States, were the same powers and privileges of the others. And these complaining States were right in their views; were justifiable in their jealousy, and are entitled to all praise for insisting upon their object, until it was finally accomplished. This was not all. The complaining States treated the high pretensions of the others with very little gravity. They represented the waste, unpatented, and unoccupied lands, as crown lands, and as such, subject to the hazard of the Revolution, and if conquered of the monarch to whom they belonged, should rightfully be considered as the joint spoil of the victors. I will not take up the time of the Senate in tracing this interesting subject, from 1777 to the first cession of these waste lands to the United States by New York in 1781, and by the several other States thereafter; for in this, I have been anticipated by my able friend from New Hampshire, [Mr. HUBBARD.]

I will only add to his remarks, that these several cessions were made expressly to produce harmony and tranquillity among all the States. To quiet all their apprehensions, Virginia ceded all her lands, northwest of the Ohio river, to the United States; and in doing so, she carved out the ceded country, according to the wishes of all, into separate parcels, so as to make not less than three, nor more than five, new States, and then stipulated, that the ceded lands "should be disposed of for the use and benefit of the United States according to their respective proportions of charge and expenditure, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." All of these cessions, with perhaps the exceptions of Georgia and North Carolina, were made prior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution. And has that instrument altered the terms of these cessions in any respect whatever? The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has told us that the adoption of the Federal Constitution has changed the nature and terms of these cessions. He tells us that, prior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, Congress apportioned out among the States the sums that were needed for the common defence, &c. and that these apportioned sums were raised by the States individually, by a direct tax upon their lands and improvements, and that, as that system of raising a revenue for the common defence, &c. was repealed by the adoption of the Federal Constitution, he argues, that the terms of the cessions were abolished, or repealed, also by the Constitution. In this we differ. I am no lawyer, or rather a very poor one, but it seems to me, that the constitution could not have changed the terms of the cessions made to the United States by Georgia and North Carolina, because those cessions were made to the United States by those States, subsequent to the adoption of the Federal Constitution; and that the terms used by those States, are precisely the terms used by Virginia in her cession prior to that period. But take the argument of the honorable Senator, and what does it amount to? It amounts to this, as I most humbly conceive: that, if the terms of the cessions of those lands were repealed or abrogated by the Constitution, they become public property, belonging to the United States, unhampered by conditions; or else, as hundreds have inferred from the Senator's premises, they become the exclusive property of the States, within whose limits the lands lie. Well, sir, if they have become the property of the United States, unhampered by conditions, by a repeal of the terms of the cessions, what right has the Senator to divide those lands, or their proceeds, which is the same thing, more than he has to divide among the States, any other public property or money that may be in the Treasury? None, that I can conceive of. Well, sir, suppose the terms of the cessions of those lands were repealed, as he contends they were, and the United States did not acquire an exclusive right to those lands, by that repeal; whose lands are they? If this be true, I answer that those lands belong to the States where the lands lie, and as such, that we have no right to divide them out among the other States. We have no right to divide them in any view of the question. If the terms of those cessions are in force, we have no right to divide them, because we cannot do so according to the terms of our contract. If the terms of those cessions are repealed, the repeal is not partial, but total, and the lands revert back to those who ceded them; and if so, the other States have no right to a portion of them, or else they belong to the new States, where they lie; and, in that event, the other States have no right to any part of them.

These are the difficulties the Senator's premises would lead us into. And all these difficult es will be avoided by regarding them, as they have uniformly been regarded, as subject to all the terms of the compact. The only clause in the Constitution upon the subject of those lands is, "that Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory and other property of the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State." As this is all that we find in the Constitution upon the subject of the public land, I infer that neither any claims to those lands by the United States, (which claims rest upon cessions to it by the States,) or of any claim upon them by any particular State, is not only not repealed, but is yet in full force and effect; and that no law of ours, violating in any manner either of those claims, can be either just or constitutional. And what is our compact? We agree to dispose of those lands for the common good—"according to the respective proportions of charge and expenditure, and for no other purpose." How else can we dispose of those lands for the common benefit, according to the charge and expenditure of the several States, but by selling the lands, and placing the proceeds of the sales in the common Treasury, and then by paying it out for the current expenses of the Government, and (as the honorable chairman has most truly stated in his report) in this way, lessen the general charge upon the people of the several States, in the exact proportions stipulated in the compact? Can you dispose of these lands in any other manner, without doing injustice to some one of the States? By adhering to the good old practice, which we have been following for fifty years, we shall do equal justice to all parties, give just cause of complaint to none, and at the same time comply with the letter and spirit of our contract. And where is the just ground of complaint against this system? Do we not all get our equal proportion of the proceeds of those lands in the way of an equal diminution of our common budrens? It is not so, says the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY.] He says that those residing on the Atlantic pay a great deal more into the Treasury than those residing in the interior. Now, sir, I will not wrangle with that distinguished Senator about this assumption. Admit his distinction, that a citizen of New York or Maryland consumes more of dutiable articles than a citizen of Kentucky or Ohio; does it follow from this that a citizen of the former State is less benefited by a reduction of duties than are the citizens of the latter States? I think not. If you, Mr. President, buy two coats, and I buy but one, off of the same piece of cloth, is it not right and proper that you should pay into the Treasury, for that privilege, double as much as I should? I think so. And if the duty on it is reduced one-half, are you not as much benefited by it as I am, being in the proportion of two to one? Certainly. Suppose we take from the common Treasury three millions of dollars, which the lands yield every year, and divide this sum among the States; would not this three millions have to be made up by a duty upon something else? Certainly. And pray, then, in what respect are the citizens of any State the gainers by it? Suppose Arkansas should receive twenty or thirty thousand dollars from the Federal Treasury, which would be her part of the proceeds of the public lands; does she not have to return it by way of duty or tax upon something else? This cannot be denied. What, then, has she gained by it? Nothing. And if she came out of this matter even and without loss it would not be so bad; but she would not. She would have to pay the expense of this transfer and retransfer, besides the risk of loss through faithless agents. To make my illustration still more clear: the Secretary has told us that he will require every dollar he can get into the Treasury from the customs and the lands, and all other sources, to meet the ordinary charges of the Government during the present year; and yet, in the face of this, we take from the Treasury three millions to divide among the States. Will not these three millions have to be made up by a taxation upon something? It is too plain for argument. I ask Senators, then, what we gain by it? If I pay a dollar into the Treasury, it is the same thing to me whether I pay it as a poll tax, a land tax, or a tariff tax. My dollar is gone for taxes, and that is enough for me to know; and I am unable to see why I should be under very great obligations to the honorable Secretary, by being informed by him, that out of a spirit of liberality to me, he will return me my poll tax dollar, which is considered an odious tax, and collect another dollar from me off of my land or cup of coffee.

Sir, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] says that he will not urge his bill to divide the land revenue among the States at this session, on account of the impoverished condition of the Treasury. And yet he thinks it might be safely done now, if proper retrenchments and reforms were made. And, with that boldness and frankness which ever distinguishes him, he comes out like a man, and does not, like many of his party, bellow about retrenchment and reform, without telling us what retrenchments and reforms should be made. He puts his finger upon the objects, and tells us what are the retrenchments and reforms which should be made. He tells us the army should be reduced, and particularly the two regiments which we lately added to it. He tells us that our diplomatic intercourse should be circumscribed, and that many of our foreign ministers or agents should be recalled. Sir, if the Senator had not told us what retrenchments and reforms he would have made, I confess that I never should have guessed the ones he has enumerated.

Sir, I am opposed to the retrenchments or reforms the Senator designates. I consider our army sufficiently small already, and would sooner vote for an increase than a diminution of it. We have an Indian frontier extending from Red river to St. Peters, from Texas to Canada, upon which we must keep up garrisons, if we would sufficiently protect our citizens in that quarter. I suppose nearly half the army of the United States are now stationed on that frontier, and I am satisfied that there is not a soldier too many in that quarter for an efficient peace establishment. We have a war now raging in Florida, and the Committee on Military Affairs have reported a bill, which is now on our table, asking us for one or two thousand more men to carry on the Florida War. We know that troops are required on the frontiers of Maine; and do we expect to take and keep possession of our possessions on the Pacific without troops or an army? Sir, of all things in the world which any honorable Senator would designate as a reform, I was the least prepared to hear, in these times of danger, on all sides, that a reduction of the army was considered as one of them; nor was I prepared for the other he has named; which is to recall some of our foreign ministers or agents, and leave our commerce, our ships, our sailors, exposed to loss or danger. And why, Mr. President, should these reforms take place? They should take place, that we might have the power to divide among the States a miserable, pitiful, land revenue. Sir, I fear that if we once embarked in this policy of dividing the land or any other revenues among the States, that a reduction of the army, and the destruction of our fleets, would not be the only reforms. We should see the number swelled at every session, until we should have nothing left which is worth preserving. But these are not the only ways and means by which the honorable Senator would be enabled to get at the land revenue for distribution among the States. He tells us he would lay a duty upon silks, wines, coffee, and other luxuries. Now, sir, I am not in the habit of hunting up and reading the speeches of honorable Senators, for the purpose of finding an unguarded expression to cavil at, or to find fault with him for using. I generally rely, for the occurrences of my own times, upon my memory; and unless that greatly deceives me, the anxiety of the Senator to get this land revenue for distribtion has changed his whole tariff policy. I was in the Senate, though not then a member of it, when the compromise act, as it is called, was discussed. And if I am not mistaken, the Senator was among the foremost in advocating a reduction of duties upon silks, &c. His leading wishes then were, to save our poor, but industrious worthy manufacturers. And if I remember aright, he then was for taking off the duty upon silks, that his countrywomen might be enabled to dress out in silks on Sundays. But now we hear nothing of the inviolability of the compromise act. Nothing of the poor manufacturers, nothing of silk dresses, &c. No, sir, the land distribution project, and an impoverished Treasury, have changed all these calculations. The compromise act is to be violated by its author, and his country girl is to give up her silks, and go back to her cast-off calicoes and domestics.

Sir, I will not take up the time of the Senate, in discussing, at this time, the propriety of laying on a duty upon silks, wines, coffee, &c. I will only say these are important interests of a great country, who purchase to a great extent the cotton of my constituents, and that I am for no hasty action upon these subjects, until I can clearly ascertain what effect these duties may have upon our treaties and upon the cotton trade.

Mr. President, I have been frequently asked why I was opposed to the land distribution policy, which was so beneficial to the new States, and particularly to the weaker and younger States. We propose, they say, to give you a great advantage in the division; say ten or twelve per cent. This, I confess, seems to be a pretty liberal offer; and as I am not generally in the habit of declining favors offered to my State, it is necessary that I should say something upon this apparently strange inconsistency; and I will not be so uncandid as to have the Senate believe that I decline this distribution on account of its inequality to the old States.

[Mr. BUCHANAN. No one will ever accuse you of that.]

Nobody would believe me if I were to assign such a reason, and, therefore, I will not urge it upon the Senate.

I decline the offer, because I consider the true policy of the new States consists in their rapid settlement and improvement, and that nothing will so greatly advance their ends as pre-emption rights, and a graduation or reduction in the price of the public lands; and that nothing I ever heard of, in my opinion, is so well calculated to retard the settlement and improvement of the new States as the distribution policy. Let that policy once be adopted, and we shall never after hear of pre-emptions and graduations. For where did we ever see an advocate for distribution that ever voted for a pre-emption or graduation bill? He who runs may read their course. They care less for the settlement, improvement and prosperity of the new States, than they do for the hard dollars they can wring from them for the lands. Let the distribution policy once become the settled policy of the country, and the old States will become the landlords to the new; and we should find them about as unwilling as other landlords are to make any allowances for sickness, or bad seasons, or short crops, when quarter day came round. We should have to raise the cash, or be driven into the woods. We should find the unrepealed, but obsolete, law of Congress enforced against us. We should find ourselves indicted if we cut a hooppole upon their hills, or shot a deer in their lordly domains. Now, sir, I am unwilling to place my constituents on any such condition.

Sir, we of the new States occasionally turn our eyes to the condition of our country, and to the proceedings of Congress, and we see that the citizens of the old States have had their burdens diminished, and that they are still diminishing, by the reduction of duties upon imposts, and we anticipate equal reduction in our burdens by lowering the price of the public lands. Such a measure as this will be but meting out to us equal justice. And shall we look for these things in vain? We hope not. We have had many beneficial alterations made in the land system since it was first adopted. We have seen the size of the tract of land, authorized by law to be sold, reduced, first to 320 acres, then to 160, then to 80, and lastly to 40 acres. We have seen the price of the public land reduced from two dollars to one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre. We have seen Congress granting many donations to actual settlers, and have seen the passage of several pre-emption laws; and the most of these things we have seen before the tariff was reduced, even when it was going up, and our country deeply in debt. We have been waiting patiently upon the wisdom and justice of Congress, and hope we shall not have to wait much longer before our great burden is lessened in an equal degree with those who reside in the old States. The tariff has been reduced 40 or 50 per cent. and why should not the land bill of the Senator from South Carolina, which proposes something like an equal reduction, meet with the favorable consideration of the Senate? Is it because the old States want this public burden kept on, which they do not feel, that it may be divided? I pause for a reply.

Mr. President, it has been alleged in this debate that the lands are indebted to the customs. It is not important to my argument whether they are, or are not, in debt to the customs. I think it due to myself, however, to state that I do not subscribe to the correctness of the calculations made by several honorable Senators upon this subject; nor have I thought it important to distinguish between the lands held by cessions, or by purchase, as I consider them all alike the property of the United States.

Mr. President, how have the States got in debt, that we are under any obligations to raise a revenue to pay these debts? Or why should we divide among them the land revenue, or any other revenue, that they may pay their debts themselves? They have got in debt, we are told, in building up banks, and prosecuting works of internal improvement. And this brings me to consider these two important subjects, which, in these times, mingle themselves up in almost all our discussions of a general character. And first, of the banks.

The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] as I do him the justice to acknowledge, (and if I did not believe he would be pleased with such distinction, I would not so distinguish him,) has ever been the most firm, consistent, and unwavering opponent of banks and all their interests, either in or out of this chamber, that I ever saw. Whenever a bank shows its hideous features in his presence, he rises to his feet for battle, with "his arrows drawn to the head;" and I do not blame him for it, for I should be an humble ally in his ranks, if I viewed them in the light in which he does, as the authors of "all our woe," or the authors of all the difficulties and distress under which the country is groaning; and as the authors of our debts, and embarrassments, and misery. And to illustrate his positions, and to show us that the banking system, as we have it, produces the same results in "every age and clime," he has taken us over the Alantic, and back to the reign of William the Third of England, whom he denominates the father of the Bank of England, and from which, he says, the banks of America have been modelled.

The Bank of England, he alleges, is the cause of the immense British debt. Now, sir, I do not profess to be familiar with the history of the Bank of England. But I have been taught to believe that it cannot be justly chargeable with that debt, but in a certain sense. I had ever understood it to be the cause of these debts in this way and in no other: the British debt grew out of her wars which she carried on in Europe, Asia, and America, and out of her acquisition of immense dominions upon each of these continents. Her principal debts were contracted in struggling for her existence as a nation against Bonaparte and his allies. The Bank of England mainly furnished her with the means of carrying on those wars; and but for the liberal aid of the bank, it is probable that Great Britain would have ceased to exist as a nation, and the island of Great Britain would now, in all probability, have been but an island of France. And does the learned Senator censure the Bank of England for loaning her means to her country in such fearful struggles? I think, myself, he ought not to censure that bank for these loans; although if the bank had refused its aid, it might have kept the British Government out of debt. And, while upon the subject of the Bank of England, I will add, (what will probably but show my ignorance of events in that country,) that I have never heard that the Bank of England was ever justly chargeable as the author of any of the discontents, or insurrections, or rebellions in that country. Nor was it ever, to my knowledge, considered as a grievance by our ancestors in 1776, when it was supposed that every prominent cause of complaint against the mother country was embodied by Mr. Jefferson in the declaration of our Independence. And I infer from this silence upon the subject, in both countries, that if the Bank of England had been the cause of debts or misery on either side of the Atlantic, that the wisdom of those times would have found it out, and at least have charged it with those sins.

But let us come near home, and see if the banks of this country have occasioned the debts of the States. During the existence of the first Bank of the United States, the States owed nothing; and we find, from the table furnished by the diligent Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] that, up to 1830, which was fourteen years after the charter of the last Bank of the United States, the debts were trifling, and were confined to a few of the most wealthy and populous States. Those debts he considers trifling, up to that period; and I consider the honorable Senator good authority, at least, upon this subject. Here, then, we have an answer to the charges made against the banks by the Senator from Ohio. The charter of the second Bank of the United States expired in 1836; and so it had but six years left to embarrass and impoverish the States. And did it do all the mischief in the last six years of its existence? I think not. We find, from the table before alluded to, that the increase of the State debts, from 1830 to 1835, down to the period of the very close and termination of the Bank charter, that the State debts were increased from a very trifling debt, by the still trifling additional debt of forty millions. I refer to this official table as a complete refutation of the charges of the Senator from Ohio, that the United States Bank was the cause of all our embarrassment and misery; and if it was not the cause of these debts, what was the cause? I answer that the State debts mainly, have sprung out of the double vetoes upon the United States Bank charter and upon the Maysville road. I mention those vetoes out of my regard for truth, and not for censure. On the contrary, I approve, and most heartily approve, of both vetoes; I approve of the veto upon the United States Bank charter, on the ground that I consider such an institution too powerful and dangerous for the safety of the country; and I approve of the other, not so much for withholding an appropriation to the Maysville road, as for checking the operation of an expensive, partial system, which was running into the wildest and most extravagant excesses, and breaking down the salutary distinction between national and local works, and which, if left to go on without restriction, would have bankrupted the Government, without benefiting materially the great majority of the States who contributed the most of the means by which these works were executed. But to return from this digression.

So soon as the Bank of the United States was destroyed, and its days were known to be numbered, and its branches in the several States were being withdrawn, the States went to work to supply their places. They had no money to start their banks, and, from necessity, went into the market with their bonds to raise it. The ball, once put in motion, could not be stopped. If one city had a bank, another city must have one also; and if the cities had banks, the country villages must have them also. And in this way, the work was overdone, and too many banks were established; and as they were all banking upon borrowed capital, for which they were paying a high interest, it was necessary for them to make at least that interest, over and above their expenses. Each bank was driving at the same object; and to accomplish it, they were led into excessive issues of their paper, and we all but too painfully know the result. This is one of the causes of the State debts; and, to my mind, is clearly traceable to the veto upon the charter of the Bank of the United States.

The other grew out of the policy of the Government in arresting, in 1830, the system of internal improvements. Up to the period of the veto upon the Maysville road, the United States annually appropriated, for works of internal improvement, many millions of dollars; and while the Government was engaged in this work of internal improvement, the States generally gave themselves no concern about it. These appropriations being suddenly cut off, first by the veto, and afterwards by Congress, the partiality of the States for these works induced them to undertake it. They had no money for such purposes, and, in order to get it, went into the market with their bonds, and in this way obtained the money. Having once adopted the system, it could not be restricted or prudently confined to works of immediate profit, or of great utility. To get along with any, the States had to undertake all that the different sections of the States desired. More money was wanted, and more bonds were sold, and these bonds were bearing a heavy interest, which was payable semi-annually generally, and none of the works were finished, and it became, therefore, necessary to raise this interest by taxation, which was not always done, or else to take a part of the principal borrowed, to pay the interest, which was sometimes done. To avoid taxing the people to pay the interest of the State debts, and to avoid the still more exceptionable expedient, of taking a part of the principal borrowed, to pay the interest, prodigious efforts were made to complete the works, that the tolls might pay the interest; and these efforts required more money, and to obtain it more bonds were sold. In this manner the home market became glutted with State securities; money became scarce on this side of the Atlantic, and a market was sought for those securities on the other. Interest rose up to six per cent.; but such interest obtained the money, and then new difficulties presented themselves. The great demand for labor raised the price of labor, and, with it, the price of provisions and every thing else. I will not pursue these reflections any further. I have mentioned them for the purpose showing that the veto upon the Maysville road bill was one of the prominent causes—yes, I may say with truth, (and if there be any truth in the dates and tables of the Senator from Missouri,) the most prominent cause of the debts of the States.

Ought we to pay those debts of the States? I answer, as formerly, that we ought to do no such thing. The States are able to pay those debts themselves; and if this Government were to begin paying State debts, there would be no end of it. If we paid their debts which they have contracted for banks and internal improvement, our next step would be to pay their local taxes, their officers of government, and their tailors, butchers, cooks, and washerwomen. And a payment of either of such debts would, as I most humbly conceive, be about as constitutional and expedient as the other, unless, indeed, the magnitude of the expenditure in the one case, and the smallness of it in the other, should constitute a difference. The payment of State debts would destroy the pride, independence, and noble energies of the States. Relieve State authorities of the just responsibility to their tax-paying constituents, and there would be no limit to State debts.

Mr. President, we represent the most intelligent, thriving, and enterprising people on the face of the earth; and yet they must be checked in their fancies for new schemes and "projects wild," by the constant reflection that their own pockets must make good the issues of all their undertakings. But for this balancing and prudential consideration, we should have more schemes and projects than the patent office would hold. Ours are a going-ahead sort of people, always in a gallop, and have at all times more things upon their hands than forty times their number could execute. They glory in motion and excitement, and do every thing in a minute, and change from one pursuit to another with the rapidity of thought. These are not their only peculiarities. It is indispensable to their happiness that they should at all times have an idol to worship, and a clown to laugh at, they must have occasionally a Sam Patch, a Morgan, an Abolitionist, or an Oceola, to marvel at and to talk about; they are often the victims of humbugery. The speculations in Merino sheep, in Arabian steeds, in English cattle, and Berkshire hogs, have had their day with them. The humbugery now is Espy's showers and the Morus Multicaulis; these are now "the flying Cynthias of the minute," and to-morrow they shall have something else. What will it be? Will it be that greatest of all other humbugs, the United States paying the debts of the States? We shall see.

Mr. President, it does not become me to decide whether the States have acted wisely or otherwise, in borrowing money to establish banks, or for carrying out a system of internal improvements. The States have done these things. We have seen the banks which they have established, violating their charters—inflating and deranging the currency to such an excess as to raise the price of labor and property to at least double its fair value. These evils have been seen and felt by every one. But the States are endeavoring to correct their banking institutions, and to profit in future by their past disasters and misfortunes. We then see them struggling for this point all around us; we see the banks, which redeem their notes in specie, doing little or nothing; we see those in a state of suspension rapidly curtailing their issues; we see the paper circulation brought down nearly to the amount of specie in the country. All this, I think, argues well for the future. We see many (nearly all) of the works of internal improvement unfinished, expensive, and unproductive. We know the States will have to borrow many millions more before they are completed; for to leave those works, in their present unfinished condition, would be sinking all that has been expended upon them, and impoverish the citizens of some of the States for years to come. We know and see all this; and yet I do not despair in seeing the States surmount all their difficulties, with honor and profit to themselves, without ever violating any of their engagements.

Mr. President, we are in a peculiar manner the representatives of the States: we have been sent here by them to protect their sovereignty, and defend and vindicate their honor, integrity, and perfect capability of managing with prudence their own affairs; and, as such, it becomes us, at all times and upon every fit occasion, to see that no injury is done to their credit, or to their lawful systems. I will never consent to destroy or cripple one or the other.

Mr. President, nearly the whole of the State debt is vested in banks and in works of internal improvement. These State debts were contracted by those who had a right to contract them; and the proceeds of those contracts have been invested by those who had a right to invest them. They were so invested by men not inferior to us in patrotism, in intelligence, or in a thorough knowledge of the local wants and resources of the States.

We have no ground for questioning the wisdom, prudence or purity of those proceedings. The interests of banking and of internal improvements are important and leading interests in the States; and so completely interwoven with all the other interests, that they cannot be overthrown, or arrested, without inflicting upon the States a deep, permanent, and lasting injury. The States calculate that the banks, and the public works, together, will discharge the debts incurred for them by the States; and who is here who doubts that they will do it? In what State will the failure occur? Sir, let the banks and the internal improvements of the States alone. Do not sink them into discredit, and there will be no occasion to fear that we shall ever have the debts of the States to pay, or ever be importuned upon the subject.

Have the States asked us to pay their debts? Some of them (not all, not even a majority of them, I believe,) have asked us to divide the land revenue. Some of them have asked, and do now ask us, to do so; and these petitions, upon this subject, are now before a standing committee of the Senate. And should we grant the prayer of these petitioners, how will the States dispose of this money? They will dispose of it in paying debts, in strengthening their banks, in completing their improvements; or, in other words, according to their will and pleasure. The land bill of the Senator from Kentucky, I believe, leaves, or it ought to do so, the disposition of the fund to the discretion of the States. This is the only proposition of any of the States, having the slightest analogy to the one for paying their debts; and as it is their only proposition, and is distinct and unequivocal in its terms, and opens widely and fully the questions we have been discussing, truth compels me to state that I regret our proceedings upon the subject of State debts, had not been confined to the consideration of this land distribution policy. By going farther than this, by passing by their petition, not even alluding to them, we are improperly placed in a false position before the public. We are made to appear by our adversaries, in this debate, as assuming a jurisdiction of the affairs of the States generally, which we have no right to assume. We are made to appear, by this false issue, in the despicable light of spies or eavesdroppers in the family affairs of the States, for the unholy purpose of filching their secrets to betray them. We are made to appear as holding up the States to the world—to the enemies of liberal principles and free government every where, at home and abroad—as bankrupt, prodigal, dishonest, and contemptible, and utterly incapable of prudently managing their own affairs. These are positions in which I have no ambition to be placed.

Sir, my State (Arkansas) has never yet presented herself at your footstool, in the humble and degraded attitude of a kneeling beggar, soliciting alms or charities from the Federal Treasury. Sir, she is above and beyond the reach of such humiliation. She regards alike your bequests, your sympathies, or your censures; and will ever be prepared to rebuke, in a becoming spirit, any of your officious intermedling in her private affairs. Sir, she is a sovereign, proud and independent, in the elasticity and vigor of her youth, and she knows and feels what is due to herself. She owes nothing for internal improvements. But she has loaned her credit for the benefit of her citizens, to the extent of three millions for the purpose of establishing two banks. She expects, and properly expects, that those three millions, will be paid by the banks, for whose fidelity she has vouched and bound herself. But should it turn out otherwise —should her banks disappoint her—she will foot up the bills herself and pay them—she will not murmur about it to you, or distress your sympathetic bosoms with her tears. Sir, could I do so, without compromitting her dignity by offering to respond to unauthorized and impertinent inquiries, I could, in a few words, satisfy the Senate, and satisfy the whole host of "the stockjobbing herd," that her trifling debt, if her debt it can be called, will be honorably and promptly paid at maturity. It is enough for me, on this occasion, to say that those who hold her bonds are content with the security.

Sir, I shall vote for all the resolutions, and with particular pleasure for that one which repudiates a distribution of the land revenue.

SPEECH OF MR. SALTONSTALL,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In the House of Representatives, Saturday, December 21, 1839—The House having under consideration the following resolution, moved by Mr. HOFFMAN, of New York, viz:

Resolved, That the standing rules and orders of the last House of Representatives, except the 11th rule, be adopted as the rules and orders of proceeding of this House for the ensuing ten days; and that the rules and orders be referred to a committee, with instructions to report such amendments of the said rules and orders as they may deem expedient; together with the following amendment thereto, proposed by Mr. CRAIG, of Virginia, viz: "strike out the words except the 11th rule"—

Mr. SALTONSTALL said he was as anxious as any gentleman in the House that its organization should be completed as speedily as possible. We were now on a question which, in the ordinary course of proceeding, would have arisen on the very first day of the session. The delay in the organization had been occasioned by the discussion of a great constitutional question. He had no regrets on the subject, except for the result. It was their duty to resist what they deemed to be a violation of constitutional right and usage at the threshold; and, although the decision had been contrary to his opinions and feelings, he believed the time had not been lost. The argument for the constitutional right (which had not been answered) would be productive of much good. I repeat, therefore, (said Mr. S.) this may be considered as the beginning of the session, and we are met by a question which, trivial as it may appear to some gentlemen, seems to me to be one of great importance—no less than whether, in the election of the officers of this House, we shall depart from a usage which has all the force of a contemporaneous construction of the Constitution. I am opposed to the new rule, because it is an innovation on the practice of this House, extending from the first meeting of the first Congress under the Constitution down to the last session. The election of the acting Clerk was the first instance in which an officer of this House was ever chosen by a viva voce vote. The rule "that in all cases of election by the House the vote should be taken viva voce" was adopted immediately afterwards, with little or no debate, under the application of the previous question. Is such a rule, adopted at the close of the last Congress, to be binding on this? Why should we depart from the long and well established usage of this House? Is there any necessity for it? We are told that the mode proposed carries out the spirit of the Constitution. Sir, these unnecessary innovations will drive out the spirit of the Constitution. In the only case in which the mode of voting is mentioned in the Constitution, it is expressly provided that it shall be by ballot, and that, too, in the very highest and most important of all elections—that of President of the United States. It must be by ballot, both in the College of Electors and in the House of Representatives, should the election be had there. How, then, can elections by ballot be against the spirit of the Constitution? Or how can viva voce voting be more in consonance with its principles? The great argument for the change is that we are mere agents, accountable to our constituents, and that they have a right to know for whom we vote in all cases. Surely, if in any election by Representatives or agents they are responsible to the people, those are so, in the highest possible degree, whose action controls the greatest political event which takes place under our Constitution—the election of the Chief Magistrate of the United States, the most important election, not only in this country, but, I may say, in the world. I admit our responsibility. But for what? For every exercise of incidental power? Are we any more agents of the people than those illustrious men who have preceded us here? Those who made the Constitution, and put it in operation? Did not they understand the extent of their responsibility?

We are responsible for the faithful performance of the trust committed to us. The Constitution places it in the power of one-fifth of this body to cause the yeas and nays to be recorded in our Journal, when in the discharge of our legislative duties; but it goes no further. It grants to each House the right to choose its own officers, but leaves the manner to their discretion. The election of our officers is analogous to elections by the people themselves, which all admit should be by ballot. The officers of this House are appointed for the more convenient and orderly performance of our legislative duties. Does our responsibility to our constituents require that their election should be viva voce? Did they understand it so? Did they not suppose that it would be made in the long established mode? Have our constituents no confidence in us? Why have they sent us here? Surely because they have some confidence in us. But what sort of confidence can the people have in Representatives whom they are not willing to trust to vote at their own discretion, upon information obtained here, for a Clerk, or Printer, or Sergeant-at-Arms? It never occurred to them to hold their Representatives accountable, according to the doctrine contended for. They make no inquiries on the subject; but should my constituents ask, I shall never hesitate to tell them for whom I gave my vote. Did the people complain that the officers of this House were chosen by ballot? Where did the idea that a change was necessary originate? With the people? No; it originated here. It was conceived in this House, or in this city, and that very recently, and owing to then recent events, and for objects which have been stated by the gen leman from New York, [Mr. HUNT.]

The change will not be an improvement. It may carry out more perfectly the system of party organization; but the executive officers of this House ought not to be mere tools of party. It is contrary to the theory of the Government. It may be inconsistent with the proper performance of their duties. The Clerk, for instance—ought he to be an active partisan? No; he ought to go straightforward in the discharge of his duty, wholly uninfluenced by party considerations; he ought not to be a man who will permit his course to be dictated by party managers. Ought the press employed by this House to be a mere party engine? So the other officers—the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Doorkeeper—have important duties to perform, in the discharge of which they should know no party distinctions. A Doorkeeper, who is a mere tool of party, may carefully look up all of his own party from the lobbies and committee-rooms, when an important vote is taken, to the neglect of others. The duties of these officers should be discharged with strict impartiality.

I am opposed to it, because the ballot is the only mode to secure perfectly free elections. Gentlemen who have advocated viva voce voting have repelled the idea that any one would be afraid to acknowledge the vote he had given. If so, then there is no need of setting aside the old and most convenient usage, because the result of our election will be the same. But we are not all insensible to fear. Some are sensible to fear of one kind, and some of another. There may be gentlemen who would not shrink from any danger, from an open foe, in the open field, who might fear the arrows that fly in darkness—they might fear to incur the denunciations of their party, or to be stigmatized as traitors in the party press. And there may be influence of a different kind. We all have much intercourse with the officers of this House, and may have received many kind attentions and services from them, and may entertain towards them the most friendly feelings, and yet, in our opinion, the public interest may be promoted by a change. In such a case, to say the least, it would to some seem discourteous to stand up in their places and openly vote against their old officers. Coming from the State I do, I have been surprised to hear the viva voce called the only free mode of voting. I have been in the habit of considering the New England States to be as free and as purely republican in their institutions as any communities under Heaven. As to Massachusetts, it was originally a pure Democracy, in the strictest sense of that term—the Legislative Assembly being composed of all the freemen of the Colony. When it became necessary to establish a representative body, the General Court, it was composed of deputies, agents from the several towns or corporations. So it has been ever since. The representatives are holden to a strict accountability, and yet all elections in the Legislature, as well as among the people, have always been by ballot. Viva voce voting is a thing unknown. How is it in New Hampshire? I suppose gentlemen will admit New Hampshire to be a pattern of Democracy; but in that and all the other New England States the ballot is the only mode of voting known.

What fell from a member from North Carolina in his zeal for the new rule, satisfied me that the ballot-box is the only security for free unbiassed elections here. He would have us vote viva voce. Why? Because he tells us that there have been instances in which members of former Congresses were guilty of treason! Treason? Against whom? Against the people, he says—but, by the people, did he not mean the party? Here is the difficulty. Cases have happened in which some have not come "up to the chalk," in the language of another gentleman—have not followed in the footsteps of the party leaders, and that was treason! Why, sir, this is enough to convince me that if we are to act independently here, we must be protected by the ballot—not from the eyes of our constituents, but from the searching, the inquisitorial glance of inexorable party leaders.

On the whole, I see no reason for departing from the good old course of our forefathers. I believe it to be the safe course—the only way of obtaining the free, the true, the unbiassed opinion of the members of this House.

SPEECH OF MR. BELL, OF TENNESSEE,

ON THE SAME SUBJECT.

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, rose amidst loud cries for the question, and said that he perceived and appreciated the impatience of gentlemen around him; but he trusted the House would excuse him in seizing the present opportunity to offer a few words—and they should be very few—in reply to what had fallen last evening from the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS.] I pledge myself (said Mr. B.) to this House that nothing was further from my intention or expectation than to excite such a debate as so suddenly sprung up in the House on the last night—nothing could have occasioned me greater astonishment. I repeat the assurance that nothing could have been further from my expectation than that the statement of one single point, to which I had then called the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina, would have had such an effect. I could not so much as have dreamed that the solitary remark I had made in regard to the influence of the Executive in this House would have created such a fluttering in the Administration camp. My sole object in referring to the matter at all was to bring the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] to my aid, in establishing, as a principle in this House, the importance of resisting and breaking down the exorbitant and growing influence of the Executive; but no sooner had I referred to perfectly well known facts in the past political history of this country—without impugning the motives of a single gentleman on this floor, and without transgressing, in the slightest degree, the very strictest limits of parliamentary propriety—than I found that I had drawn down upon my head the wrath of gentlemen in all quarters of this Hall. A gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELLER] immediately sprang up, and, if I comprehended the drift of his remarks, he was under the impression that I had intended to frighten him from the discharge of what he believed to be his duty. Then came the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BYNUM,] who in the strain of elocution so peculiar to him, scouted the very idea of any thing like Executive influence in the counsels of this body. And next rose a gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PETRIKIN,] and attributed the remarks I had made to disappointed ambition; thus offering a gross personal allusion to me individually, in the face of the whole House. And last, though not least, the gentleman from South Carolina himself, to whom I had appealed in full confidence of his aid, because I was occupying the very ground which he himself had taken but a day or two ago, who tells me that I am the very last man in this House who ought to make an appeal on the subject of Executive influence.

[Mr. PICKENS here rose to explain. The gentleman from Tennessee had mistaken the point of his remarks. He had not said that that gentleman ought to be one of the last in this House to make an appeal on Executive influence, but the last to refer to the origin of this rule of the viva voce vote, considering that gentleman's position at the time the rule was introduced and adopted.]

Mr. BELL resumed. I am happy to find that I mistook the gentleman. I certainly did understand him as meaning to arraign my political consistency, but I am now gratified to learn from him that he did not.

The question is narrow, and I regret that time will not permit me to enter into as full a vindication as I could wish of the statement I made in relation to Executive influence. Referring to times that are past—for there has not enough of the present session elapsed to enable me to speak confidently of the time now present—but looking to the times that are past, I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BYNUM] that this House furnishes a most illustrious and extraordinary instance of exemption if the Executive exerts no influence among the members of this body. Alas! sir, such an exemption is never to be expected. I cannot form the faintest hope, when I look at the existing condition of human nature, that that time will ever come so long as the Executive of this nation continues to wield so enormous an amount of patronage as is now within his control. And I say further, that I consider this as a subject which ought very fully and very freely to be debated in this House. It ought, if we had time, to be discussed at large, as I trust it yet will be. And I say further to the gentleman from North Carolina, that I could point him to authorities which he will respect for the doctrine, that, if a certain policy should continue to prevail in this country, (the appointment of members of Congress to office,) which policy does now prevail in it, it could lead to but one result, namely, the lowest and tamest political subserviency. In reply to the appeal he made to me, saying that I ought, before now, to have seen that there is nothing in all these assertions about Executive influence, I tell that gentleman that I have seen much; that I have seen enough, and far too much, as it appears to me every man must have seen who has looked upon the political drama that has been playing in this country for years past. And, in addition to what I said last night, I will now declare what is my solemn belief, that no monarch in England, since the expulsion of the Stuarts, has exerted a greater influence, a wider sway, or has more efficiently controlled the measures and policy of that country than the Executive branch of this Government during the late and the present Administrations exercised over the affairs of our own. And I cite in proof of it the very fact which the House last night witnessed, namely that no man can rise here, and so much as mention Executive influence, without instantly exposed himself to remarks of the grossest and most offensive personality. What stronger sympton of such an influence can be exhibited? And I call upon gentlemen to mark the progress of it.

As to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PETRIKIN] as to disappointed personal ambition, I am at a loss to know to what he could possibly have alluded. Did the gentleman mean to refer to the fact that I have abandoned a certain portion of a great political party in this country with which I once was connected, and that I did so in consequence of having been disappointed in not obtaining the favors which I asked of that party while we acted together? If that is what he means, then I reply that all I ever asked or sought of my associates in that party was given me instantly, freely, and without hesitation; and when I speak of my associates, I refer to the entire Jackson party prior to the year 1834. To what other disappointed ambition of mine he intended to refer, I do not know and cannot divine.

Last night I stated only what I believed to have been the object in changing the ancient and long established mode of voting in this House. It was not my intention to go into the whole question. I might have alluded to party discipline and to the effectual control exerted over individuals by party machinery. Ay, sir, a control not over the votes of gentlemen only, but almost over their consciences. And in support of this view of the matter, I might have vouched the sentiments of the gentleman from South Carolina himself. He, as well as I, has long held and often declared that he influence of party in this House is too strong for the good of the country; and it was with a view of freeing the members of this House from that iron despotism in which party had too long enchained them, that I advocated the vote by ballot. Many, I am sure, must have felt these chains, and under their galling pressure many, I know, have been compelled to act against their better judgment. This domination is not owing to the power of the Executive in his own person. Singly and alone, with all his patronage he would be comparatively powerless, but for his headmen, the executioners of his vengeance against all delinquents who dare to resist the edicts of a party caucus. The gentleman from South Carolina imputed it as an insult upon the House to affirm, or in the remotest degree insinuate, that gentleman here, when voting by ballot, would act differently from what they would do if giving their votes in the sight of all men; and other gentlemen considered it as disgraceful to suppose that any member of this House would be so timid, so cowardly, and mean-spirited as not to dare to speak his sentiments openly on all occasions; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if I rightly understand him, went so far as to insinuate that one ground of my opposition to the viva voce vote was, that I was myself afraid to come up to what I believe he called the "scratch." [Some on here said aloud that his language was "walk up to the chalk."] Yes, that was the gentleman's delicate and parliamentary phrase. Now, without inquiring whether, under some pressing emergency, I should or should not have courage to do this, admitting that I had not, and that it was true that I dare not, in the gentleman's phrase, "walk up to the chalk," does not that very fact furnish one of the strongest possible arguments on my side of the question? Does it not demonstrate that some of the members of this House require the protection of the law against those who hold the power to harass and to injure them? Without affirming that I myself possess that firmness of spirit which would enable me on all occasions to come forth and speak my sentiments with boldness before the world, I do say, from my knowledge of mankind, and especially from my knowledge of men who have held seats in Congress, that there are some of the most honest upright, exalted, patriotic men, and men too, possessing a physical courage which would carry them fearlessly to the cannon's mouth, who do not possess that moral hardihood which would enable them to brave the denunciations of the party press; and who, when that danger stared them in the face, never could be brought up the sticking-place. And it is my honest belief that is this very circumstance which keeps back many of the best men in the country from yielding their names as candidates for the suffrages of their fellow-citizens. They possess physical courage in abundance, but they shrink from the thought that the moment they refuse to follow a party, in all its requisitions—in all its measures, that moment they must deliver up their fair names to the demoniac fury of a party press, and be held up to public scorn as corrupt traitors and "bank bought deserters." It is party despotism like this which fits men for ultimate slavery. It is not then the fear of their constituents which induces gentleman to oppose the viva voce vote. No, sir, it is a fear of a very different description.

I might have brought many other arguments to my aid if I had intended to enter fully into this subject. An argument has often been urged with great ability that, as gentlemen of all parties are here brought to act together, under the same presiding officer, it is better that he should not know what particular individuals have and have not voted for his elevation to the chair, in order that he may not have it in his power, in administering the difficult and delicate trust committed to his hands, to discriminate between his friends and his opposers. As it was patriotically said the other day, in the impressive address delivered to us from that chair, the Speaker ought to be the Speaker of the whole House, and not the mere organ of a party. The Speaker of this House should emulate the conduct of a patriotic Speaker of the British House of Commons, (the immortal Speaker Lenthall,) who, when improperly questioned by his King, told him, on his knees, it is true, but with a spirit which has endeared his name to history: "I have no eyes to see, or mouth to speak, but by direction of the Commons of England." And so of our Clerk, or our public Printer. Can it be needful, or it is expedient, that we fill those offices with a heated partisan? What has he to do with the great and leading policy of this country? or what right has he to influence and move the great political parties into which it is divided? His duties are merely subordinate and ministerial, and gentlemen of all parties have an obvious interest that those duties be performed with impartiality. If ever there was an occasion when the vote by ballot is pre-eminently proper and necessary, surely it is in the choice of the ministerial officers of a body of this description.

And now, sir, a few words as to the course of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] last evening. I had said that I knew the origin of this recent rule for viva voce voting and I stated what its operation had been in practice, whatever might have been the motives of those who originated it. And the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS,] as I now understand, observed, in reply to an appeal I had addressed to him, "that I was one of the last persons in this House who should make an appeal respecting the origin of this rule; because he well remembered the period when the subject had first been mooted, and had seen, at the same time, the gentleman from Tennessee seated in that chair, as the organ and instrument of great and everwhelming Executive power. And therefore it ill became him to rail against the prevalence of such influence in this House." I do not know that I quote the gentleman's precise words, but I think I have stated his argument fairly. I speak not in ill-nature of the gentleman from South Carolina, and I pardon a great deal of the violence of his attack upon me, because, in the close of his remarks, he stated himself after all, to be a friend to the ancient, the long established, and, as I believe, the true Republican mode of voting. I pardon, I say, a great deal of his violence, as he is a coadjutor with me in the general effort to diminish Executive power. And I will not allude to certain other circumstances in that gentleman's own past history, which might be brought to show that, on the score of consistency, he should take care how he assails any gentleman here for his conduct during the last few years. But what I desire to say, and what has in fact called me up at this time, is this: that the remarks of the gentleman involved, as I understand them, an imputation on my own course when called by the House to administer the duties of that Chair. It does not become me to say much of the course I pursued when I had the honor of filling that high and distinguished station. I was elected to the Chair under very extraordinary circumstances; and such as made the duty of the station peculiarly delicate and arduous, as regarded the then existing state of parties in this House. But notwithstanding these obstacles, it affords me high satisfaction to state that, in my administration of the Chair, I was so fortunate—so happy—in steering between the opposite extremes, that no appeal by either party, from my decisions, was ever taken, nor was one of those decisions ever reversed, save in one instance, when it was done at my own request; and though the sittings of the House were very stormy, and the rules of its order had often to be enforced with a firm hand, yet, at the close of the session, I enjoyed the honor of receiving a unanimous vote of thanks. I cannot boast of any great ability in the discharging of my duty. I could not but be conscious of a want of skill for what was so difficult, but I flatter myself that in all my course, it was so manifestly my intention to act impartially and honestly, that no fault could be found by my most bitter enemies on this floor. I trust that thus much will be pardoned to me after all that has been said.

And as to the other insinuation of the honorable gentleman, that I sat there as the organ and instrument of a great and formidable and overwhelming Executive power; I beg leave to say that he must have drawn the ground of that statement from his own heated imagination. And it is most extraordinary that he should have referred particularly to the time when the famous Three Million bill was under discussion in this House; because at that time, I had the honor of acting in unison, as I supposed, with the gentleman from South Carolina in regard to the Presidential canvass. I know that many of his friends in South Carolina professed a lively interest in the success of the political movement in which I was then engaged. He and I were then of the same party, linked and bound together, and directing our joint efforts to the same object; namely, to resist Executive power, and, if possible, to save the Constitution. If in this statement I am mistaken, the gentleman hears it, and can set me right.

[Mr. PICKENS here rose to explain, and said that the gentleman from Tennessee was proceeding on an idea which he (Mr. P.) had not expressed. He had spoken of him as apparently at the head of a great and tremendous and overwhelming political party, whose influence seemed likely to overawe the decisions of this House. Executive power had been then at its very height, and the gentleman, seated in that chair, appeared to be at the head of the party. Such had been Mr. P's impression; in this he might have been mistaken, but he had judged from what he saw and heard.]

Mr. B. resumed: If the gentleman meant no more than that, his imputation was not very serious. But still I was placed by him, in his remarks last night, in the attitude of inconsistency. Whatever may have been the impression prevailing in any one section of the country, or with the gentleman, as to my being, at the period referred to, the organ of Executive will, my position was perfectly well understood in the country generally, and there could have been but few, very few public men who did not know that I was put into that chair in direct opposition to the wishes and dictation of the Great Chief who then occupied the Executive Chair, and ruled this country with almost absolute sway. Yes, sir, it is one of the proudest recollections of my life, that I had the moral courage to resist the wide-spread and overwhelming tide of Executive influence and favor which then threatened to sweep over the whole country; and it will be a consolation to me, whatever may be my future fortune, to reflect that I did throw myself, with a gallant little band besides, into the breach at that period, and there stood ready to become the victim, if need be, of Executive vengeance. Sir, it was the only apology I could make—it was the only explanation I could give to my generous and high-minded friends, at home and elsewhere, for having permitted my name to be run for the Chair in opposition to an apparent majority of the party with which I acted—that the President had interposed his authority, and menaced me with his denunciations if I dared to aspire to that high station—that I had been first calumniated by my enemies, and was then interdicted the place which you, sir, now fill, by the President himself. And, sir, I had the further gratification to find that my apology was ample, and that I had the approval of every high-minded and independent member of the party with which I had so long acted. And, whenever my private honor shall require to be sustained, there are gentlemen still in the ranks of the Administration who, I doubt not, will feel constrained by truth and justice to bear me witness, for they know that what I say is true. So far, then, was I from having been the favorite or the organ of Executive power while in that Chair, that I was elected to it in opposition to its most strenuous exercise. It was actually decreed that in no contingency should I be allowed to be Speaker; and the only solid objection, of a party character, that ever I could learn was made against my pretensions was, that I did not enter heartily into the support of the President in his war against the United States Bank, and that I could not or would not approve his removal of the public deposites. It is a part of the secret history of the times, that the Committee of Ways and Means were deterred from reporting a resolution approving the removal of the deposites by the stand I and a few others had taken upon that point.

This was the period when the propriety of changing the mode of voting in the elections of the House came to be seriously and earnestly entertained; and the same reasons were urged then which we continue to hear advanced in favor of the viva voce vote. I will only add further upon this point, that, if the day shall ever come when the President shall have it in his own power, by patronage, by the application of the party screws or by any other means, to dictate the appointment of the presiding officer of this House, while we may retain the form, we shall have lost the substance of liberty.

The gentleman from South Carolina appears to have mistaken my position in every respect, both now and at the period alluded to in his remarks. He appears to labor under the impression that I have undergone a great change in my political principles since the time when he regarded me as the instrument and organ of an overshadowing Executive influence and power. The gentlemen is in great error in this point also. While it is true that I have changed many of my political associates since the time when I presided in that Chair, yet, sir, it is equally true, whatever may be said or thought to the contrary in any quarter, that I advocate and support at this time, both in and out of this House, the identical political principles which I then professed and supported; and, what is more, there is no one leading or cardinal principle which I professed and acted upon on the day when I had the honor first to take a seat as a Representative in this hall, now twelve years ago, that I have abandoned. No, sir, while I have changed my opinion of many of the leading men of the country, I have still adherred to my early principles, and my views of the true policy of the country are still the best and wisest in my judgment. I still stand by and advocate the principles avowed by General Jackson when he came into power. It is a little singular that the gentleman from South Carolina should have pointed to the proceedings in this House on the famous Three Million bill to illustrate his idea of my subserviency to Executive power, when the truth was, that, contrary to the wishes of every leading and supple instrument of Executive will in the House at that time, I appointed a committee of conference on the part of the House, in express reference to a compromise by which the diminished appropriation proposed by the Senate might be voted. And I well remember the arguments by which one of the gentlemen appointed on that committee was prevailed upon to act; but he did act, and in the most manly and decided manner. Still, however, the object was defeated by the chairman of the committee. It is also strange that the gentleman from South Carolina should have forgotten that Judge White, whom I am always proud to acknowledge as my leader, and whose name was then before the people for the Presidency, was denounced by the party press as a traitor for voting against the Three Million bill! At this period I had become the known and acknowledged opponent of the wishes of the then President in my choice of a candidate to succeed him. It was then, too, that I was generally understood to be marked out as a special object of Executive resentment, on account of the movement in favor of Judge White, for which I was held mainly responsible. And while I am upon this point, I may be allowed, I trust, to say a word or two to some of my present party associates, who still retain a portion of those feelings of dislike which they contracted while I continued to act with the Jackson party. Whatever may be the justice of those feelings which they occasionally manifest towards me, I have the proud satisfaction of knowing that by that act, by which I incurred the lasting hostility of the most powerful man in this country, and of all his devoted followers, I at the same time struck the manacles from their hands, and opened to them the first hope of deliverance from the iron rule to which they had been subject for years. Yes, sir, when the White movement, as it has been called, took place, the old opposition to Gen. Jackson had been reduced so low that it could only number some five or six States, as was manifest to the election of 1832

There is one other point which I feel bound to notice, in reply to what fell from the gentleman from South Carolina, relating to the discharge of the duties of the Chair while I had the honor to fill it. There was, during that period, sir, no correspondence or intercourse, direct or indirect, between the Executive and the Speaker on the subject of his duties, or as the manner in which he should discharge them. I felt and acted as independent of him in my station as he was of me in the discharge of his appropriate duties; and give me leave to say, sir, that in that respect I feel proud in the consciousness that I maintained for the Chair of this House its full measure of dignity and independence. But the gentleman from South Carolina was pleased to mention to me, in a private conversation last evening, his recollection of the indignant feelings excited against me while in the Chair, when I placed a friend of the Administration at the head of the committee on Foreign Affairs, and thereby superseded Mr. Everett, of Massachusetts, who stood second on the committee, before the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of his seat in the House by the former chairman. I presume this act of mine was referred to by the gentleman from South Carolina as an evidence of my subserviency to Executive power. Upon the subject of that appointment, I will state, for the information of that gentleman, and in justice to myself, that I did place a friend of the Administration at the head of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and thereby set aside the high claims of the excellent, able, and amiable gentleman from Massachusetts referred to, and in doing so I knew that I might wound the feelings, and, for aught I knew, incur the displeasure of that distinguished gentleman and of his numerous friends; but, sir, I beg leave to add that I acted upon a sense of duty and upon the suggestion of my own judgment. I made that appointment of my own will and pleasure, without the slightest interposition of the Executive. I acted in conformity with a maxim which I remembered to have heard the distinguished and experienced gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] lay down in one of the first speeches I heard him make on this floor, which was, that, in order to make this a practicable Government, the several departments of it must not be regarded as co-ordinate only, but in a due degree co-operative also. The Committee on Foreign Affairs has charge of a branch of the public interest and business of the country placed by the Constitution more exclusively within the control of the Executive than any other. I considered the appointment of a political friend of the Executive as the chairman of that committee not to be an act of mere liberality, but of patriotic duty. There are many reasons why the chairman of that committee should be also a private and confidental friend of the President. There is, perhaps, one other committee, which upon some of these grounds ought also to be conceded to the Administration—I mean the Committee of Ways and Means; but of that committee I had not the control when I was elected to the chair. I do not hesitate to say now, sir, that, had it been my fortune to occupy the station at this time which you fill, I would have acted, in regard to the appointment of the Committee on Foreign Relations, upon the same principles I adopted as the guide to my course upon the occasion referred to by the gentleman from South Carolina.

I hope the House will pardon these explanations in regard to my own course. I thought it necessary to say so much in my own vindication and defence against the gross misconceptions which appear to have prevailed with some gentlemen in regard to it.

SPEECH OF MR. HOWARD,

OF INDIANA,

In the House of Representatives, February 12, 1840—On the proposition to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill appropriating $150,000 to each of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, for the continuation of the Cumberland road.

Mr. HOWARD said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret extremely that this discussion has not been suffered to progress, according to the expressed wishes of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MASON,] who addressed the House on yesterday. He insisted, in the outset of his remarks, that the debate should not have a party cast—that the question under consideration should be taken up, and considered on its merits alone, without connecting it with the party politics that now agitate the country, from one side to the other. I repeat, sir, that I regret that others have departed from this course, and that subjects, foreign to the one before the House, have been drawn into the discussion. We have had a discussion, not only on the Cumberland Road, but on the general politics of the country. One gentleman, distinguished for his propriety in debate, and his knowledge of the rules of parliamentary proceeding, has favored us with a discussion of the merits of the Florida war. What has the Florida war to do with this great national highway? Sir, let us take up the Florida war, and discuss it at a proper time, and in its proper place, and let the friends of the brave officers and soldiers who have perilled all in their country's service, welcome their return from the dangers of a pestilential atmosphere and savage foe, without having their feelings outraged by the disgrace that has been attempted to be thrown upon them. We are told that this has been an "imbecile war," conducted disgracefully to the country; and when I see in the lobby of this hall the officers who have returned from it with shattered constitutions, and embittered feelings, I am reminded of another gallant army, which, having conquered treason, and cut off the traitor, "got themselves by stealth into the city," and instead of being allowed a triumph, as was due to a victorious army, retired from the gaze of him whose diadem they had saved. Instead of being welcomed home with honors and rewards, we see the Jesups, and other distinguished officers who have returned from the arduous campaigns of this war, treated as if they had returned in disgrace.

[Mr. BIDDLE here explained.]

Mr. H. continued. Mr. Speaker, I was not mistaken as to the language used by the honorable gentleman on that occasion, and he does me no more that justice when he says that I would not intentionally pervert his meaning. But what did he mean when he spoke of the "imbecile management of this war?" What is meant by that gentleman and others when they speak thus? And how do they expect to be understood by that remnant whose bones are not found bleaching on the fields, or wasting in the marshes of that country. It is true, gentlemen say to the army, "we don't mean you, when we make such charges; we know that your squares fell on the ground they occupied, as if you had been brave; we have been told that some of your companions even laid violent hands on themselves, because they could not overcome the obstacles interposed by the irresistible laws of nature. It is not you we mean; stand aside awhile, and suffer this implied disgrace, that we may charge home upon the Administration the disasters of this war; let us hide your victories, your sufferings, your battle fields, from the country for the present, and allow us to call it an "imbecile war." Such, sir, is the language implied by the course of those who call this subject into requisition, for the purpose of converting it into political capital.

Ought we not to cherish our army? Ought we to heap disgrace on them, because that country in which they have been employed has been a Parthia? If the well appointed legions of Rome were not able to withstand the mode of warfare practised by a foe far less active and subtle than the modern savage, and in a country not more suited for concealment and ambuscade, why should disgrace be heaped upon our army because they found a Parthia in Florida? I have read that when the legions of Rome went to the field where the army of Varro was slaughtered, they raised a loud wail of lamentation when they saw the field covered with the bones and the eagles of the slaughtered legions. And shall we, with such examples before us, in our eagerness for party advantage, bring into discredit our national arms? Surely we ought not to advance party purposes by detracting from the credit of those brave men who have perilled all in their country's service. When I heard the denunciations against them on this floor, I felt that if I had been one of them, I would have come to this Capitol and cast down my armor, and have done that which I had never done before the enemies of the country—I would have turned my back upon the service. I ask, on behalf of these brave men, if the Administration is to be charged with imbecility and mismanagement, that gentlemen would do it directly; and not strike at it through them.

[Mr. BIDDLE here asked Mr. HOWARD to give way for an explanation]

Mr. HOWARD. I remember a colleague of mine, [Mr. WICK,] when he asked a similar indulgence, was shown no favor. He was told, "if you are not conscious of having abused the courtesy of the House, withdraw the motion," [a motion which he had made to lay the subject on the table;] and this expression, too, came from the amiable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE.] Though I have not the pleasure of an intimate personal acquaintance with that gentleman, yet I know enough of him to believe he regarded himself within parliamentary usage; but it must also be said that his conduct was parliamentary severity, especially when it is remembered that my colleague was on the floor for the first time. I shall leave the way open for the gentleman to obtain the floor, or I would yield it now.

I shall say nothing further on the Florida war, only to insist that we ought not incidentally to discuss those measures of the Administration which, from their nature and importance, are entitled to a direct consideration.

Before, however, I touch the principal matter now the subject of debate, I owe it to an honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] to pay a just respect to some remarks which fell from him, in reference to the recent elections in Indiana, for which he has kindly undertaken to account.

Mr. Speaker, why does that gentleman call in question the decision of Indiana in regard to her delegation in Congress? Has he the right to interrogate her on that subject?

I remember, sir, sometime since, a band of Conservatives here, who, when the President in his message referred to certain causes, as having led to political changes in New York, were thrown into paroxysms of indignation, because the President had chosen to speak of these changes of opinion, and their causes. Well: what have we now? A member of Congress questioning a sovereign State on the subject of her choice of Representatives. It may be that the people of Indiana ought to have chosen the friends of the gentleman, instead of those they have sent here. In truth, sir, he seems to be marvellously well acquainted with our domestic affairs. The names of village papers and their contents are as well known to him as if he had travelled through that region—better known to him than to myself, though I am recently from Indiana.

[Here Mr. PROFFIT said he had given the gentleman from New York his information.]

But the honorable gentleman from New York has kindly informed us that it was the Cumberland road on which the elections of that State turned; and that his friends failed on the ground of their supposed hostility to the measure, or their inefficiency in pressing the subject on the notice of Congress. Whilst I enter a protestando, as the lawyers say, against his right to inquire into this subject, I will say to him, that so far as one district of that State is concerned, his information is not well founded. In regard to other gentlemen, I pretend not to speak, having had a competitor that gave me as much as I desired to attend to, without looking into the canvass in other sections of the State. Rarely was the subject of the Cumberland road mentioned by either my competitor or myself. We discussed other topics: the Sub-Treasury; the United States Bank; the merits of the late and present Administrations, and especially the charges made against them of fraud, corruption, and extravagance. In seventy-five addresses which I delivered, these were the subjects I discussed. And here I would notice a remark of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE.] He charged the Executive with making an attempt to bring into public odium the Congress of the United States, by avoiding the responsibility of submitting estimates of expenditure, and then charging the extravagance of the Government upon this body. Sir, there is another view of this subject, which I will bring to that gentleman's notice. What has been the charge urged against the Administration in all the Opposition presses of the country, and by gentlemen on this floor? It has been that of extravagance and profligacy in expenditure, on the part of the Executive. The course which I took on this subject was not that now ascribed to the party to which I belong. I, sir, it is true, showed the estimates when this charge was brought against the Administration, during the canvass—but did I stop here? No, sir; I went into the details; showed the objects of expenditure, and that both parties had voted the appropriations in Congress. In this manner, sir, I defended the party to which the gentleman belongs, as well as the Administration. If I had stopped with showing the estimates, I would have been justly chargeable with being a demagogue, and unworthy of addressing a popular assembly. But, when the honorable gentleman is defending this body against public odium, why is he not also made sensible of another effort which must have fallen within his observation? Has he not heard of the "office holders' party,"—the "spoils party,"—and other similar expressions? Why, sir, if an assemblage of citizens, although it may consist of farmers, is held for the purpose of political discussion, or organization, and they happen to be favorable to the Administration, they go away branded in every Opposition print as the "spoils party,"—the "office holders' party,"—and with such other denunciatory epithets as are ever ever ready to drop from the lips of the partisan. Does the gentleman see nothing in all this calculated to array the people, as such, against the constituted authorities, and to bring into disrepute our institutions themselves? I would be gratified to find that these facts should make a suitable impression on the minds of honorable gentlemen here. But, sir, there is one consolatory reflection, and that is, that denunciation from any quarter does not pass with the people for truth. The mass of the people seek this on every great question, and he who goes before them for public favor, unless armed with truth, although he may have a temporary triumph, must ultimately fail. The honorable gentleman from New York seems, in his remarks on this subject, to have resembled a mariner whose bark had been thrown between the the counter currents of two contending seas. He would be pleased to favor this road, and yet he is unwilling to vote on this subject until he can hear "from the palace"—until he can learn the views of the President.

Sir, suppose this argument had come from some friend of the Administration—what would we hear? That its author was a "palace slave." It would be said that there was an effort to make this House subservient to the President upon the great subject of expenditure. We, Mr. Speaker, are the guardians of the public treasure; and in appropriating it our inquiry should be, not whether the President or Secretary has recommended the appropriation, but whether it is called for by the public service. In doing this, we act on our own responsibility; and I, sir, as one, will be found voting upon every question of appropriation, upon my own convictions of the necessity of the expenditure called for, without being governed by estimates.

In the progress of this discussion, my attention was attracted by some remarks which fell from an honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PARRIS,] I am pleased to find that he has had the good taste not to include in his published speech all the remarks which were delivered by him on this floor.

[Mr. PARRIS explained. He said he did not write out his remarks, nor correct them, and had no wish to be answerable for his speech in any other form than that in which it was delivered.]

I regret it, sir, (said Mr. H.) for I had hoped that some of the offensive remarks made by that gentleman on yesterday, had been left out of the printed report by his direction. Did he know, when he was assailing the Western people, he was assailing his own countrymen? What were we told? "That those who come here to ask for this appropriation were squatters and pillagers of the public lands." If these expressions could be confined to these walls, I should not regard it necessary to answer them; but when I remember that epithets habitually applied to individuals or nations give character, I feel bound at once to meet the injurious imputations implied in the language of that gentleman. What is the idea of the foreigner when he hears the settlers of the West characterized as squatters and pillagers of the public domain? If I were to suppose what it would be, from the expressions of gentlemen here, I should conclude that an Eastern gentleman desirous of emigrating Westward, would esteem it necessary to provide himself with traps, snares, and the like, and when he should get there to use what, in the western part of North Carolina, they call a dead-fall, in order to catch and clear the country of squatters, and render it habitable for civilized man.

For the information of that gentleman, I will tell him that the squatters of the West walk erect, are possessed of the ordinary principles of humanity, governed and influenced by the like motives, principles and feelings, as ourselves, fearing but little else than the God that made them. They have not, nor do they pretend to have, all the polish of the older communities of the East; but there is a sterling integrity and manly energy about them, indicative of the excellence, and strength, and relative weight they are destined to possess as a part of this great empire.

Does the gentleman want to read their history? Let him go to the Rock of Plymouth. Why is it that New England performs her centennial pilgrimage to that spot, rendered sacred by the landing of the pilgrim fathers? They had no title to the ground on which they first pitched their tents. It was the soil of the red man—of the stranger. They came, actuated by the noblest feelings; they came in pursuit of liberty and equality; like the Western pioneer, they came to better their condition, and find that in the great West, that the Old World denied them.

Sir, it sounds strangely to hear a descendant of the pilgrim fathers speak disparagingly of the settlers of the West, who, like them, have gone to a new land to encounter its hardships, and its dangers, and open up the way to the onward progress of civilization, carrying along with them all our institutions. We are all pioneers, and the descendants of pioneers, and are governed by the same spirit. We want room, and we step westward; the huntsman to find game, and the cultivator of the earth to find whereon to raise the plenteous means of subsistence. In doing this, the settler has ever been the outpost; the guard of the interior settlements, and saved them from the tomahawk and scalping knife of the savage. The same principle which prompts—the same necessity which urges, the laboring man to find a home in the wilderness of the West, governs us all; men of all conditions and professions.

Mr. Speaker, I must be allowed to apply this principle to my own profession. A young man whose father has given him a good education, and good morals, sets out for the far West, having spent some time in acquiring a profession. He arrives at one of our county towns, with purse exhausted, and coat threadbare. He goes to a Western inn, and soon strikes a bargain with the landlord, the substance of which is, that he is to sleep under the tavern keeper's roof, eat at his table, and to pay him for these benefits, when he shall be able to make the money by his profession. He commences the practice of the law, and in a short time gains a strong hold on the affections of the people, and a still stronger on the good will of the daughter of some substantial farmer. He marries, becomes a useful citizen, and not unfrequently a squatter in this hall as a member of Congress. Sir, I see such men all around me.

But this occupation of the public lands is not only sanctioned by the conduct of our fathers, and our whole people: it has also the sanction of law. What has the Government done? I answer, it has done that which should command the approbation of all good men. For the last forty years, it has told the pioneers of the West to "Go on—occupy the lands—we will provide for you, and protect you in the enjoyment of the fruits of your labor."

I have some acquaintance with the character of those who, under these assurances of the Government, now occupy the public lands. I have travelled amongst them, partaken of their hospitality, and witnessed with emotion the comfort, the intelligence, and the virtue, to be found in every dwelling. We find there citizens from all quarters —Virginia, North Carolina, New York, Pennsylvania, New England; all have their representatives, besides individuals from most of the other States. One of the finest libraries that I saw during my canvass for a seat here, was in a neighborhood of settlers. It is there that I have seen the father becoming the priest of his household, his dwelling his only place of worship; and, with the Bible in the hands of his children, teaching them the evidence of its precepts—offering up in the spirit of devotion his thankgivings to the God of his fathers, and imploring, in Christian humility, the continuance of His blessings!

Sir, the pioneer has not yet performed his office. Do gentlemen desire to know when the settler will cease to press forward? I will tell them. When the labors of a Cushing, a Linn, and a Floyd of Virginia shall be crowned with success, by filling up the great valley of the Oregon with settlers—squatters if you please, of Anglo-Saxon blood—then, and not till then, will the tide of Western emigration cease to overspread the public domain. I could not, however, Mr. SPEAKER, but be reminded, when I heard the remarks of the gentleman from Maine in reference to the people of the West, of the expression of Cæsar, when he saw the dagger of his dearest friend raised against him. Coming, as that gentleman does, from a young and growing State, he cannot be ignorant of the claims of the pioneer to our regard.

I have made these observations for the benefit of those who do not understand the Western people. If gentlemen would travel on this Western road, stop at Wheeling, now a city but lately grown into importance, cross the State of Ohio, and see, on the line of this great thoroughfare, the cities, towns, and villages, the farms, schools, and all the variety of improvements that distinguish the age, they would cease to apply offensive epithets to us, and be proud to become one of us. It has not been my fortune to travel much in the East, having, for thirty-six years, drank the waters of the West; but I have seen very little in the East that will compare, every thing considered, with the State I have the honor in part to represent. In no country have I seen so much equality. We have no population rendered miserable by poverty, nor have we many who have overgrown estates. It may be said of us that there is universal competence, and its never failing concomitant, independence. I have thus, Mr. Speaker, felt myself called on to notice several topics, which have been introduced into this discussion, though not involved in the question before the House. I now proceed to briefly discuss that question. Gentlemen are greatly in error on this subject, when they state that Ohio has received, in the construction of this road, the sum of 6,500,000 dollars.

[Mr. PARRIS here explained that he referred to the three States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and that he was reported incorrectly as referring to Indiana alone.]

Mr. H. resumed. Mr. Speaker, I accept the honorable gentleman's explanation, but it makes the case no better for him. He is still in error. I may, perhaps, speak too positively, but if so, the gentleman can correct me by documentary proof. He can have that opportunity, and may furnish me, while I am addressing this House, with the documents; and I will add, that if he will do so, I will almost promise to vote against the proposition myself. Allowing the gentleman time to furnish the proof sustaining his position, I will not even stop now to state what has been expended, but will reply to that part of the argument of the honorable gentleman which interposes the Constitution as an insurmountable obstacle to the continuance of the Cumberland road. On this subject, however, it surely cannot be expected of me to open up and discuss this great question. It is not for me to attempt to do over again what has been performed by the ablest of our statesmen. This constitutional objection, sir, is a convenient resort, and is always found to be infallible. The doctrine of strict construction has come, at times, from every part of the Union. In 1807, it was a fashionable doctrine in the East, about the time of the embargo. Yes, sir; it was then thought that Congress had power to regulate commerce, which implied its continued existence, and that it was unconstitutional to destroy commerce, as it was said the embargo did. So we have had it from other quarters, at various periods, usually attended with circumstances which rendered the extreme of strict construction expedient, in promoting the interests, for the time being, of the particular section from whence it has been urged. So of the doctrine of consolidation, and of latitudinous construction. That, too, is a convenient doctrine at times, not for any one particular section, but for every section of the country, whose interests may render it necessary to resort to it. Is not our history replete with proof on this subject?

I, sir, in my humble career, have always endeavored to avoid running into extremes. The golden medium of truth is the ground on which I delight to tread. Well, sir, where is this to be found? On the one hand we find consolidationists; on the other, literal constructionists. I turn from these, and consult another able expositor, who has been long engaged in expounding the Constitution. What expositor is that? I answer, It is the practice of the Government from its commencement to this time. Gentlemen may talk to me about constructions of the Constitution, and tell me that if we depart from a limited construction, we endanger the rights of the States, or if we do not give it a liberal construction, we impair the powers of the Government for usefulness; but I leave these contending theorists to the enjoyment of their theories, and content myself with the Constitution as practically expounded by the current and concurrent action of the several co-ordinate branches of the Government. How, I would ask, can the Government be administered, or certainty and stability given to its measures, if mere abstract questions of power are never to be regarded as settled? Is nothing due to time, and experience, and the concurring opinions of those who have gone before us? Sir, the Government cannot be administered upon any other principle. To say that nothing is to be regarded as settled, so far as the mere abstract question of power is concerned, would be to make the action of the Government as variable as the shade, and as uncertain as the winds.

I might doubt the expediency of a measure, and be disposed to change the action or policy of the Government, but that is a very different question. The present is a question of power—of constitutional power—and, upon that question, the practical construction of the Constitution, by the constituted authorities, is enough for me.

How stands the question before the House? Has there been any concurrent action of the different departments of the Government with regard to it? I find that its action has been uniform for thirty-four years. It has been gradually progressing from 1806, down to the present time. More than this, we have had the sanction of Jefferson, that distinguished expositor of the Constitution, to whose opinions many of us are prone to bow, with the most unqualified deference. We have had the sanction of Madison, Monroe, the distinguished individual who succeeded him, now a member of this House, of Jackson, and our present Chief Magistrate. And here, sir, I would remark, in reference to the opinions of the President on this subject, without knowing any thing more than may be known to any other gentleman on this floor, that should a bill be passed, granting an appropriation to the Cumberland road, I have no doubt it would receive his sanction. Why do I say so? Because I look at his acts. He has already sanctioned two bills, and I infer from his past action what we may expect for the future.

But, sir, we have had a resort to authorities on this subject, and as it may gratify gentlemen, I will pay some attention to these authorities.

The veto message of President Monroe is rather brought to our notice than read. In the view the gentleman from Maine has taken of the opinion expressed in that message, I think he has misapprehended the meaning. It was not a simple appropriation of money to be applied to the construction of the Cumberland road that was vetoed by Mr. Monroe. It was a bill establishing toll gates on the road, with certain other provisions that would have given to the United States jurisdiction within the States through which it passed, incompatible with their sovereignty. In returning the bill, Mr. Monroe says: "It is with deep regret, approving as I do of the policy, that I am compelled to object to its passage," &c. He adds: "A power to establish turnpikes with gates and tolls, and to enforce the collection of tolls by penalties, implies a power to adopt and execute a complete system of internal improvement. A right to impose duties to be paid by all persons passing a certain road, and on horses and carriages, as is done by this bill, involves the right to take the land from the proprietor, on a valuation, and to pass laws for the protection of the road from injuries; and if it exist as to one road, it exists as to any other, and to as many roads as Congress may think proper to establish. A right to legislate for one of these purposes, is a right to legislate for the other. It a complete right of jurisdiction and sovereignty for all the purposes of internal improvement, and not merely the right of applying money, under the power vested in Congress to make appropriations, under which power, with the consent of the States through which the road passes, the work was originally commenced, and has been so far executed." Again he says: "For although they (the States) may assert the appropriation of money within their limits," &c. Now, sir, what will the honorable gentleman say? Will he let Mr. Monroe settle this controversy between us?

[Mr. PARRIS here remarked he would go with Mr. Monroe when he was right.]

The gentleman tells us he relies on these authorities when they are right, not when they are wrong. If he possessed that admirable quality, which at all times gives absolute certainty as to the right and the wrong of embarrassing questions, why trouble us; why take up the time of the House in reading the opinions of the great statesmen who have left the stage of action? I, sir, shall take care to cite no authority, which, if admitted, will not prove my position.

Mr. Speaker, the distinguished citizen who has retired to the Hermitage, has been mentioned in the course of this debate, and his opinions have been cited. It is not for me to speak in censure or praise of that extraordinary man. His actions are now in the hands of the historian, and I only refer to him for the benefit of his authority upon this question. In his veto on the Maysville road bill, he cites, evidently with approbation, the opinion of Mr. Monroe, "that Congress have an unlimited power to raise money, and that, in its appropriation, they have a discretionary power, restricted by the duty to appropriate to purposes of common defence and of general, not local, national, not State benefit."

It is thus we see the opinions of our Presidents, to which many more might be added, and the constant action of the Government corresponding to those opinions—the action of the Executive, of Congress, for more than the third of a century, all in our favor, and yet we are now met with the argument that Congress has no power to continue this great national work. Sir, if this is to be regarded as an open question, to what period shall we look for that regular and systematic action, under the Constitution, which shall fix it, implant it deeply in the minds and affections of the people? Sir, to substitute theory for practice, is to be guilty of the folly in the affairs of Government, which would characterize the physician who should throw aside the medicine that had cured its thousands, because it was opposed to some preconceived theory. I say, then, to the ultras on either extreme, that my ground is that whereon the Government itself must rest—its current, practical exposition of the Constitution by its legislative, executive, and judicial action.

But, Mr. Speaker, before I close my remarks, I must ask the indulgence of the House while I pay my respects to several gentlemen on this floor. First, sir, I have some curiosity to go with my friend to Maine—not to fight the British, sir: I have no inclination to war—but to travel thither in imagination to look into the state of the public works. Why is it, I would ask the gentleman, that the United States have made seventy-five or a hundred miles of Macadamized road in Maine?

[Mr. PARRIS explained by saying that was a military road.]

The answer is quite satisfactory, sir; it is a military road, or rather it is called a military road, and that makes it constitutional! A name is sufficient to dispel all the apprehensions of Federal encroachment! Sir, is there a member in the hall that doubts as to the true reason why that gentleman is for this "military road?" Shall we voluntarily surrender our common sense—our experience—with respect to the motives andincentives to human conduct?

[Mr. PARRIS. I never voted for that road; it is a military road leading to the British, not from them.]

We are now told that the gentleman never voted for it. And why, sir? Because the question was never submitted to him. Suppose the difficulties of Maine should involve us in war, and we should hear the calls of that State, like the groans of the Britons in the decline of the Roman power, and the chivalry of Indiana should desire to go to her relief; would we stand in no need of a military road? But one more question, and I will leave that northern region. Suppose the gentleman were here, a member of Congress from the Hoosier State. Would he go for a limited technical construction, and, notwithstanding upwards of thirty years' action of the Government, vote against the Cumberland road? Of the two hundred and forty members composing this body, is there one who doubts what his vote would be? Sir, we all know what it would be. But it may not be uninstructive to look into other portions of the Union. We have harbors constructed at numerous commercial points, and it would gratify me to hear from several gentlemen how it is they prove the constitutionality of these works. Even light-houses might be made a proper subject of examination. One thing, sir, seems a little remarkable; and that is, that local interests seem to have a wonderful effect in neutralizing these constitutional scruples. How is it, then, that these things come about, that gentlemen can vote away millions of treasure on light-houses and harbors, and, for constitutional reasons, not a dollar to the Cumberland road? Is it the salt water that makes it constitutional to make harbors? Then our great inland seas of the North and Northwest, though covered with commerce, cannot be objects of national improvement. Sir, will it be said that the great lakes of Erie and Michigan cannot have harbors constructed by the General Government, when our whole Atlantic coast for thousands of miles is lined with harbors and light-houses?

An honorable gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUBBARD] has urged his arguments with great force, in opposition to this measure; and will he now allow me to call his attention to some interesting facts on this subject? What made it constitutional for the United States to give Alabama 4 or 500,000 acres of land to make a canal round the Muscle Shoals?

[Mr. HUBBARD said he had not voted for that measure, and would be willing now to give the land back to the Government.]

Mr. Speaker, it is not for me to doubt the sincerity of gentlemen, and I hope the gentleman from Alabama may long represent his people on this floor, if he desires it; but I can tell him it will be for some other reason that they will send him here, than for his opinions on this subject.

[Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama here asked Mr. HOWARD if a similar grant of land had not been made to Indiana?]

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly, sir: I am not an objector to these liberal grants to the new States. If I had been here, I should have voted for them, whether for Indiana or Alabama, and I should not now mention them if it were not to show how the locality of a measure may sometimes influence the conduct of gentlemen here. I hope gentlemen will bear with me, and not become restless, when the beneficial action of the General Government in reference to their particular sections, is mentioned. In turning from the Southwest, and glancing over the Southeastern portions of the Union, my attention is attracted by some favored spots in old North Carolina, and, by the way, sir, I cannot but allow my mind's eye to rest, for a moment, on that far-famed country, for which, it is said, so many speeches are made here: Sir, I mean no disrespect to that portion of the district of my honorable friend, [Mr. GRAHAM.] No, sir: it is the country that possesses more charms for me than any, than all others. I have run upon its mountains, and fished in its streams, and mingled with its noble, hospitable, generous-hearted inhabitants. I know them; and if gentlemen will make speeches for Buncombe here, they should prune them of every sordid sentiment, and adorn them with the language of simplicity and truth. But in the eastern region we see, what I would be pleased to bring to the notice of a gentleman from North Carolina, who has occasionally spoken of the Cumberland road, [Mr. STANLY.] When he shall come to discuss this question, I wish him to tell us how it becomes constitutional to give money for the improvement of navigation in a swamp called the Dismal Swamp—how it is so to apply it to the improvement of Tar river, Cape Fear river. Do the gentleman's constitutional scruples accompany him to that region?

[Mr. STANLY. Will the gentleman allow me to answer?]

Mr. H. No, sir; I prefer giving him time for reflection. Now, sir, in all seriousness, look at your line of sea coast, your harbors, lighthouses, rivers, upon which millions upon millions have been expended. Look at your roads, too, in various sections of the country, some finished and others in progress, and tell me what becomes of the argument against the power to prosecute this greatest of all our national works: a thoroughfare which, let politicians talk as they may, and resist it as they will, is destined to be carried to the foot of the Rocky mountains, and through them, if it cannot be constructed over them, and to terminate at some great mart on the Pacific, from whence our trade will be carried on with the WEST INDIES, not Cuba, Jamaica, &c. but the West Indies. We hear the Cumberland road spoken of as a local measure. Sir, it is the commencement not of an Appian or Emilian way, but of a prouder monument—one that is to connect two oceans—that even now embraces "in its ample span" almost half a continent. Yes, sir, oppose it as you please, but American money, American genius, and American enterprise, will carry it forward, and it will be travelled by the Representatives from the States of the Oregon, if the spirits of disorder and disunion shall not rend us asunder, and defeat that destiny which, as a united people, awaits us. It will not be a canal, frozen up in winter, nor a railway, that some Charles Martel, with a single blow, may render unfit for use, but a paved highway, over which our armies may march, our munitions of war be transported from one side of this vast continent to the other. Sir, our children will look with pride upon this work, and boast that it was the work of their fathers. I, sir, would be amongst the last to do violence to the Constitution; but both the instrument and its construction have been given to us by the statesmen who have passed away; and shall we now cease to make it that beneficial instrument, which, for an age, the action of the Government has made it?

There are other strong considerations favorable to the prosecution of this work. I have been in the State of Indiana for ten or eleven years, and travelled the road when I first visited the State. The lands were then taken up. The Hoosiers (and I am proud of the name) had expended, some one hundred, some two hundred dollars, in the purchase of quarter and half-quarter sections, in order to provide themselves with farms upon and near the National road. They all believed, it was on every man's lips, that the United States were to make a great national highway there. It was on the faith of this they bought the public lands at that early day, and poured the proceeds of their hard earnings into the Treasury. They looked to it as a thoroughfare for emigration, for commerce; and hence population has crowded upon it, cities have sprung up along its line, some of ten thousand, some of fifteen thousand inhabitants, on the finished parts of the work. Will you now, sir, check it, and leave the people in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, to charge the Government with bad faith? Sir, the road is worse, in some parts of Indiana, than if there had never been a stroke struck upon it; patches of the graduation completed; a few miles of paving done in the vicinity of three towns; and the rest left worse than when it was in a forest. What will the people say? What will they think of the policy of a Government, of its wisdom, and its faith, if this work shall be abandoned?

It is true, sir, I did tell the people that I thought that Congress would give us an appropriation whenever the subject was mentioned. Why did I do so? Because I thought both Whigs and Democrats would unite in preserving the national faith. I have never regarded it as a party question, and do not now so regard it. It is not to political parties, but to the friends of the road, of all parties, that I look; and to them, as one of the Representatives of the great Northwest, will I feel the profoundest gratitude. I would appeal to the gentlemen from South Carolina, especially to one now in my eye, a native of the same neighborhood with myself, whether they think there is nothing in the just expectations of the Western people on this subject?

It is not long since that State took strong ground in support of their alleged rights. Will they allow us the credit of equal sincerity and equal determination? If they do not, they mistake us. We know our rights, sir, and will maintain them; not by violence, but by continuing to press our claims upon the constituted authorities of the American people. I confess that, if this appropriation fails, the people will be disappointed. They have a right to be; and I appeal, therefore, to gentlemen of all parties, in behalf of what I regard the redemption of a pledge given for the construction of this great work. It is not party feeling that brings us here in regard to this road. In relation to it we have in the Northwest but one party, one interest, one purpose. It gives me pleasure to observe the conduct (and to acknowledge it with gratitude) of many members of both parties. I have seen old Massachusetts, the cradle of the Revolution, coming to our support. Sir, I wish I could see the same union in our favor in the Old Dominion; but in the South I am sorry to find such harmony amongst Whigs and Democrats against us. But, in regard to this measure, I shall never be found troubling myself in examining the journals. It will be sufficient for me that the measure succeeds, and my feelings will be those of gratitude to our friends rather than of censure upon any quarter. Gentlemen may, however, suppose that this is an inconsiderable matter, and that these States are experimenting on this body. Sir, they are mistaken who suppose so. No State, no section, has ever been more determined in the pursuit of its rights, than the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Mr. Speaker, it has been asked whether we were to be bought by this appropriation? Sir, it implies an injurious imputation. It is true we have our price; but it does not consist of political or party considerations, nor is it dollars and cents. It is the price of patriotism; of virtue. But, sir, will it not not be the part of wisdom for the old States to do us justice now? Do you not think we will remember our friends? Look at that map, sir. Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Iowa. Contemplate the progress of empire westward—the millions that are to fill up that vast region, possessing facilities unequalled on the globe. Sir, the sceptre will depart from Judah. Is it not better for you to do us justice than to allow us to redress our own grievances, smarting under the sense of the illiberal, narrow policy of the old States towards us. Do gentleman suppose we will be unmindful of our friends?

Sir, it reminds me of an act of kindness I received from a man in my childhood. I knew him in after life, and whether I saw him in the church, the mixed assembly, or the court-room, I never saw him, without having his conduct to me in my infancy brought fresh to my recollection. So it is with nations; so it will be with us. We will remmeber our friends.

Mr. Speaker, there are other gentlemen who desire to address the House on this subject; and although there are several topics I would be pleased to discuss, I shall leave them to gentlemen more able than myself to do them justice.

SPEECH OF MR. FISHER,

OF NORTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, February 25, 1840—On the resolution offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Tennessee, instructing the Committee of Elections to REPORT forthwith to the House which of the claimants for the five vacant seats from New Jersey have received a majority of the whole number of votes polled in New Jersey at the late election for Representatives to the present Congress; and also to report certain papers, to be printed, &c.

Mr. FISHER said: As the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] declines proceeding with his remarks, I will take up the subject, and submit a few observations. And, in the first place, I must express my surprise at the efforts that are being made here to stave off this question, and evade coming to a decision on it—this, too, at a time when great complaints are heard from every quarter against the tardiness of our movements. In the next place, I must express my utter astonishment that there should be any objection whatever to the committee's reporting the fact who have received the majority of votes, or to the publication of the papers giving information on the subject. Are gentlemen unwilling to receive information? If they are unwilling to receive it for themselves, certainly they ought to suffer it to be spread before the people. If there be any lights before the committee, is it right to lock them up in the committee room—to hide them under a bushel? Why not bring them out, and set them on a hill, that all may see them? I think, sir, it is due to this House itself, to the people of New Jersey, and to the whole American people, that all the information before the committee should be brought out, and made public.

In the first place, it is due to this House itself. Why? This House refuse to permit the FIVE individuals who came here with the Governor's certificates to take the seats. For this decision we have been assailed in the most unqualified terms, and denounced by the Governor of New Jersey as having been guilty of "a monstrous usurpation." Now, sir, the FACTS ought to be made public, that the American people may judge whether this charge be TRUE or FALSE; whether it is this House, or Gov. Pennington and his pliant Privy Council, who have trampled on the Constitution and on the laws, and committed this "monstrous usurpation."

In the next place, it is in an especial manner due to the people of New Jersey that all the facts should be made public, in order that they may see why they have not their full representation on this floor. There are TEN individuals here claiming the five vacant seats, and yet neither set is permitted to occupy them. The people of New Jersey have a right to be informed why this is so. Five of these claimants have come out, and, in advance, charged the whole blame on the majority of this House. In their letter to the Governor of New Jersey, written no doubt for effect, and published every where, they characterize the proceedings of this House as an OUTRAGE—as a disgrace to a representative Government—as a disgrace to the body itself—as the exercise of a "lawless and revolutionary power;" and they charge that the MAJORITY disregard their "oaths to support the Constitution." Now, sir, these are grave charges, and the FACTS should be made public, that it may be seen whether this House be guilty—whether this House has committed perjury and usurpation in exercising a power expressly delegated to it; or whether these five claimants are not the culprits in trying to usurp seats on this floor, when they know they have not received a majority of the votes of the people of New Jersey.

There is yet another reason why nothing should be kept back, but all made public. The majority in the Legislature of New Jersey have taken up this subject, and have passed a series of resolutions, denouncing this House in the most unmeasured terms. They were not content to pass these resolutions, and circulate them in New Jersey, but they have sent them to all the other States in this Union, thereby inviting action on them.

Now, that the Legislatures of these States may be enabled to act understandingly on the subject forced on them by these resolutions, let us give them all the facts we can, lest, like his Excellency of Virginia, they may act on one-sided evidence alone. Perhaps, however, his Excellency may not have stood in need of light on the subject; he may know all about it by intuition. I hope, sir, these will be considered good reasons why the resolution should be adopted by the House in the form in which it has now been presented to us.

Mr. F. continued. It has been decided, sir, by the vote just taken, that it is not in order to quote what has been done in the committee; and yet, without referring to the proceedings of the committee, it is difficult to explain things as they ought to be. Much censure has been thrown on the committee from various quarters, and, for one, I wish that the whole proceeding may be made public; for, whatever may be the result, I feel that my skirts are clear. I do not, however, believe that the journal of the committee will reflect much light on the subject. I have no doubt it will be considered a great literary curiosity; for, in my opinion, it is the most extraordinary journal that ever has been kept since the keeping of journals first began. Sir, did you ever read in ancient fable of an unfortunate wight, who was condemned to roll a huge stone up hill all his life? how, after pushing, and pulling, and tugging, to get it up to the top of the hill, it would slip from his hands and roll down again? If you have, you may form some idea of the labors of the committee. Or, sir, did you ever read in ancient story the history the faithful Penelope, who spent the day in weaving her web, and the night in winding it out again? If so, perhaps you may form some idea of the labors of the committee. The object of Penelope was to gain time—

[Mr. F. was here called to order for referring to the proceedings of the committee; and, after some discussion on the points of order, he was suffered to proceed with his remarks.]

He continued. Sir, it is not my purpose to anticipate the publication of the facts, but I wish to disabuse the public mind on a few points.

No one on this floor, or any where else, has ever pretended that the certificate men received a majority of the votes polled at the late Congressional election in New Jersey. Nor has it been asserted here or elsewhere, that the others did not receive a majority; on the contrary, it has been so admitted. When, therefore, the certificate men came forward and claimed the seats, they did so, not on the ground that they had received a majority of the votes; but on the ground that they had received the Governor's certificate. On the other hand, the other FIVE claimed the seats on the ground that they have received a majority of the votes. The real and undisguised question, then, that was in the first instance presented to the House, and that is now before the House, is this—which set of claimants shall be admitted to seats here? those who have the Governor's certificates without having received a majority of votes, or those who have no certificate, but who have received a majority of votes? I am one of those who will never consent that the voice of the people shall be set aside by a Governor or by any one else. Judging from circumstances, it would seem that the five certificate men themselves did not believe altogether in the certificates—for, either through the want of faith in their certificates, or with some other view, they went to work last fall in hunting up illegal votes; and behold they lay before this House a list of 243 votes, which they say are illegal. This list of votes reputed to be illegal, has been extensively published throughout the country as a sort of set off to the majority admitted to have been received at the hands of their opponents; and it has been done, too, in such a manner as to make many believe that two hundred and forty-three illegal votes have actually been discovered. Now, sir, what is the fact? Why, they cannot shew, by duly authenticated papers, even one dozen of bad votes; their own competent papers show less than twelve illegal votes.

[Mr. F. was here again called to order for referring to papers in the committee, and, after some discussion on the point of order, the Speaker decided that he had a right to refer to papers that had been read in this House, though not now in possession of the House. From this decision, an appeal was taken, and the ayes and noes called for. The Speaker was sustained in his decision by the House, and Mr. F. was then permitted to go on.]

Mr. F. then proceeded to say; I wish, sir, to set the public mind right on another point. By turning to the list headed illegal votes, it will be seen that it is there charged that eight Whig votes were taken out of the box at Saddle river township, and eight Democratic votes were put in, and, of course, afterwards counted—thus making a difference of sixteen votes. Now, sir, what I wish to say is, that this charge has not been proven.

[He was then again called to order for alluding to papers not before the House, and, after a considerable interruption, was again permitted to proceed.]

As, sir, I cannot be permitted to refer directly to the papers, I must either stop altogether or do so indirectly. I will, however, first make a prediction or two. I will then predict, whenever the House examines the papers on this charge, they will find it wholly unsupported by proof as yet laid before the committee. The judges and inspectors of the polls held at Saddle river, are reported to be men of as fair character as any in the State of New Jersey. When this charge was first made, they not only gave it a flat denial, but they said if the charge was true, it was an indictable offence, and should be taken notice of by the law. They challenged their accusers to go before the grand jury, and have it investigated. They have not done so, nor have they made good the charge before any other tribunal whatever. Why have they not? It must be because they cannot; for, if they could, we have every reason to believe they would. And yet, sir, this Saddle river affair has been held up, here and elsewhere, as an established fact, that the ballot box was robbed.

But, sir, let us examine the grounds on which this Governor took on himself the right to set aside the will of the people, and to give the certificates to those who were rejected by the people. Where did he receive this power? Not from the Constitution of the United States, for that gives no such power to him, or to any body else; nor did he receive it from the laws of New Jersey, for the laws of New Jersey expressly requires that the Governor and Privy Council shall ascertain "who have received the greatest number of votes from the whole State," and commission them accordingly. Where, then, did he get the power and right to throw away all the votes polled at South Amboy and Millville, which gave a clear majority of 458 in favor of the Democratic candidates? When all the facts are brought to light, it will be found that this Governor, who charged this House with "a monstrous usurpation," has himself trampled on all law, and committed a daring outrage on the rights of the people. In justification of his conduct, it is put forth every where, that the returns from South Amboy were not made in time by the judge and inspectors of the polls to the clerk of the county, whose business it was to send them up to the Governor. The fact is otherwise. The returns from South Amboy were delivered to the clerk a whole day before the time expired; but this clerk, without any authority of law whatever, undertook to set himself up as judge, and actually rejected the votes, on pretence that they were not "returned pursuant to law," and refused to insert them in the list sent by him to the Governor. Nevertheless, a full statement of these votes was made out, certified by the judge and inspectors, and delivered to the Governor in due time, but he and his Privy Council rejected them because they did not come to him through the clerk; and in this way the people were deprived of their sacred rights by the doings of the clerk on the one hand, and a partisan Governor on the other. And here, let it be remembered, that, at the time of this transaction, not a word was said about illegal votes. Neither the clerk, nor the Governor, pretended to allege that the polls of South Amboy were thrown aside on account of illegal votes. No: the excuse of the clerk was, that the returns were not made "pursuant to law;" and the excuse of the Governor was, that they did not come to him through the clerk. The allegation of bad votes was altogether an after affair, and, without a doubt, got up to turn public attention off from the conduct of the Governor and the two clerks.

As to the returns of Millville, there it is true that the returns were not made to the clerk by 5 o'clock on Saturday evening, as required by the law of New Jersey, but they were made between 10 and 11 o'clock that night. Was this, however, a good reason for rejecting the votes of the freemen of New Jersey? If the returning officer fell four or five hours behind his time, are the people to be punished for his neglect? If he violated the law, punish him; but do not disfranchise freemen for his latches. Who before this ever heard of an instance where the people lost their votes, after having given them in according to law, merely because the returning officer did not do his duty? In New Jersey, at least, such a thing was never before heard of: there the practice has always been the other way. It is a remarkable fact, that in the year 1832, a case occurred in this very township of Millville precisely in point. In that year, the returning officers of the polls at Millville failed to deliver the returns to the clerk until 12 o'clock at night, whereas they ought to have been delivered by 5 o'clock. The clerk sent on his returns to the Governor, omitting the votes of Millville, because he did not receive them by 5 o'clock. He, however, soon after made out a certificate of the facts, and sent it up. The Governor and Privy Council received the votes, and counted them, and, what is more, these votes then turned the scale in the election, as the votes of the same place now do. This, too, was done by a Whig Governor, (Southard,) and by a Whig Council. But this is not all. At this same election of 1838, a contested election took place in the county of Cumberland, in which Millville is situated, and the irregularity of this return from Millville came before the present Legislature of New Jersey. The matter was referred to a committee, a majority of which was composed of Whigs. The majority and the minority both made reports. The Whigs, in their report, declare, "they will not suppose that the voice of the people, fairly expressed at the ballot box, if ascertainable, will be disregarded merely for the reason that the duty of making the certificate of election has been negligently, ignorantly, or even fraudulently performed, or omitted, by any of the officers upon whom that duty is imposed." Now is it not strange that these same Whigs of the Legislature of New Jersey, in the course of a few months, after adopting these just principles, should change about and denounce this House for acting on them? It only shows that party ambition is stronger with them than either a sense of consistency or the feelings of patriotism.

[Mr. F. was here interrupted for referring to the action of the committee.]

Mr. F. said I am very desirous to pursue this subject still farther, but it must be apparent to all, from the various interruptions I have received, the calls to order, and the questions of order, that it it will be next to impossible to do so. The moment I refer to a paper now before the committee, I am called to order. The moment I take up a pamphlet to read, a question of order is raised, and rather than proceed amidst this constant interruption, I will abandon this part of the subject for the present, and turn to another where I anticipate no interruptions.

Mr. F. continued, on the constitutional question of certificate and seal. I will now, sir, proceed to take, rapid notice of the argument, which on a former occasion was so much relied on in this case. I mean the great platform argument, on which all the speechs from one side of this House have been built. Without claiming to possess any constitutional learning, I will endeavor to test this argument by the rules of common sense, and plain reasoning. And that I may not do injustice to this famous argument, I will endeavor to state it in the very words of those who have advanced it here; from the very able and distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] to the humbler orators in this debate.

"That this House cannot go beyond the certificates of the Governor to inquire who are entitled to the seats; but that we must take the certificates in the first instance, as conclusive evidence that they who hold them, are entitled to the seats." Or, in other words, "that whoever presents himself here with the certificate of election, is thereby entitled to his seat on this floor."

Now, sir, to test this proposition, we must, in the first place, see what powers the Constitution gives to the House on this subject. The words of tee Constitution are as follows: "Each house shall be the JUDGE of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." (Article 1, section 3.) "Shall be the JUDGE!" But if it be true that we cannot go beyond the certificate, to examine evidence, but must receive it as full and conclusive evidence that they who hold it are entitled to their seats, then it follows most clearly that the House is not the JUDGE. It is not the judge, because it can exercise no discretionary power whatever—it has no choice—it cannot look into facts, or law; but it is wholly passive, without the power to choose or reject. To JUDGE, implies the power to examine testimony—to hear both sides—to make up a judgment—and to decide according to evidence; but if it be true that we cannot look behind the certificate, then the House cannot examine either facts or law, and consequently cannot judge. Thus, by the argument of gentlemen, the Constitution is nullified, and this House is made a mere passive creature, without a single attribute of a judge.

But this is not all; for this argument of gentlemen not only makes a dead letter of the Constitution, which constitutes this House the judge: it goes farther, and makes the maker of the certificate sole and exclusive judge of all elections to Congress. In the present case it makes Governor Pennington sole and exclusive judge. Now let us see if this be not the consequence.

It will be admitted by all, that before Governor Pennington made out his CERTIFICATES, he had before him all the returns, including those from South Amboy and Millville, which, taken together, gave a decided majority to the Democratic candidates. It will be also admitted, that, with these papers before him, he had the power to decide in favor of either party. He did decide in favor of his political friends—the Whig candidates—and gave them his certificates. Now if it be true that we cannot go beyond this certificate, then, in admitting these five men to seats here, we do so, not because they have received a majority of votes in New Jersey, but because they have received the Governor's certificate; and thus, to all intents and purposes, you constitute the maker of the certificate sole JUDGE in the case. But, to make this conclusion more palpable, let us pursue it a little farther. Suppose Governor Pennington, with the papers before him, had given his certificates to the other five, as we contend he ought to have done, they having received a majority of the votes, then, according to the doctrine of gentlemen, the other five would have been the members. Why so? Not because they had received the majority of the votes, but because they held the certificate, thus making Governor Pennington not only sole judge, but likewise sole elector! He had the power to give his certificate to either party; and whoever holds his certificate, are to be hailed here as the true members. Now, sir, do you think that the Constitution ever meant to give to the Governor of a State a paramount power over the votes of the people of that State? a power to set aside the votes of the majority, and substitute his own will in their stead?

But, sir, let us examine this matter yet a little farther. Suppose this wonderful Governor, by way of showing what the great seal in his hands could do, had put aside both sets of candidates, and had given his certificates to five of his Privy Council; these five, with certificates in hand, had come on here, and taken seats, and, at the same time, the other claimants had come on, and made known to you the whole fraud—you understand it fully, and believe it all—yet, according to the argument of gentlemen, you can take no notice of it, but you are bound to receive these spurious member, place them in seats, act and vote with them, and do all this merely because they hold the Governor's certificate under the great seal of the State! There is no end to the absurdities into which this doctrine, that you cannot go behind the certificate, will involve us; and, gentlemen seeing this, have endeavored to extricate themselves by attaching some qualifications to it. Let us examine these.

They say, that although you cannot be beyond the certificate in the first instance, but must admit the holders of it to take seats and exercise all the rights of members; yet, after they have taken seats, and become invested with membership, then, and not till then, you may take up the case, look beyond the certificate, examine and judge, turn out the certificate men, and put in the others. Now, let us look at this view of the subject. If this argument be true, then it must stand upon two propositions, which it necessarily presupposes; but if these two propositions are false, then the argument itself must be false, for it rests on them alone.

The first of these propositions is this: that the House has more power after the certificate men take their seats than it had before; that is, that the House acquires power from the circumstance of the certificate men taking seats; for it is evident if the House can declare that the certificate men are not entitled to seats after we admit them, which we could not do before admitting them, then, of course, the House has gained power by the fact of their admission, since it can do, after they are admitted, what it could not do before. Now I deny that the House acquires any power by the circumstance of the certificate men taking their seats, and I disprove it by a direct appeal to the Constitution itself.

I disprove it in this way. We meet here under a written Constitution; we derive our existence and all our powers from it, and from no other source whatever. These powers, thus derived, are expressly laid down in the Constitution, and cannot be increased or diminished by any law, custom, or usage whatever; for this plain reason, that whatever modifies, that is, increases or lessens the powers derived from the Constitution, must be greater than the Constitution, and may entirely change or destroy it. But as there is no power greater than the Constitution, except the States in convention, then it is clear if this House acquires power by the fact referred to, it must be so in consequence of something expressed or implied in the Constitution. Now I challenge gentlemen to show any thing of the sort in the Constitution. If they cannot show it, then it will be because it is not there; and if not there, their assumption is false, and falls to the ground.

The second proposition that gentlemen must show to be true before their argument can stand, is this: That a man may be a legitimate member of this House before he takes a seat, who is not so after he takes it; or, in other words, that to-day you are bound to admit him because he is a legitimate member, and to-morrow you are bound to turn him out because he is not a legitimate member. This proposition is not only necessarily presupposed by the argument of gentlemen, but it has been expressly laid down by several speakers. The gentleman from New York, who is reputed to be an able lawyer, actually asserted it as a sort of political axiom, in his speech delivered on the New Jersey case several weeks ago. He then said:

"Whatever eventually may be the result, the certificate in the first instance, and for the time being, fully and absolutely invests him who holds it with the right of membership."

Now let us see if this proposition will bear the test.

WHO makes members of Congress? By the Constitution, the PEOPLE of the several States choose their members of Congress. Whoever receives a majority of the qualified votes given according to the rules of law, thereby becomes the member. Mark it—it is not the certificate of the Governor, but the votes of the people, that make members.

Whenever, therefore, a man presents himself here, either with or without a certificate, this may be said of him as true—that he is either a member or he is not a member. He cannot be a member and not a member at the same time; he must be one or the other. If he is a member, then all admit that the House cannot rightfully divest him of his membership. If he is not a member, then it is equally clear that the House cannot make him one. The House cannot add to, or take away, in the smallest degree, the rights of membership, for, to say that it can do so, would be to say that it can modify the powers given by the Constitution, and consequently must be greater than the Constitution, and may change or destroy it at will. Now apply this argument to the five certificate men from New Jersey: they are either members or they are not. If they are members, they were made so by the votes of the people; but suppose they were not made so by the votes of the people—then by what authority is it that you admit them as members? Why, according to the argument of gentlemen, by authority of the Governor's certificate. Thus, then, it follows that the Governor's certificate empowers you to do what the Constitution gives you no right to do—to make members of Congress; and consequently, the certificate is greater than the Constitution; and thus, you see, the whole argument so much relied on by gentlemen, runs itself into a political absurdity, and falls to the ground with the false prop that held it up.

The sum of the whole matter is this: If this famous argument so much relied on be true, then the Constitution is a dead letter; but, as the Constitution is in force, and paramount to these potential certificates, then the argument itself is a political absurdity.

Mr. F. continued. I will take this occasion briefly to notice another most extraordinary argument that has been gravely advanced on this floor, and that has been seized on and acted on by the Governor of New Jersey and his party in the Legislature. The argument is this: "That the Congress of the United States is made up of members from the twenty-six States; that if any State is not represented here, it cannot be a Congress, and, of course, cannot do business. But you have excluded the certificate men from New Jersey, ergo, you have no Congress, and can do no business." This is certainly a new argument, and the distinguished gentlemen from Massachusetts and Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS and Mr. SERGEANT] are entitled to the honor of first discovery.

If this argument be true, then the 5th section of the 1st article of the Constitution must be inoperative; for if either House, by exercising the power there granted, excludes a single member from either body, such exclusion dissolves Congress, and renders all its acts unconstitutional. According to this new argument, there can be no Congress unless every State is fully represented. If this be not the meaning, then the argument does not apply to New Jersey, since New Jersey has now one representative on this floor, and two in the Senate; and, if it applies to New Jersey, then it must equally apply to every other State.

Now, let us look at the absurdities into which this construction of the Constitution will involve us.

Several States in this Union have but a single Representative in this House. Now, if, on any account whatever, either of these Representatives should be excluded from this House, then such exclusion acts as a dissolution of Congress, and all that is done must necessarily be unconstitutional.

But it is even worse than this; for, if you exclude even a single one of the forty members of New York, the same result takes place. If this doctrine be true, then I doubt whether there ever has been a real constitutional Congress since the Constitution was adopted; for I doubt whether there ever has been a session when every State in the Union was fully represented.

If this argument be true, then that section of the constitution which says—"a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business"—means just nothing at all. If this doctrine be true, then it is in the power of any member to dissolve Congress at his will and pleasure. He has nothing to do but resign his seat, put on his hat, walk out, and Congress is at an end. Will it be contended that our wise ancestors in framing the Constitution, ever meant such a thing as this? It is absurd to suppose it. And yet, let it be known, that this famous Governor of New Jersey and his pliant majority in the Legislature, with the desperation of drowning men, have caught at this floating straw, and set it forth in solemn resolutions, and sent them to all the States in this Union inviting action on them; not only so, but sent them to you, and to this House, in a way and manner, insulting to both. But, sir, this is not the first time this game was played off in this country. We read, that during the Revolutionary war, one of the British commanders attempted the same thing with General Washington. In following the example of Washington you did well, sir. He returned the package to the British officer. You returned the paper to Governor Pennington. There let it rest with the argument that brought it forth.

Mr. F. in continuing his remarks, said, there is one other subject connected with this question on which I wish to make a few remarks. All of us who have refused to let the certificate men take their seats, have been charged with violating State rights. Now, sir, I am a States rights man, and repel the charge as wholly unfounded—particularly as coming from those who never, until now, showed any zeal for State rights. What are State rights? I will tell you: the Federal Government is a Government of delegated powers, that is, it has no power, but what are given to it in the Constitution. All powers not given to it by the Constitution, are expressly reserved to the States, and the people. See the 10th article of the amendments. These reserved powers are the State rights. The only way, then, in which this House, or this Government can encroach on State rights, is to assume and exercise powers not grated in the Constitution. Now, did this House assume an undelegated power in taking cognizance of this case, and excluding the certificate men from this floor? Certainly not, if there be any meaning in the words of the Constitution, "Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business" From this it is perfectly clear, that in acting on this question, so far from assuming a doubtful power, we were only doing what the Constitution made it our especial duty to do, and what no other tribunal has a right to do. How, then, have we invaded State rights? So far from trespassing on State rights, this House, on the present occasion, has defend State rights and the rights of the people of New Jersey, from one of the boldest assaults upon them, that ever has been perpetrated in this Republic; an assault, which, if crowned with success, will soon prostrate the sacred rights of the elective franchise in the dust, and leave them to be trampled on by every petty partisan Governor who may happen to have in his keeping the great seal of a State.

Mr. F. said there were various other extraordinary arguments resorted to on a former occasion to justify the conduct of the Governor of New Jersey, which it would be out of time now to consider. Indeed he would not now have taken up the constitutional question at all, but for two considerations: the first was, that on a former occasion he was cut off by the previous question from saying a word on that question; and the next was, that on this occasion, he was prevented by constant interruptions, from pursuing the course of remarks he intended when he took the floor.

REMARKS OF MR. WELLER, OF OHIO.

In the House of Representativ, Wednesday, February 26, 1840—On the New Jersey question.

Mr. WELLER said, it seemed to him that the question now beforce the House had already been fully discussed; and that every member upon that floor was prepared to vote understandingly in this matter; that gentlemen had been permitted, in the discussion of this resolution, to travel over the whole merits of the New Jersey election. He said, it struck him that this was not the proper time to enter into such a discussion. He thought it ought to be postponed until the committee, to whom the papers had been referred, submitted their report. When the House was called upon to decide upon the claims of these gentlemen, then the proper time had come for discussing the merits of the election. A committee had been appointed to report to us the facts, and he did think the discussion improper until that committee reported.

He did hope, when the papers connected with the claims of these gentlemen were submitted to the committee, that a report would be made at an early day, in order that the State of New Jersey might have her full representation upon that floor. That State, said he, under the Constitution, is entitled to six members. She has but one in his seat. Why is this? Gentlemen in the Opposition have told us it was because a majority of this House had violated the Constitution, and trampled upon the rights of a sovereign State! Yes, sir, said Mr. W. the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] has denounced with unusual violence the party to which I belong, because they would not suffer the Governor of New Jersey to manufacture Representatives for them. Sir, said Mr. W. I have never before listened to such miserable slang as fell from the lips of the gentleman from Connecticut—such contemptible stuff.

[The SPEAKER here called Mr. W. to order.]

Mr. W. said he had no disposition to violate any of the rules of that House; but when he, and those with whom he acted politically, were charged with having violated that Constitution, which they had solemnly sworn, in the presence of that House, and before their God, to support, he must be permitted to say a few words in his and their defence.

[Mr. CRABB insisted that, inasmuch as Mr. WELLER had been called to order, he should object to his proceeding, unless he would pledge himself not to demand the previous question.]

Mr. W. said the gentleman from Alabama had no right to say whether he should proceed or not. Nor could he recognise his right to prescribe to him the conditions upon which he should address the House. It is, said he, for the House to say whether he should proceed, and to their decision he would cheerfully submit.

[The SPEAKER then put the question to the House, whether Mr. W. should be permitted to go on, and leave was given.]

Mr. W. then said the gentleman from Connecticut had occupied three hours in denouncing those who differed with him in opinion on this subject. His whole speech from the beginning to the end was insulting to those who had refused to give the seats to the members holding the Governor's certificate. Sir, (said Mr. W.) it had been charged time and again, on this floor, that we have violated the Constitution for party purposes! It is, said he, a base slander upon the Democratic party, no matter by whom uttered. If gentlemen supposed he was to fold his arms, and sit quietly in his seat, and hear these unfounded declarations, they were mistaken. He, for one, intended, upon all occasions, to defend himself, and his principles. Satisfied of the correctness of the cause he had pursued, he should not shrink from the responsibility of his acts, and when gentlemen saw proper to denounce him for discharging what he conceived to be his duty, they must not expect him to sit quietly under their abuse.

So far from violating the Constitution, said Mr. W. we had been endeavoring to preserve it in its purity. That Constitution, said he, declares that the people shall elect their Representatives. His efforts, and the efforts of those with whom he was associated, had been directed to the securing of this right to the people of New Jersey. It has been admitted, said he, repeatedly admitted, that those gentlemen who hold the certificates of the Governor had not received a majority of the votes. Am I then, sir, said Mr. W. to be charged with violating the Constitution of my country when I refuse them seats in this hall? Shall I be told that I am trampling upon the rights of a sovereign State when I decline permitting men to legislate who have been rejected by the people? If, sir, said he, in maintaining the right of the people to elect their own Representatives, I am violating the Constitution, then I stand convicted before the country.

I ask again, said Mr. W. why New Jersey has but one Representative on this floor? A proposition is now before us requiring the committee to report their proceedings, in order that we may be enabled to give her a full representation here. This proposition is violently opposed by gentlemen on the Whig side of the House. Who, then, are disfranchising the State of New Jersey? Who are the men who are depriving her of her representation? Efforts have been made, said Mr. W. both here and elsewhere, to prejudice the public mind against the course pursued by the Democratic party on this question; but the facts would ere long be spread before the people, and this base imposition would be exposed. He had no fears about the result.

Mr. W. said he always felt disposed to extend proper courtesy and respect to the Governor of a State, and to his official acts; but when that Governor invades the rights of the people, and assumes to himself powers not delegated to him by the Constitution, he would speak of him in the language his conduct merited. Yes, sir, said Mr. W. and when he attempts to silence the voice of a free and independent people, as expressed through the ballot box, he must be permitted to call him a bold usurper. This high-handed outrage, said Mr. W. upon the elective franchise, should excite the indignation of every honest man in the county. If, said he, the people of New Jersey tamely submit to such an outrage, they have lost the spirit and patriotism that characterized their fathers in the days of the Revolution; they have become the subservient slaves of a petty tyrant, and are no longer entitled to the appellation of freemen.

The party with which I act, said Mr. W. are anxious to give the seats to those who have received a majority of the votes of the people, and if to do this was a violation of the Constitution, then they were indeed guilty. But, said he, I have already detained the House too long. My object in rising was simply to demand the previous question, but as I have permitted my feelings to lead me to make some remarks on the conduct of the Opposition, I do not feel at liberty to do so. Having, said he, no disposition to take the advantage of any gentleman, he must, notwithstanding he had risen solely for that purpose, decline moving the previous question.

SPEECH OF MR. HUBBARD, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

In Senate, Tuesday, February 18, 1840—On Mr. GRUNDY's report in relation to the assumption of the debts of the States by the Federal Government.

Mr. HUBBARD addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I regret that the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. PHELPS,] who was entitled to the floor, is not in his place. I did not myself expect to address the Senate this morning. It was my belief that the honorable Senator to whom I have referred, would have favored us with his views upon this subject, and I should have been much gratified to have heard him. As it is, although I regret the absence and the cause of the absence of Senator, I will not ask the Senate to stay the progress of the debate, but will at once proceed to present my own views, ill prepared as I am.

What are the resolutions which the select committee have presented to the Senate? And what is the substitute for those resolutions, which had been offered by the Senator from Kentucky? I will read them, and place them in connection with the remarks I shall make, that the people of my own State, who may feel any desire to read my speech, may understand the whole subject-matter.

1. Resolved, That the assumption, directly or indirectly, by the General Government, of the debts which have been, or may be, contracted by the States for local objects or State purposes, would be unjust, both to the States and to the people.

2. Resolved, That that such assumption would be highly inexpedient, and dangerous to the union of the States.

3. Resolved, That such assumption would be wholly unauthorized by, and in violation of, the Constitution of the United States, and utterly repugnant to all the objects and purposes for which the Federal Union was formed.

4. Resolved, That to set apart the public lands, or the revenues arising therefrom, for the beforementioned purposes, would be equally unjust, inexpedient and unconstitutional.

These are the resolutions proposed by the committee. The Senator from Kentucky offers the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That the debts of the several States, so far as they are known to the Senate, have been contracted in the exercise of the undoubted right and constitutional power of said States, respectively; and that there is no ground to warrant any doubt of the ability or disposition of those States to fulfil their contracts.

Resolved, That it would be just and proper to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States in fair and ratable proportions; and that the condition of the States as have contracted debts is such, at the present moment of pressure and difficulty, as to render such distribution especially expedient and important.

It is true that other propositions have been submitted; but in my judgment, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania to the resolutions reported from the committee, and the amendment to that amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, seemed to me wholly uncalled for, having no connection with the subject discussed by the committee. I admit, sir, that it has been repeatedly said that the report was a direct assault upon the credit of the States. This I deny. I cannot suppose that the Senator from Pennsylvania had any such impression; and I cannot well conceive why he has proposed an amendment so foreign from the subject-matter of the committee's report. It was the propriety of an assumption of the State debts which the committee had considered, and not the ability of the States to respond. There is not to be found within the range of the report, a single line, nor a single word, indicating the slightest distrust in the honor, integrity, or ability of the States; and yet it is proposed to amend the resolutions of the committee by incorporating a direct proposition of our full belief in the entire and undoubted responsibility of the States to meet their liabilities, and of their clear and constitutional power to incur such liabilities. I regret that the amendment has been offered; and, as at present advised, I cannot give to the proposition my support. I will not say that I shall vote against it, or against the proposition of the Senator from Michigan. One thing I will say, that I shall reluctantly pass upon either proposition. In a former speech, I expressed my full belief in the honor and responsibility of the State Governments and the implicit confidence which, in my judgment, should be reposed in their plighted faith. I did this in answer to the reiterated, but groundless, declaration, that the report of the committee was a direct attack upon their credit.

Mr. President, if my neighbor calls upon me and asks, as a favor, that I would endorse his paper, I reply no, I cannot do that, but I will give you a letter of credit; I will certify to the world that you had contracted your debt in the exercise of the soundest discretion, and in the prosecution of your lawful business, and that there is no ground to warrant any doubt of your ability, or of your disposition, to fulfil your contracts. My neighbor should go forth with this letter of credit in his hand, adding liability to liability, entering into new projects and incurring new debts. At last misfortune overtakes him; he becomes embarrassed; his contracts are not fulfilled; and the holder of this paper comes to me and says, I ask indemnity at your hands. Is there a court of equity in Christendom that would not make me answerable, if I had given such a general letter of credit with a full knowledge of the fact that his preinvestments had been made in the prosecution of the most unpromising and unproductive enterprises?

Mr. President, I would not say aught against the credit of the States. I do not feel myself called upon to endorse that credit. It is matter foreign to our subject, and I will merely add that, with a less guarded legislative proceeding on a former occasion, the Federal Government considered itself bound, in equity, to provide for the Holland debt which was then oppressing the District of Columbia. It was done. I will not, sir, give my sanction to any proposition which can, by the ingenuity of man, be construed into an obligation, on the part of this Government, at any future time, or under any peculiar circumstances, to assume the liabilities of the States. I would, therefore, avoid action. I would avoid the direct expression of the sense of the Senate upon the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, or even upon the amendment to that amendment as proposed by the Senator from Michigan. I regard them equally without the pale of our jurisdiction; as having nothing to do with the report or resolutions of the committee; and, in truth, as a most gratuitous interference, on the part of the Senate, with a most delicate matter—that of State credit.

The resolutions just read, taken together, present two very distinct questions for the consideration of the Senate.

The first is, Would it be just, expedient, or constitutional, for the Federal Government to assume the entire debt of the States?

The second is, Would it be just, expedient, or constitutional, for Congress, by law, to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States, upon some given rate, either for the purpose of relieving them from their present indebtedness, (at this period of unlooked for pressure,) or for any other purpose?

These two propositions seemed to be necessarily involved in the resolutions now before the Senate. It is my design, in my way, and according to the lights I possess, and according to the suggestions of my best judgment, to discuss each of these propositions. I feel myself called upon to do this, after the stand the Legislature of my own State has taken upon this subject, and after the instructions she has sent up here for our guidance upon these momentous questions—which resolutions I intend to submit to the Senate before I close my remarks.

The great burden of the song of the Opposition from the beginning, has been that this whole proceeding is gratuitous, uncalled for by any one State of the Confederacy—that it is a dangerous and unjustifiable assault upon State responsibility—that this is the most unpropitious period for the discussion of these momentous questions—that the whole movement looked and seemed to be designed as an attack upon the debtor States. Let us see what foundation there is for these objections.

How came this subject here? It is true that no debtor State has directly asked in the suppliant language of petition for aid in her existing embarrassment. No State has come up here with a memorial for relief. But is there no other mode except upon petition, to act upon these great constitutional questions—questions involving the power as well as the justice of the Federal Government? Is it not one of those abstract propositions which should be entertained, discussed, fully considered and determined, uninfluenced by any memorial from any sovereign State or corporation? The action of the Senate should be free. The action will now be controlled by the great principles upon which rests this Government. This, then, is the appropriate time for action. The public mind has already been addressed upon this subject; not only by those who regard it as a matter of interest for the Government to come in aid of the States, but also through the public journals, by the communication of Executives to their State Legislatures. It cannot, for a moment, be denied, that this very question was engaging the public attention before the meeting of Congress, and it thus became our bounden duty, on coming together, promptly to meet and decide the question.

I have, Mr. President, made an extract from one of the leading political journals of the country, which I propose to read to the Senate; and I well recollect that about the time of the publication of this article, I saw published in other newspapers substantially the same opinions.

[Here Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said: Will the Senator from New Hampshire give the names of the papers to which he refers?]

I will answer the Senator, by assuring him that I will give the name of the paper from which I have made the selected extract. But as to the other papers, from which I do not purpose to read extracts in the course of my remarks, I will give to the Senator their names according to my recollection, at any private interview without the walls of this chamber.

The following is from the National Intelligencer of the 28th of October last:

"Among the bitterest fruits of the derangements of our money matters, is the distrust of ultimate ability on the part of the debtors to pay their responsibilities. This distrust has reached our State engagements, and the bonds of some of them are down to a very low price. I have heard divers insinuations against their payment, for divers reasons; but my own opinion is, that if the ways and means for discharging them were provided, they would stand as firm, perhaps more so, than any other securities. Most of these bonds have been appropriated for objects of internal improvements. Would it not be a wise provision if Congress were to set aside certain amounts of the public lands for their ultimate redemption?"

This, it is true, purports to be in the character of a communication. But it is the frank expression of an opinion truly alarming to the peace and perpetuity of our institutions, and that is put forth in the form of an inquiry. Speaking of the State debts, the writer remarks: "Would it not be a wise provision if Congress were to set aside certain amounts of the public lands, for their ultimate redemption?"

The ultimate redemption of what? The State debts. To set apart the revenues to relieve the States from their indebtedness. The writer of this article could not for a moment suppose that the annual proceeds of the sales of the public lands would ever extinguish State liabilities. They would not make a tithe towards meeting even the interest of the State debts. Nor is that the proposition of the writer. His suggestion is too plain to be misunderstood; and it is for a direct assumption of the entire debt of the States. It proposes to set apart certain amounts of the public land for their full and complete redemption. It is artfully drawn, but its meaning cannot be mistaken. It is to look into the Treasury, to count up the millions which have there been received from the sales of the public lands—to set aside their amount to redeem the State debts—and, if that should be found insufficient, to pledge the future proceeds of the sales of the lands, until the object shall be fully accomplished.

Similar views, according to my recollection, were circulated over the country, through the agency of the press. They had found their way into other public journals. And I beg the Senate to bear in mind that, from the plain reading of this paragraph, it is a proposition for an assumption—an entire assumption, a complete assumption—of the State debts; and it suggests the means for their final liquidation and payment.

But this is not all. To such an extent had the public attention been drawn to this subject, that the Governor of New York himself refers to it in his annual message to the General Assembly of that State.

Upon this self-same subject I have made an extract from the message of another Chief Magistrate to his Legislature, and it most clearly shows that the subject of assumption was agitating the public mind in various sections of the Union; that it was matter of debate whether the entire debt of the States should be transferred to the General Government. The message from which I propose to read an extract, could not have been induced by any action of this body. It was induced solely from a knowledge of an opinion, pervading, to some extent, our common country. The Governor says:

"The project now afloat of funding the State debts, and for their assumption by the Federal Government, cannot, and should never be adopted. Congress has no right to take money from the Federal Treasury for such purposes; and, if attempted, the effort must shake the Union to its centre. But even if successful in its adoption, the policy would be fatal to the independent character of the States. A precedent would be established, by which extravagant expenditures would be stimulated with the States, reducing them to the condition of mere stipendiaries on the favor of the Federal Government, increasing and encouraging their indebtedness to foreign powers, and ultimately making us, while we boast of our freedom, a nation of slaves."

Such sentiments are well worthy the source from which they emanated—sentiments evincing that love of liberty, that spirit of independence, which I hope never to see restrained in any one of the sovereign States of this Confederacy.

The time had come when, from an imperious sense of public duty, Congress was bound to act upon this subject; and we should not be deterred from doing that duty because no State has asked relief at our hands. We should rather be stimulated by that very fact to more prompt action in the performance of our public trust. But while this objection is sounded in our ears at every turn—while it is urged at every point—may I not be permitted to ask the Senator from Kentucky by what authority he has offered his second resolution? Has he the authority of any State to declare her indebtedness, and her pressing embarrassment? Has he the authority of any State to declare that, at this hour of distress and dismay, a distribution of any portion of the public revenue would not only be "expedient, but important." Has any State, corporation, or individual, asked the action of Congress in the way and manner, and for the reasons, suggested by the Senator from Kentucky. No, sir. The Senator has submitted his propositions upon his own responsibility.

The Select Committee have presented their report for the consideration of the Senate, upon their own responsibility. The very course of this debate cannot fail to remind us of the importance and necessity of definite and immediate action. The opinions promulgated by the money lenders in England; the opinions abroad in our own land; the resolutions before the Senate; all combine to remind us of the propriety and necessity of immediate action.

I am perfectly aware of the course which the debate has already taken. The connection between the subject before us and the currency of the country, has been most ably discussed by the Senator from Ohio. I am not disposed to take ground which has been pre-occupied. I know, also, full well, that the resolutions of the committee are fully justified by the report of the chairman, and that I can offer nothing which could more fully illustrate the positions taken by the committee; but coming as I do from a State free from, and wholly unembarrassed by, any existing pecuniary liability, I should be recreant in my duty to her, were I to keep silent on this occasion. I well know her sentiments on this interesting subject, in all its connections and consequences. They accord with my own; and it is my wish and my will to express them on this occasion.

It is my purpose, Mr. President, in the remarks which I may submit to the Senate, to confine myself to the consideration of the resolutions which have been reported from the select committee, and to the substitute which has been proposed by the Senator from Kentucky. I regard this subject, in all its bearings, as one of the deepest importance. And should the period ever come when this Government shall assume, directly or indirectly, the payment of the State debts, or should pledge its faith for the ultimate discharge of State liabilities, then will this Confederacy be dismembered and our happy Union dissolved. Such an assumption would not only be "repugnant to all the objects and purposes for which the Federal Union was formed," but utterly destructive of that harmony and unity of interests, so essential to its maintenance. There is not, in the broad range of subjects which can appropriately and legitimately claim the consideration of the General Government, one more fraught with danger than an interference with State purposes or with State policy. These sovereignties, independent of each other, ever look with great jealousy upon the action of the General Government, and he who is conversant with the events of our history from the Declaration of American Independence to the present moment, cannot fail to bear in mind the untiring vigilance of the States, their constant and deep solicitude against any accumulation or concentration of power, calculated to interfere with their rights, or to disturb their relations. Their powers and their duties are well defined, and the powers and the duties of the General Government are equally well set forth in the charter of our liberties. I repeat that the project of an assumption of the State debts by the Federal Government is full of danger—fatal to the peace and perpetuity of our institutions.

The effect would be to destroy the independence of the States—to change the character and the habits of the people—to break down the proud and generous feelings of freemen, and to substitute the miserable selfishness of suppliant dependants. It would destroy the well marked relations now subsisting between the Federal and the State Governments, by destroying the active energies of the latter, and making them the mere vessels of the former.

There is no point of view in which this subject can be contemplated, but what its gross injustice is made most strikingly manifest.

The father of his country has left to the American people a most invaluable legacy touching his matter:

"As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it, is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense, by cultivating peace; but remembering, also, that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding, likewise, the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burdens which we ourselves ought to bear."

The contemplated measure, if carried into effect, will fasten a debt upon this Government which its ordinary means cannot discharge while this Confederacy shall last. It not only paralyzes the efforts of the present generation, but entails upon generations yet unborn all the evils of a national debt. If it be wise to assume any portion of the State debts—if it be just for this Government to come, in any degree, to the aid of the States—or if it be constitutional to make any such assumption—I would meet the expenditure by a direct taxation upon the property of the country. I would not ungenerously throw upon posterity the burdens which we ought ourselves to bear; but I would preserve public credit by using it as sparingly as possible. I cannot but regard the consequences which must follow from the adoption of this project, as most deleterious to the free institutions of the States.

I am, as I before stated, from a State free from debt. And what is, in effect, the proposition now submitted by the Senator from Kentucky? "That it would be just and proper to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, in fair and ratable proportions: that the condition of such of the States as have contracted debts is such, at the present moment of pressure and difficulty, as to render such a distribution especially expedient and important." Can any thing be more explicit? Is not the resolution, in itself, calculated to shake the confidence which the States repose in the General Government? Does it not most emphatically declare that, in this day of darkness and dismay, at a time of such pecuniary distress and difficulty, it behooves the General Government to put forth all its energies for the relief of the States—to take from your public Treasury a portion of your public revenue, and distribute it among the States, "in fair proportions," with the avowal that the indebtedness of the States renders such a distribution, at a time like this, especially "expedient and important?" When I last addressed the Senate, I ventured then to assert, what I verily believed, that the idea was entertained on the other side of the Atlantic, by the bankers and money capitalists of Europe, that this Government would assume the liabilities of the States. I believed it; but little indeed did I suppose, from what was then said, that such an assumption would thus early find an advocate on this floor. Little indeed did I suppose that a distinct proposition would be presented to this Senate, to distribute a portion of the public revenues among the States, and that such a distribution would be justified on the ground of State indebtedness, and on account of the pressure and severity of the times. But so it is. Here we have it, in language too plain to be misunderstood. Here is a distinct, well defined proposition, affirming the justice and propriety of distributing a portion of the public revenue among the several States, and that such a measure is especially expedient at this time, when some of the States themselves feel sensibly the weight of their embarrassments. Not content with voting against the resolutions presented by the select committee, wherein the justice and expediency of such a project is most unqualifiedly denied, the Senator from Kentucky proposes to substitute his resolutions, which as unqualifiedly affirm the justice, expediency, and, at this critical period, the all-importance of the measure. Sir, I did not expect this. I then believed, and I still believe, the money power of England was exerting all its energies to accomplish this object. But, Mr. President, I did not then suppose that its purpose would find open and avowed friends in this body. Such have been the recent developments, that I trust every opponent of this scheme is now prepared to admit that the time had arrived when this Senate, and this Congress, should act, and act efficiently, upon this subject, so vital to the peace, harmony, and perpetuity of this Union. Yes, sir, the time had come; and the Senator from Missouri, with a proper forecast, saw enough in the signs of the times to induce him to move in this matter: he richly merits the thanks of the country for this act of patriotism.

The question recurs, would it be just, expedient, or constitutional, for this Government to assume the entire indebtedness of the States? What is the aggregate amount of those debts? If it be designed by this Government to assume the entire, or any portion of, the State debts, it becomes important to ascertain the sum of that indebtedness. But it has been said, by way of objection to this proceeding, that it would be most ungenerous to the States, and most prejudicial to their credit, to speak of their individual or of their aggregate indebtedness. This is mere fancy—an idle phantom of the imagination; it has no foundation to rest upon. How is this? Is not the public furnished periodically with the official reports of comptrollers and State treasurers, giving an exact exhibit of the liabilities of their respective States, and minutely stating the objects upon which the public money has been applied? Is not the information within the reach of every man, showing the extent of State indebtedness, and the causes of that indebtedness? Is not the whole system of State improvements perfectly well understood? Yes, sir; the bankers of Europe, as well as of our own country, must be, of necessity, familiar with the means and liabilities of States asking pecuniary accommodations. Certain it is that all these facts and details make up a part of the history of the times. There is no wrong done, and there can be none done, to the States, by speaking of their separate or of their aggregate indebtedness. I would not willingly do an act which could by possibility injure State credit. But when I am called on to act upon a project which looks to the assumption, by the Federal Government, of the entire debts of the States, I must be permitted to state the particular, as well as the aggregate, amount of the State debts. In my judgment, the whole sum of State liabilities at this time cannot fall short of two hundred millions of dollars.

The following table, showing the debts of the individual States, and of their gross sum, is substantially correct. In some instances the liabilities may be estimated too high, in others too low; but it is sufficiently correct in its details for my purpose, and gives good authority for declaring that the aggregate amount of the State debts can not fall short of two hundred millions of dollars. It is of no earthly importance to whom these State debts may be owing, or for what purpose they may have been contracted. If the debts are due to her own citizens, they are, nevertheless, debts. If the money has gone to constitute the capital of State banks, the liability of the States still exists. If State bonds have furnished the pecuniary basis of State corporations, and paper issues have been made for the benefit of the States themselves for the amount of that capital, what stands pledged for the redemption of that circulation but those very State bonds? Wherever there is an existing State obligation, the amount of that obligation, no matter to whom given, or for what, goes to fix, to that extent, the sum of State indebtedness. The table subjoined, is offered to show the amount of that indebtedness, and when contracted*

The aggregate of that indebtedness is shown by the table to be $174,382,868. I do not propose to add the stocks which have been created by the respective States, or the liabilities which have been incurred since the table was published. I have not the data at hand which would enable me to do it, but I do propose to add the twenty-eight millions of dollars deposited with the several States under the act of June, 1836. This addition to the sum above stated, will make an aggregate exceeding the sum I had assumed as the amount of the State debts. But it has been said, in the course of this debate, that this last item ought not to be added, to show the extent of State liabilities. So far from it, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] was understood to say that there was an unsatisfied debt now owing from the General Government to the respective States, growing out of this very deposite act of 1836—that the last instalment had not been deposited with the States—that they now had a claim upon the General Government for this nine millions of dollars. What is the law of 1836? Is there one line, or even a single word, in that act, which treats the sum placed with the States as a donation to the States? Was that act supported upon any such principle? No, sir; nothing could have been more foreign from those who sustained the bill, than the idea of a grant of the public money to the use of the States. But let us look into the act itself, and see what are its plain provisions. I have subjoined a copy of that part of the 13th section, which declares the character of this deposite with the States:

"That the money which shall be in the Treasury of the United States on the first day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, reserving the sum of five millions of dollars, shall be deposited with the several States, in proportion to their respective representation in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, as shall, by law, authorize their Treasurers, or other competent authorities, to receive the same on the terms hereinafter specified, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver the same to such Treasurer, or other competent authorities, on receiving certificates of deposite therefor, signed by such competent authorities as may be prescribed by the Secretary aforesaid, which certificates shall express the usual and legal obligations, and pledge the faith of the State for the safe keeping and repayment thereof, and shall pledge the faith of the States receiving the same, to pay the said moneys, and every part thereof, from time to time, whenever the same shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of defraying any wants of the public Treasury, beyond the amount of the five millions aforesaid."

Not only is the law itself free from all ambiguity, but the action of the State Legislatures themselves show in what sense they regarded this transfer of a portion of the public revenues. The document I hold in my hand contains the legislation of every State of the Union upon this subject. I shall merely transcribe the law of my own and the law of of the States of Kentucky, to show what the opinion of the States was upon this subject. Not one of them has ever treated this transfer of the public money as a public donation.

No, sir, his own State had, by her act, declared the terms upon which she would receive this deposite; and she had, by her Legislature, subsequently instructed us to oppose every measure intended to relieve the States from their liability to return to the public Treasury this deposite, when demanded. I shall not hesitate, when occasion requires, to carry into effect her instructions.

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

In the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six.

AN ACT to provide for the receipt of the public money of the United States which may be deposited with this State.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court convened, That the Treasurer of this State be, and hereby is, authorized to receive from the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States the money which is directed to be deposited with this State, by virtue of an act of Congress, entitled "An act to regulate the deposites of the public money," approved on the twenty-third day of June, anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six; and the Treasurer of this State is hereby directed and empowered to execute and deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, certificates of deposite for said money, pledging the faith of this State for the safekeeping and repayment thereof, and in all other respects in conformity with the provisions of said act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Treasurer of the State, for the time being, is hereby authorized and directed to pay the said money which may have been received on said certificates of deposite, and every part thereof, from time to time, whenever the same shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury, agreeably to the provisions of the act aforesaid; and if there shall not be a sufficient amount of moneys in the Treasury of this State to meet the requisitions of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasurer of the State, for the time being, is hereby authorized and required, on consent of the Governor, to borrow on the credit of the State such sums as may be necessary for the repayment of such deposites, in such portions and at such times as may be requisite and proper, at the lowest rate of interest at which the same can be procured, not exceeding six per cent. and the Treasurer, for the time being, is hereby authorized and required to pay such loans and the interest, when the same may become due or payable, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The following is the legislation of Kentucky upon this subject:

AN ACT providing for the receipt of the proportions of the surplus revenue to be deposited in this State.

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That the Treasurer of this Commonwealth be authorized and required to receive from the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, the proportions of the surplus revenue, which are required to be deposited in the Treasury of this Commonwealth, according to the provisions of an act of Congress, entitled "An act to regulate the deposites of the public money," approved on the 23d of June, 1836; and the said Treasurer is further authorized and required to execute certificates of deposite, containing obligations, on the part of this Commonwealth, in conformity with the requisitions of said act of Congress; and when said surplus revenue shall be received by the Treasurer, as hereby authorized and required, he shall cause the same to be passed to his credit in the deposite banks of this State, and remain in said deposite banks until otherwise disposed of by law.

Can there be, then, any "reason to doubt that the deposites with the States forms one item in the account of State liabilities?

I assume the sum of two hundred millions of dollars as the existing amount of the debts of the respective States. And let there be a general act passed by Congress, assuming all outstanding State liabilities; mark my word, that the aggregate of that assumption, without taking into the account the twenty-eight millions of dollars deposited with the States, would not be less than the two hundred millions, as stated.

This, then, is the sum to be provided for—but in order to liquidate the entire debt of the States, the largest existing State debt, having the least representation, must be taken into the account, in order to make an equal and just distribution among the other States. Let it be supposed then that the largest State debt is now twenty-five millions of dollars; and that the representation in both branches of Congress from that State consists of five. If the entire State debt should be assumed by the General Government, it follows that a public debt must be incurred to enable the Government to do equal justice to the other members of the Confederacy, of fourteen hundred and seventy millions of dollars. The eight non-debtor States, upon the ratio of distribution fixed in the deposite act of 1836, would receive three hundred and fifteen millions of dollars. That is, they must receive the money, or the credit or the General Government to that amount.

The other eighteen debtor States, upon the principle he had stated, would receive, including their present debts, such further sums as would make an aggregate of eleven hundred and fifty-five millions of dollars.

Upon this principle of distribution, New Hampshire herself must receive thirty-five millions of dollars from the General Government; the annual interest upon which, at six per cent. would amount to two hundred and ten thousand dollars; and if

*In June, 1838, the Comptroller of the State of New York addressed a letter to the different States, making inquiry what amount its laws authorized to be borrowed for internal improvements. The answers he received enabled him to make the following table:

STATEMENT showing the amount of stocks issued, and authorized by law to be issued, by the several States named below, in each successive five years, from 1820 to 1835, and from 1835 to 1838.

This statement is confined to contracts authorized at the time of making it, say June or July, 1838. Since that time laws have passed authorizing a large increase for banks as well as public works. In Ohio, we know the debt exceeds fifteen millions of dollars.

that annual interest should be required to be paid by the population of that State, per capita, it would necessarily impose a direct annual tax of at least seven hundred dollars on every man, woman, and child, of that early, vigilant, and faithful member of the Confederacy. Take the State in which I reside, and let it be supposed, that through the great munificence of the Federal Government, she was to receive the sum of thirty-five millions of dollars. Such a donation would be regarded, as it should be, a public curse, instead of a public blessing. Should she appropriate it upon works of internal improvements, in constructing railroads and canals through every section of the State, it would unavoidably impose upon her a debt from which, in no time to come, could she be delivered. If she should appropriate the principal for purposes of education, the interest of that fund must be drawn by direct or by indirect taxation from the pockets of her own people.

Such a distribution would scatter the seeds of local jealousy, would produce a most disorganizing and disastrous influence upon State operations. Such a distribution is unasked by one, at least, of the non-debtor States. It would, in his view, be imposing upon her posterity burdens which we ought ourselves to bear. Such a distribution would not only distract the councils of the States, but would also destroy that peace and harmony, and love of union, which are the certain cements of the Confederacy. The all importance of preserving that Union inviolate, is most impressively described in an address to which the American people cannot too often recur:

"While, then, every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parties combined cannot fail to find, in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger; a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries, not tied together by the same Government, which their own rivalships alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter."

There would then be no justice or expediency in such a distribution, in such a division of the public revenue for such a purpose. I would not interfere with the policy of the States. I would not, by the power of this Government, by the mighty influence of its means, embarrass the enterprise of States or corporations. I would leave them to act freely within their spheres; and I would limit the operations of this Government to that line of action prescribed by the letter of the Constitution. I would assume no power—more especially I would not assume the power of distributing the public revenues among the States—the exercise of which power would prove so fatal to the permanency of the Government. Let the States carry on their works of internal improvement. Let them accomplish what they may, in conjunction with corporations or with individuals. I would not have the General Government connect itself with their operations.

With equal justice might this parental Government, as it has been called, assume the debts of the individuals composing the States, as of the States composing the Union. If this Government be the parent of the States, (which I most emphatically deny,) it follows that the citizens are but removed in one further degree in the lineal descent from the common stock; and with equal semblance of justice might it be contended that this Government should assume the debts of individuals and of corporations, as well as the debts of the States; and the monstrous inexpediency of the proposition is most forcibly presented, when we contemplate the true relations between the State and General Governments.

The States are the independent members of the Union, acting upon all questions of internal police as to them shall seem fit—accountable not to Congress but to their own Government, for their own actions. The General Government may be regarded as the great agent of the States, to perform, for the good of the whole Confederacy, certain duties, and to exercise certain powers, well defined and expressly delegated by the letter of the Constitution under which we live.

This very relation, subsisting between the States and the General Government, stands opposed to this project of assumption. Where is to be found the constitutional power to provide for the payment of the entire, or of any fractional part of the State debts? No such power is expressly conferred nor will it be contended that it is an incidental power, necessarily existing for the proper execution of the powers expressly delegated to Congress.

There is no such power on the part of Congress, expressed or implied; and it would be a most violent assumption of power for Congress to provide for the assumption of the State debts.

"Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imports, and excises, to pay the debts, and to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States."

It has power to borrow money on the credit of the United States; but this power to borrow money is only for the purpose of furnishing the requisite means for the common defence and general welfare of the Union. It has no power, under these clauses, to borrow money to give away in charity. It has no power to impose taxes or duties for the purpose of collecting revenue for distribution, for the exclusive benefit of the States.

The means of the General Government are its revenues, derived from imports, and from the sales of the public lands. These means can only be applied, constitutionally, for objects connected with the common defence or general welfare of the country.

If Congress has the power to assume the State debts, it may tax the people for any purpose. It may dispense charities, endow colleges, establish highways, and carry forward all projects for internal improvements.

If Congress, under the power to borrow money, can provide the means for the extinguishment of State debts, it can not only, with its taxing power, destroy the independence, but the resources of the States themselves. If Congress, under the taxing power, can transcend the limits expressly defined in the Constitution, it can impose any burden it shall please upon any members of the Confederacy, having no connection with the common defence, or with the general welfare of the United States.

If Congress can assume the debt of Illinois, it has power to take from the Treasury an equal sum and present to New Hampshire. If Congress has the power to assume the debt of any one State, it possesses the power to interfere with the internal police of the States, controlling their whole system of State local improvements.

No, Mr. President, there are no such powers delegated to Congress by the Constitution. And there are no such implied powers conferred. But if the State debts can be assumed by the General Government, how are the means to be provided. As I have before stated, the whole revenues of this Government are derived from imports and lands. Congress has the power to impose direct and indirect taxes; and I ask how are the means to be supplied to meet the unavoidable charges upon the Treasury, consequent upon such an assumption.

Would it be attempted to lay taxes, to impose duties, to draw from the pockets of the people, directly or indirectly, the entire sum necessary to meet the existing liabilities of the debtor, and to do equal justice to the non-debtor States? No, sir; such a proposition would find no favor here. Congress must borrow the money—must pledge the faith of this Government to foreign capitalists. This Government must bow down before the moneyed power of Europe, and supplicate relief for the States. This Government would then, indeed, assume a new attitude. Instead of these United States being free and independent, they would become the mere vassals of the money power of Europe, looking there for favor and for protection. This would then be the abject condition of the now free, sovereign, and independent States of united America.

"Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, the jealousy of a free people ought to be awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of a Republican Government."

I shall now proceed to consider the second proposition involved in the resolution under consideration, and this was the main purpose I had in view in addressing the Senate.

Would it be just, expedient, or constitutional, to divide the public domain—the property of the General Government—among the several States, upon some fixed ratio? Or would it be just, expedient, or constitutional, to abstract annually from the public Treasury a sum equal to the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, for the purpose of distribution among the respective States, upon the same ratio? As I have stated, my main object in rising to address the Senate at this time, was to consider these questions; and I purpose to go into the history of our public lands, to show in what way they have been acquired—how much they have cost the Federal Government—and what have been the receipts into the Treasury from this source of revenue; and if I am not wholly mistaken in my examination—if I have not made most erroneous calculations—if I have not entirely been misled by results—it would be the most flagrant act of injustice to the Union—the most unwarrantable abuse of power, on the part of the Federal Government, to dispose of the public lands as contemplated by the second resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky. Before, however, I proceed to state my views and calculations upon this branch of the subject, I will present to the Senate the resolutions which were adopted by the Legislature of New Hampshire. They exhibit the true constitutional doctrine. They furnish a valuable commentary upon this dangerous usurpation of power—upon this system of distribution of the public moneys:

Whereas Government was instituted for the common benefit, protection, and security of the whole community, and not for the private interests or emolument of any one man or class of men: And whereas all manner of unnecessary taxation, whether it have for its object distribution, the granting of protection to certain individuals only, or of certain kinds of manufactures, to the exclusion of all other individuals, manufactures, or trades, is highly detrimental to the best interests of the whole people: And whereas any system of direct or indirect taxation for the purpose of internal improvements, to benefit exclusively certain individuals, or sections of country, at the expense of other individuals, and other sections, is highly to be deprecated on account of its manifest injustice to the great mass of the community: And whereas any distribution of the surplus revenue of the General Government to the States, whether that surplus is an accidental one or otherwise, is contrary to the true spirit and meaning of the Constitution, and if the practice of taxing the people unnecessarily for that purpose is adopted, will tend towards the creation of a consolidated Government, and to the ultimate and complete dependence of the several States upon that Government: Therefore

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court convened, That all revenue arising from imports or direct taxation should not exceed the legitimate wants of the Government, and that any system tending to increase the revenue beyond that point is oppressive and unequal: therefore, any compromise made by the Representatives of the people tending to increase the same beyond that point, can have no binding moral obligation upon their successors.

And be it further resolved, That a system of internal improvements for the purpose of benefiting certain sections of the country at the expense of other sections, is not only unconstitutional, but highly oppressive to the great mass of community, and that such improvements should therefore be left to individual enterprise.

And be it further resolved, That any distribution of the surplus revenues of the General Government would be not only contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, but, if adopted, will tend to the establishment of a consolidated Government, degrading to the States, and reducing them to servile dependence upon the General Government.

And be it further resolved, That our Senators in the Congress of the United States be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their exertions to procure such reduction of the tariff, having due regard to the general interests of the whole community, as to meet the actual wants of the Government, and such graduation of the prices, and limitation of the sales, of the public lands, as will best promote the settlement and actual occupancy of the same.

And that they be further instructed and requested to vote against any bill or resolution providing for the distribution to the States of any moneys which may hereafter be in the Treasury of the United States; or for the alteration or change of the laws now existing regulating the deposite of public moneys, so as to distribute or relinquish the repayment of the same; and that they be further directed to lay this preamble and these resolutions before both Houses of Congress.

Such are the resolutions which have been sustained by the friends of the Administration in my own State; such are the resolutions which her Legislature have most triumphantly adopted. They are the undisguised sentiments of a hard working, industrious community—of men whose brave ancestry had done much to achieve the independence of their country—men who are ready for any sacrifice to preserve unimpaired the great legacy of their Revolutionary fathers, who well understand the value of popular liberty, and who cannot fail to realize that the only sure mode of maintaining it in its original purity, is to adhere with rigid pertinacity to the well defined powers of the Federal Government.

These resolutions, in which I most fully con-

our, have an immediate bearing upon the subject before us; and coming, as they do, from the Legislature of my native State, I feel a pride and a pleasure in placing them before the Senate.

Before the Revolution, the right of soil to all the unpatented lands within the limits of the thirteen colonies, and within the extensive boundaries of the United States, as fixed by the treaty of peace of 1783, was claimed by, and was vested in, the Crown of Great Britain. All the public lands now claimed by the United States, have been acquired either by conquest, or by purchase. Some portion, it is admitted, has been acquired by purchase since the treaty of peace, from some of the States of the Union, and other portions have been acquired by purchase from France and Spain. It was, however, the common efforts, the united energies of the whole Confederacy—it was their blood and their treasure, freely applied in the prosecution of that glorious conflict, which resulted in the establishment of our country's independence—that divested from Great Britain her claim to the soil, and to the jurisdiction of united America. It was the result of the Revolution which secured to the Confederacy her title to a portion of the public domain. This acquisition of country was the reward of the combined means of the States. It was the fruit of their valor and of their virtue. By conquest, then, by the fortune of war, the United States acquired the clear and indisputable right to that portion of the public domain which was unsettled, unpatented, and, in my judgment, without the appropriate limits of any member of the Confederacy, at the commencement of the Revolution. It was by the success of our arms that our title to the ungranted land of the West was irrevocably established. The domain thus acquired, became the property of the whole Confederacy, and could only be appropriated for the common benefit. I am not disposed to question here the liberality, the patriotism, or the sense of justice, which prompted certain members of the Confederacy, by their deeds of cession, to transfer their claim of title to lands within their asserted boundaries, to the Confederacy. That was done, and done under the influence of high public considerations. They were acts on the part of those States, emanating from the love of peace, of harmony, and of union.

Nor am I disposed to question that the chartered limits of those States embraced not only the ceded territory, but immense tracts beyond the established boundaries of the Confederacy, as fixed by the treaty of 1783. But my reading has been altogether unprofitable, if the history of the times of the rise, progress, and close of the Revolution—of the causes and of the objects of the war—of the admitted rights, and of the pretended claims, of the respective States which formed the Confederacy, does not clearly and distinctly show, that this right of soil to the ungranted lands of the West was never universally conceded or admitted to be the exclusive property of any particular member of the Confederacy. But when, by the fortune of war, they became lost to the crown of Great Britain, they thereby became the rightful property of the United States.

It is true that the articles of confederation were reported to the continental Congress in the early part of the Revolution, and that mighty contest was carried on, and successfully terminated, by the States as a Confederacy; and it is equally true that the very history of that confederation shows that this relisquishment of the claim of the States to their right of soil, as expressed in their respective deeds of cession, was made to give quiet and tranquillity to the whole Confederacy, to excite a more united zeal, and a more determined purpose to prosecute the war to a satisfactory result. For there can be no doubt that, if New York had not made its deed of cession, and the other States had not signified their readiness to follow her example, the war could not have been brought to such a triumphant termination. I speak not without authority; the history of the times fully justifies my remarks.

This question of exclusive right (which was asserted by some of the States) to the unsettled and unpatened lands of the West, had engaged so much of the public attention, and other States had so strongly protested against the claims so made, that Congress, as early as the 6th of September, 1780, agreed to the report of its committee, upon this subject, and from which I have made the subjoined extract:

"That it appears advisable to press upon those States which can remove the embarrassments respecting the Western country, a liberal surrender of a portion of their territorial claims, since they cannot be preserved entire, without endangering the stability of the general Confederacy; to remind them how indispensably necessary it is to establish the Federal Union on a fixed and permanent basis, and on principles acceptable to all its respective members; how essential to public peace and confidence; to the support of our army; to the vigor of our councils, and success of our measures; to our tranquillity at home; to our reputation abroad; to our very existence, as a free, sovereign, and independent people."

And on the 10th of October, 1780, Congress resolved:

"That the unappropriated lands that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress of the 6th day of September last, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States.

If, then, the united means of the Confederacy acquired this portion of the public domain; if our right of soil was obtained by conquest, the property thus acquired enured to the common benefit of the United States; if the right were obtained by purchase, then, in conformity to the above resolution, the property thus acquired becomes the sole and exclusive property of the whole Confederacy, and can only be disposed for her common benefit.

I have remarked that the very history of the Confederation will show that this claim, made by some of the States to the ungranted lands, was not universally admitted. Those articles of perpetual union were reported to the continental Congress as early as November, 1777; and it was well known that the States of New York, Virginia, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and others, claimed as coming within their chartered limits the immense and unpeopled region of the West. These claims were not acknowledged; and hence we find that, as early as June, 1778, Massachusetts proposed an amendment to the ninth article of confederation by adding to the paragraph, "That no State shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States" the following provision:

"That all lands within those States, the property of which before the present war, was vested in the crown of Great Britain, or out of which revenues from quit rents arise, payable to the said crown, shall be deemed, taken, and considered as the property of these United States, and be disposed of, and appropriated by, Congress for the benefit of the whole Confederacy."

The sentiments also of New Jersey, at that period of our history, are worthy of being repeated, and show what was the prevailing feeling of the country.

"The boundaries and limits of each State ought to be fully and finally fixed and made known. This, we apprehend, would be attended with very salutary effects by preventing jealousies as well as controversies, and promoting harmony and confidence among the States. If the circumstance of the times would not admit of this previous to the proposal of the Confederation to the several States, the establishment of the principles upon which the determination might be conducted, at a time more convenient and favorable for despatching the same at an early period, would be satisfactory. We are constrained to observe that the present war, as we always apprehended, was undertaken for the general defence and interest of the confederating colonies. It was ever the confident expectation of this State, that the benefits derived from a successful contest were to be general and proportionate, and that the property of the common enemy falling in consequence of a prosperous issue of the war, would belong to the United States and would be appropriated to their use. We are, therefore, greatly disappointed in finding no provision made in the Confederation for empowering Congress to dispose of such property, but especially the vacant and unpatented lands, commonly called the crown lands, for defraying the expenses of the war and for such other public and general purposes; reason and justice must decide that the property which existed in the crown of Great Britain previous to the present Revolution, ought now to belong to Congress, in trust for the use and benefit of the United States. They have fought and bled for it, in proportion to their respective abilities, and therefore the reward ought not to be predilectionally distributed. Shall such States as are shut out, by situation, from availing themselves of the least advantage from this question, be left to sink under an enormous debt, while others are enabled, in a short period, to replace all their expenditures from the hard earnings of the whole Confederacy?"

Such was the state of public opinion upon this matter; such were the feelings which pervaded the country, that it required the most unceasing efforts on the part of the continental Congress to induce the States to agree to the articles of confederation. Nothing but a sense of common danger, growing out of any disunion; nothing but the cause of the whole country; nothing but the strong reasons urged in the circular from Congress to the States, induced ther assent to the confederation.

Permit us (says Congress) earnestly to recommend these articles to the immediate and dispassionate attention of the Legislatures of the respective States. Let them be candidly reviewed under a sense of the difficulty of combining in one general system the various sentiments and interests of a continent divided into so many sovereign and independent communities, under a consideration of the absolute necessity of uniting all our councils and all our strength to maintain and defend our common liberties.

This salutary measure can no longer be deferred. It seems essential to our very existence as a free people, and without it we may soon be constrained to bid adieu to independence, to liberty, to safety.

It is true that, after such an appeal, most of the States came forward and signified their assent. But not until after the cession from New York; not until after the strong indication from Virginia that she also would cede to the United States her vacant lands, did Maryland yield her objections.

Although the pressure of immediate calamities, the dread of their continuance from the appearance of disunion, may have induced some States to accede to the present Confederation, contrary to their own interests and judgments, it requires no great share of foresight to predict that when those causes cease to operate, the States which have thus acceded to the Confederation, will consider it as no longer binding, and will eagerly embrace the first occasion of asserting their just rights, and securing their indepencence. We are convinced that policy and justice require that a country unsettled at the commencement of the war, claimed by the British crown, and ceded to it by the treaty of Paris, if wrested from the common enemy by the blood and treasure of the thirteen States, should be considered as common property.

These were the prevailing sentiments of the country, and it was the force of public opinion that produced such salutary effects; for we find that, in 1780, the State of New York, by her legislation, declared that, "it having been conceived that a portion of the waste and uncultivated territory within the limits or claims of certain States, ought to be appropriated as a common fund for the expenses of the war," goes on further to assert that the territory which may be ceded as relinquished, shall be and enure for the use and benefit of such of the United States as shall become members of the Federal alliance, and for no other use or purpose whatever. At this time, it should be remembered that all the States had not joined the Federal alliance—had not assented to the articles of confederation—and the cession of New York then was intended to provide merely a commonn fund to meet the expenses of the war which might be incurred by those States, and those States only, which should become members of the Federal alliance—the very use which must have been made of them if there had been no conflict of title. And Massachusetts, also, by her deed of cession, did assign, transfer, and convey (the territory described) to the United States of America, for their benefit. And, in a report made to Congress, January 30, 1783, it is stated that, "among the steps taken by Congress to secure the debts incurred for the common defence, they must not omit to mention the recommendation of September 6, 1780, for a cession of a part of the western territory, claimed by particular States;" and adds, that in consequence thereof, New York has made a cession, accepted by Congress. Virginia and Connecticut have also made cessions. And for what purpose were these cessions made? I answer, to secure the debts incurred for the common defence. The terms of the cessions are somewhat particular, and somewhat variant, but they all purport to be cessions to the United States, and for their common benefit, and that benefit was to be enjoyed according to their usual proportion, in the general charge and expenditure, which would have been the degree of benefit enjoyed by the several States, if there had been no counter claim to, or any conveyance of, the territory, to the United States. That proportion of charge upon the States was distinctly defined in the eighth article of the confederation:

"All charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence, or general welfare, and allowed by the United States, in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common Treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States, in proportion to the value of all land within each State, granted to, or surveyed for, any person, as such land, and the buildings and improvements thereon, shall be estimated according to such mode as the United States, in Congress assembled, shall from time to time direct and appoint."

This was the benefit which the several and respective members of the Confederacy would derive from the acquisition of this portion of the public domain, whether acquired by conquest or by purchase. No matter, then, whether the title was acquired by conquest or by grant, the result is the same. The effect is the same, if by conquest the lands enure for the sole benefit of the whole Confede- racy; if by purchase or by grants from individual States, not only the resolutions of Congress, but the terms of the cessions themselves, show with equal certainty that the territory thus acquired was for the common benefit of the whole, and to stand particularly pledged to pay the debts and charges of the Revolution.

The lands then acquired, either by conquest or cession, were, according to the history of the times, distinctly set apart to meet the expenses of the war—to furnish the means for the extinguishment of the public debt of the Revolution; and, under the articles of confederation, it would not be contended that Congress possessed the power to make any other disposition of the public lands, except for public purposes, and for liquidating the charges incurred in the common defence. The following were the sentiments once expressed in this Senate by a member then at the head of the Committee on the Public Lands:

"It is admitted on all hands that, under the articles of confederation, Congress had no power to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, for local or internal purposes—to make grants to the new States, whensoever they might be introduced into the Union, or to make donations to individuals or to bodies corporate: nor, indeed, could any power be exercised, distinct from such as were contained in the deeds of cession."

And if Congress had then such limited powers, it will hardly be contended that, under the confederation, it had the power to abstract any portion of the public revenues for the purpose of paying the debts of the several States.

The public lands within the limits of the Confederacy at the treaty of peace, stood pledged for the redemption of the public debt—the costs and charges necessarily incurred in their acquisition.

Under the Confederation, then, Congress had no power to dispose of the public lands, except for the benefit of the whole. And what additional powers Congress now possess over this subject must have been conferred by the Constitution itself. And what are they? By the 3d section of the 4th article of the Constitution, it is provided "that Congress shall have power to dispose of, and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States;" And what is the plain meaning of that clause? That Congress shall have power to fix the price of the public lands, to prescribe the necessary rules for their disposal, and to sell and to convey the public domain, at such prices, and under such regulations, as shall have been prescribed, for the general welfare. It had no more power under the clause cited, to dispose of the public lands for any particular purpose, than it has to dispose of the other public property. The exercise of this power must be, according to the nature and fitness of things, necessarily limited to the furtherance of the public welfare. The lands and the other property belong to all the States, and they cannot, consistent with the true meaning of the Constitution, be disposed of, for the exclusive benefit of any one member of the Confederacy. They cannot be granted to a foreign power to the prejudice of our common country. Under this clause of the Constitution, Congress possesses no more power, in my judgment, to dispose of the public lands for local or sectional objects, than it had under the articles of confederation. These lands were acquired either by conquest or by purchase, and acquired for the common benefit. They could then, and they can now, be conveyed for the general good. I contend, then, Mr. President, that there is no express provision of the Constitution, giving to Congress the power to sell and convey the public lands to the States for any local purposes. No such power is expressed, or can be implied; and equally clear is it to my mind, that Congress has not the authority, under the Constitution, to distribute that portion of the revenue arising from the sales of the public lands, among the States, to relieve them from their indebtedness, or to aid them in the prosecution of their works of internal improvement. No such power is expressed, and no such power can be implied. But, for argument, let us admit that Congress possesses the constitutional power to do all this. Would it be just? Would not such a distribution be in total disregard of the terms of the cession? And would it not be wholly repugnant to the objects of the Government, in acquiring the title and control of the public, ungranted, and unsettled lands of the West? They were set apart to pay the debt of the Revolution. And has it been done by means derived from the lands? Has that been done? I admit that the debt has been extinguished. But how stands the account between the public lands and the public Treasury? Has the Government been supplied with the means for the extinguishment of the Revolutionary debt, from that source of revenue? No. The public lands have been, and still are, a charge upon the public Treasury. They have not contributed the first dollar towards the payment of the expenses of the Revolution. I remarked that that debt had been paid. Not precisely so: there still remains a portion of the debt of the Revolution unsatisfied. There still exists an annual charge upon the Treasury to meet the claims of that small remnant of patriots, whose services and sacrifices in the great cause of their country, have been in some degree requited by their descendants. The Revolutionary pensioners draw from the Treasury, year following year, a little less than four millions of dollars. Is not this a debt of the Revolution? And is it not most emphatically one of those debts for the redemption of which the public lands were pledged? If this be true, then, I add, that the revenue arising from the sale of the public lands should be sacredly reserved for the perfect discharge of this remaining debt of the Revolution.

The pensions now amount to nearly four millions of dollars annually, and the yearly avails of the lands, according to public estimates, amount also to about the same sum. Let, then, the receipts balance this expenditure. This would be right and consistent with the grants made by States to the Confederacy; and upon the principle of common justice, I would oppose the distribution, among the States, of this portion of the public revenue, while this charge upon the public Treasury exists. But, Mr. President, I am not driven to any such extremity. I will proceed to show, according to the means within my power, what has been the cost of the public lands from the foundation of the Government to the present time; what have been the receipts into the Treasury from the sales of the public domain. I will state the account current between the lands and the Treasury, and I shall then appeal to the justice of the Senate to decide upon the questions presented. In in pursuance of the following resolution:

That the Secretary of the Treasury prepare and report to this House, as soon as conveniently may be done, statements showing—

The entire cost to the Government of all the public lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished, and of the care and sale of the same, as near as the same can be ascertained and estimated, including the pay and compensation and expenses to the Government of all persons employed; the amount paid, and obligated to be paid, for the extinguishment of Indian titles, accounting annuities at such sums as, invested at five per cent. would produce them, and excluding the purchase money for cessions from foreign Governments; and the expenses of Indian wars; and the like amount, including the purchase money paid for the acquisition of lands and territories from foreign Governments.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office, on the 7th February, 1839, communicated to the House of Representatives the following:

Statement of the cost in the acquisition and management of the public lands, and of the receipts arising from the sale thereof, to the 30th September, 1838.

The whole expenditure under the head of Indian department, from the commencement of the Government to the 30th of September, 1838, as far as can be ascertained from the records of this office, amounts to - - -		$32,047,598 50
By the convention of France of the 3d April, 1803, the United States paid for Louisiana, in stock and money - - -	$15,000,000 00
Interest on the stock, up to the time it became redeemable -	8,529,353 43
		23,529,353 43
By the treaty with Spain of the 22d February, 1819, there was paid for the Floridas the sum of - - - -	$5,000,000 00
Interest on the stock constituted per act of the 24th May, 1824, to provide for the awards of the commissioners under the said treaty, up to the time it was paid off - - -	$1,489,768 66
		6,489,768 66
The payments to the State of Georgia on account of lands relinquished to the United States, including the value of arms furnished that State, amounted to - - -		1,250,000 00
Amount of Mississippi stock issued under the act of the 3d March, 1815, and redeemed at the Treasury, exclusive of the amount received in payment for lands - - - -		1,832,375 70
There has been paid for salaries and contingent expenses of the General Land Office - -		1,126,609 83
For salaries and incidental expenses of the several land offices, out of the proceeds of sales, while in the hands of the receivers - - -	$3,227,939 13
For the salaries of registers and receivers, by warrants on the Treasurer of the Unted States -	92,903 39
		3,320,842 52
For the salaries of surveyors general and their clerks, and of the commissioners for settling land claims, &c. - - - -		1,032,666 80
And for the survey of public lands - -		3,106,831 94
Cost including foreign cessions and expenses of Indians - - - - -		$73,736,047 38
The cost in the acquisition and management of the public lands, exclusive of the sums paid for cessions from foreign Governments, and expenses of Indian wars, for which specific appropriations were made, amounts to -		$28,484,056 65

Making the sum of $102,220,104 03, as constituting the aggregate of charge upon the Treasury, by the purchase and management of the public lands, up to the 30th of September, 1838. This is not all. It appears from a communication, which I have obtained from the Indian Department, that the Government has paid, and is liable to pay for the extinguishment of the Indian title, to February 7, 1839, the sum of - - - $84,549,254 81

And since that period, a treaty has been made with the Miamis, for their title to lands in Indiana, by which the Government obligated itself to pay - - -	335,680 00
And since that period, also, the Government has made treaties with the Iowas, Creeks, Osages, Stockbridges, and Munsees, not exclusively for the acquisition of territory, I admit, but of such a character as to warrant me in charging to the public lands the amount which the Government, by those treaties, is bound to pay, viz: - - -	1,089,118 03
These several items of charge for the extinguishment of the Indian title, amount to -	$85,974,052 84

In the foregoing exhibit, it has been my purpose to present an accurate statement of the costs of the public land, up to given periods; and I subjoin the communication I have received from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which gives the particulars, going to make up the aggregate of $84,549,254 81 paid, and to be paid out, for the extinguishment of Indian title to the public lands:

*Nett proceeds of sales not known.

This is not all:

To this sum of $85,974,052 84, I add, according to a statement which I have received from the General Land Office, showing the amount of the two and three per cent. funds reserved out of the sales of the public lands, for the use of the new States, according to their charters, a further sum of $4,410,479 22.

This last statement is represented to be a correct account of the sums accruing to the several States, from the earliest period to the 30th of Sept. 1839.

If, then, I am correct, the charge upon the public Treasury for the purchase of the public lands, and for their management under the operations of the land system, may be stated as follows:

The costs in the acquisition and management of the public lands to the 30th September, 1838 - - -	$102,220,104 03
For the extinguishment of the Indian title - - -	85,974,052 84
For the fund reserved out of the proceeds of the sales for the use of the new States, &c. -	4,410,479 22
Making in all - - -	$192,604,636 09

It is true that this entire sum has not yet been drawn from from the Treasury; but portions of it are hereafter to be disbursed in accordance with Indian treaties. It nevertheless is a subsisting charge upon the Treasury; and unless it shall be shown that the receipts have been equal to that amount, the injustice of diverting that source of revenue, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, to other purposes, would manifesily appear.

It will be observed that I have not included any portion of the costs and expenses of the Indian wars, which have grown out of negotiations for the extinguishment of Indian titles; but nothing could be more just, in my judgment, than to charge the public lands with the cost of the Indian wars, since the 1st of January, 1836, as they were unavoidable charges upon the Treasury, occasioned by the purchase of these Indian titles.

I am not disposed to make any wrong impressions upon this subject; but when a distribution of the revenue arising from the sales of the public lands is contemplated, it strikes me that the American people ought to know how stands the account between the public lands and the public Treasury. They ought to have presented before them the balance sheet. They ought to know whether we have not already made very liberal advances from the public Treasury on account of the public lands, and whether millions upon millions have not been drawn from the pockets of the people to carry on our land operations. If so, it would be monstrous to abstract from the Treasury the proceeds of the land sales, for distribution among the States—to keep up unnecessary indirect taxation—to impose and continue unnecessary burdens upon the people. And for what? To supply the Treasury with the means of paying Indian annuities. And whenever an Indian tract of land shall have been sold, instead of putting the money into the Treasury for public use, it is proposed to scatter and distribute the avails to the four winds of Heaven. This is the object contemplated. Is it wise—can it be just—to make such a disposition of the public revenues? I answer, no. The people will answer, no. It is our bounden duty to husband all our resources—to have this Government administered with economy—to avoid all unnecessary taxation, no matter what may be its form—take from the people all that shall be wanted for a faithful, just, and responsible discharge of our trusts, and take no more. Then will the people repose confidence in their rulers—then will they cling with steadfast hope to the Government of their choice.

I ought not, however, to argue the effect of this distribution, until I shall have made a full statement of both sides of the account. I have endeavored to state the costs of the public lands; but it has necessarily fallen far short of the reality. Not an Indian treaty is made without its containing specific obligations on the part of the Government for the erection of mills, mechanic shops, the supply of provisions and of artificers. These items of charge are necessarily excluded, and the expenses incurred in carrying on negotiations with the Indian communities have not been, and could not be, taken into the account. He, who is conversant with the history of our public expenditures, will know that these items have imposed a severe charge upon the Treasury. But I trust that I shall have shown enough to satisfy every man in the community how stands this account between the lands and the Treasury, and I will now proceed to state what have been, from the commencement of our land system, the receipts ito the Treasury from the sales of the public lands.

The following resolution passed the House of Representatives on the 11th of January, 1838:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House—

The whole amount of public lands belonging to the United States, sold since they were ceded to the United States; distinguishing the amount of sales in each year, exhibiting the nett proceeds, and distinguishing between those which have been sold within the limits of the different States and Territories.

In answer to this resolution, the Secretary of the Treasury communicated to the House of Reresentatives a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, containing the information called for. From that report it appears that from 1796 to the 30th September, 1837, the quantity of land sold was 75,025,055 50 acres, and that the actual amount paid by the purchasers was $106,245,656 88, and that during that period there was received into the Treasury for the land thus sold $94,637,946 81. This statement exhibits the amount of all the public land sold from the commencement of the sales in 1796 to the termination of the credit system, 30th June, 1820, and also including the amount received under the cash system from 1st July, 1820, to 30th September, 1837, which makes the aggregate of sales and receipts as above stated. The following table exhibits the same general results; but contains a particular exhibit of the lands sold in each of the States and Territories within the same periods of time, and the amount paid by the purchasers, and the actual sum paid into the Treasury; and it is thus made manifest, that from the earliest periods of the sales to the 30th September, 1837, the whole amount actually paid into the Treasury in cash, and in evidences of public debt, as the avails of the sales of the public lands, amount to $98,376,532 38.

Exhibit of the quantity of public land sold, the amount paid by the purchasers thereof, and the amount paid into the Treasury on account of the sales of public land, in each of the States and Territories, from the earliest period of the sales to the 30th of September, 1837.

States and Territories.	Quantity of public land sold. Acres.	Amount paid by purchasers.	Amount paid into the Treasury.
Ohio,	12,373,247.53	$21,277,692 95	$19,013,563 72

Wisconsin,	1,051,921.94	1,363,796 24	1,232,747 11
	75,025,055.50	$106,245,656 88	$94,496,543 81
Received by the Treasurer of the United States in 1836,			235,200 00
in 1837,			6,200 00
			$94,737,943 81

In addition to the amount paid into the Treasury, there has been received by Government, in payment of the public lands, as follows, to wit:

Certificates of public debt and army land warrants - - - - - -	$984,189 91
Mississippi stock - - - - - -	2,448.789 44
United States stock - - - - - -	257,660 73
Forfeited land stock - - - - - -	667,746 60
Military land scrip - - - - - -	1,678,992 33
	$6,037,378 01

It will be seen that I have not included in the estimate of receipts the sum of $2,448,789 44, the amount of the Mississippi stock received by the Government for the public lands—as I have not charged the public lands with a like amount of Mississippi stock issued in payment for lands purchased by the United States of the State of Georgia.

To this aggregate of receipts into the Treasury from the sales of the public lands, should be added what has been realized since the 30th of September, 1837; and from the document now upon our tables, this may be put down at $10,214,154, making the amount received into the Treasury from the avails of the sales of the public lands, up to 31st December, 1839, including the evidences of public debt taken in payment, the sum of $108,590,686 38. This sum, then, of over one hundred and eighty million of dollars, constitutes the aggregate which the Government has received, either in cash or in the extinguishment of its outstanding liabilities, from the sales of the public domain up to the close of the year 1839.

The whole costs of the public lands, including existing liabilities of the Government, on account of Indian treaties, if any reliance can be placed upon the official communications made from the public departments of our Government, may be put down at - - - $192,604,636 09

And the whole receipts into the Treasury, from the sales, amount only to - - - - - 108,590,686 38

Leaving a balance against the public lands of - - - $84,013,949 71

It will be at once seen that I have not credited the public lands with the special grants which have, from time to time, been made to States, to corporations, and to individuals, for various objects. Nor have I credited the public lands with the grants made as donations to the officers and soldiers of the Revolution, or to the soldiers of the last war, for the reason that the Treasury has not been enriched a dollar by these donations and grants. And it will be seen that I have not, in the estimate of costs, included any thing for the expenses of the land department, since the 30th September, 1838.

But my purpose has been attained. My object has been to go so far into this examination, as to ascertain, with sufficient certainty, the state of the account between the lands and the Treasury. I could not regard the proposition submitted by the Senator from Kentucky with any favor, independent of all constitutional scruples, if it should appear that the Treasury has been taxed, rather than enriched, by the public lands.

If there is any truth in figures, the Treasury has been, and is liable to be, taxed over eighty millions of dollars for the costs and management of the public domain, beyond the receipts from that source of the public revenue. No matter whether the balance against the lands be eighty, or less than eighty millions. The fact is undeniable, that millions and tens of millions have been disbursed at the Treasury, on account of the public lands, beyond the receipts from the proceeds of their sales; and what is proposed to be done? Collect from the lands enough to discharge this balance at the Treasury? No, sir; with this amount charged upon the lands, it is now proposed to take away that source of revenue; to deprive the Treasury of the benefit of the usual receipts from the sales of the land; and to distribute those receipts periodically among the States for local objects, or to relieve them from their indebtedness.

I presume it to be the purpose of the Senator from Kentucky, should his last resolution be adopted, to follow it up with a bill having a retrospective operation, and thus to carry into effect, to some extent, the provisions of the land bill, which has, at former sessions, been before the Senate. In pursuance of the deposite act of 1836, the whole receipts into the Treasury, from the lands for that year, and nearly all for the year preceding, were placed with the States; and I trust that the Senator's bill will commence with the close of 1836, and will take from the Treasury the receipts from the lands of 1837, 1838, and 1839, making an aggregate of over fifteen million of dollars. This sum would thus be drawn from the Treasury by the retrospective operation of the project, and its prospective operation would continue so long as the Government itself should continue.

That portion of the public lands purchased from France, Spain, and the State of Georgia, amounting to more than twenty millions of dollars, has been paid for from the public Treasury. The means have been drawn from the people; the products of their labor have been taxed to meet the exactions of their Government for those objects; and every man in the community who has consumed a single article, paying duty, has been obliged to contribute to the wants of the Treasury. The people believed that all the disbursements required in the acquisition and management of the public domain would, in due time, be repaid to the Treasury by receipts from that source of the public revenue.

The man in the remotest corner of New Hampshire—he who lives in the fastnesses of her mountains, has contributed towards the purchase of the public lands. And would that man be benefited by a distribution to his State of her ratable proportion of the fifteen millions of dollars? No, sir. The three hundred and fifty thousand dollars to which New Hampshire would be entitled upon the principle of division adopted by the act of 1836, would not yield to him any pecuniary advantage, and could not be appropriated so as to afford an equal and just benefit to all. If the States expend the money upon local objects—if they expend it in the payment of debts contracted for local objects—the effect would be the same. But a limited portion of the community would or could derive any practical benefits from such a distribution. The yeomanry of the country; the great body of the tax payers, who live remote from railroads and canals, would find no relief from their taxation from any such distribution of the public revenues. So far from it, they would be forced to bear their present burdens, to enrich the capitalists of their own States. There can be no distribution to the States of portions of the public revenue, with the least semblance of equal justice. Such distributions will inevitably tend to increase the burdens of the many, for the exclusive benefit of the few.

Regarding this measure as I do, as at war with all the great objects for which this Government was formed—regarding it as an act of inevitable and manifest injustice to the great body of the tax payers of the country—I cannot give to it my support. I should be doing that which my own judgment would condemn. I should be inflicting an act of monstrous injustice upon my State, and an act of cruel oppression upon her people.

Mr. President, if the last resolution of the Senator from Kentucky shall be adopted—if there shall be a consequent legislation, by Congress, corresponding with its spirit, then, as I have before said, will the independence of the States be prostrated. If, in any form, there shall be a distribution of any portion of the public revenue for the purpose of carrying on and completing local objects, or for the purpose of paying State debts, the consequence to the States themselves would be fatal to their pride, and repugnant to their love of liberty—would paralyze those energies of character, and break down those habits of industry, for which the descendants of our Revolutionary fathers have been most truly distinguished. As I would reverence the independence and sovereignty of the States—as I would sacredly protect the rights and immunities of our State Governments—as I would preserve, unimpaired, the moral character, the energy and the industry of the American people, I would oppose this scheme and project in every possible form. I look upon it as tending to excite those passions and prejudices among the members of the Confederacy, fatal to the harmony, peace, and perpetuity of the Union.

If the proposition shall be carried out, the time cannot be far distant when profusion will take the place of economy in all public expenditures; when the lofty independence of the people would give way to cringing and abject servility; when the noble spirit of State power and of State sovereignty would be degraded and debased by the uncontrolled and omnipotent influence of money. As an American, I cannot contemplate this project in any of its tendencies, or in any of its bearings, with satisfaction. It would prove most injurious to national as well as to individual prosperity and character.

There can be, Mr. President, no practical benefit resulting to any State by the adoption of such a project. In the first place, the money cannot be spared from the Treasury. The wants of the Government will find use for all its means. The statements presented to us by the head of the Treasury Department, furnish clear and conclusive evidence, that if five millions only is withdrawn annually from the Treasury for distribution, that being the estimated amount of the annual revenue arising from the sales of the public lands, the same amount must be returned to the Treasury to meet the requirements of the Government. There is no ambiguity in the exhibit of the Secretary upon this matter. It is clear as light, and perfectly intelligible to every man. The Treasury then cannot annually, from the means within its control, furnish this sum for distribution, and be prepared to answer the usual appropriations made by Congress. This fact is undeniable. There is no surplus money, on hand, all the available means are wanted for public use. And does it not occur that such a distribution as is contemplated at a time like this, would work great injustice to the New England States. New Hampshire, for instance, upon the supposition that fifteen millions is to be distributed among the States in proportion to her representation in both Houses of Congress, would receive a fraction over three hundred and fifty thousand dollars. In same way a like sum would have to be returned to the Treasury. The only course which could be resorted to to supply the deficiency, would be to collect the sum thus abstracted, from imports.

In such an event my own State would be obliged to bear an unequal share of the burden, because it is known that her consumption of articles paying duty would exceed the average consumption of interior States having an equal representation. While, then, she would receive $350,000 as her share of the distribution, she would be obliged to pay back, by indirect taxation, fifty per cent. at least, in addition, to supply the deficiency occasioned by the distribution. And here we have a faint expose of the inequality and injustice which this measure would produce in practice. It cannot bear examination. Its gross and palpable partiality in operation must strike every man who will attentively consider it. It is, in my judgment, an imposition upon the intelligence of the people; while you propose to distribute with one hand to the States, with the other you take, indirectly, from the hard earnings of the people, the amount thus abstracted. It is, in short, but a proposition to collect a given sum into the Treasury, and to distribute that sum to the States, and then to turn round and draw from the people the same sum into the Treasury, subject to all the costs and charges of collection. Not only the direct influence which this measure would produce upon the character of States and communities should prevent its adoption, but there are considerations of public policy policy which should stay the progress of this project.

The inevitable effect of such a scheme, if carried into full effect, would be to augment and keep up the tariff—an effect which cannot be contemplated but with emotions of intense solicitude for the well being of our country.

A protective tariff seems to be among the heresies of the times. The doctrine does not find universal support from that class designed more especially to be benefited by such a policy. The manufacturer himself is prepared to admit that.]

"It is because the provisions and all other means of living, and the rate of wages, are lower abroad than they are in our own country; that foreign manufactures are afforded here cheaper than our own." The legislation of Congress hitherto, with a view to the protection of manufactures, has had no other effect than alternately to stimulate bank expansions, extensive foreign importations, and then, for self-preservation, to be followed with such extensive bank contractions, as inevitably to lead to the embarrassment, if not to the entire prostration of our manufacturing establishments. Legislation for the exclusive benefit of any one interest, is at war with the genius of our free institutions, and should meet the determined opposition of every patriot. Equal liberty, equal protection, equal privileges, equal and exact justice to all, favoritism to none, are maxims interwoven in every part of our Constitution. They are the pillars on which rests the superstructure of our Government. They should be the cherished sentiments of every friend of our country. For the purpose of showing the fluctuations and embarrassments of the manufacturers, which have, from time to time, occurred, I have subjoined the following table, which has fallen in my way, and which marks their rise and fall, their prosperity and adversity, and gives a sufficient reason for these alternations:

Year.	Operation of Banks.	Imports.	State of Man'f'g.
1817	Expansion begun—paper depreciated.	$99,000,000	Good times.
1818	Expansion till July, then a contraction, specie 10 per cent. premium.	122,000,000	First of the year good—last part grew dull.
1819	Further contraction.	87,000,000	Gen. suspension.
1820	Continued do.	76,000.000	Much depressed.
1821	Expansion begun in spring; speculation active in October.	63,000,000	Good times.
1822	Contraction from May through the year.	83,000,000	Operatives dismissed.
1823	Banks begin to extend.	72,000,000	Manufact'ing revives.
1824	Issues increased,	81,000,000	Good times.
1825	Paper increases till July—then begins a contraction—and banks break.	96,000,000	Manufact's stop.
1826	Contraction continued.	85,000,000	3,000 weavers of work in Ladelphia in
1827	Money plenty.	79,000,000	Good times.
1828	Money very scarce in May and September.	89,000,000	Great distress.
1829	Money scarce till July—then plenty.	74,000,000	Great distress till July.
1830	Money plenty.	71,000,000	Good times.
1831	Money plenty till October, then contraction.	103,000,000	Good times till October.
1832	Pressure.	101,000,000	Manf. distressed.
1833	Expansion, new banks.	108,000,000	Good times.
1834	PANIC.	127,000,000	Factories stopped from fright.
1835	Expansion.	150,000,000	Good times.
1836	Vast expansion, and the world mad in speculation.	190,000,000	Wonderful good times.
1837	Banks suspend, paper depreciates, and exchanges bad.	141,000,000	Manf. prostrate.
1838	Resumption in May and increase of paper.	114,000,000	Good times.
1839	Half the banks supended, exchanges bad.	158,000,000	Manf. embarrassed.

The progress of things, as shown by this table, for 22 years past, has been, with little variation, a bank expansion one year, increased importations the next, and bank contractions and prostration of manufacturers the year following. Thus the expansion begun in 1817, and continued until July, 1818, was followed by an increase of imports from ninety nine to 122 million dollars, and this was followed by a universal overthrow of the manufacturing interest in 1819. These events have succeeded each other in the same order so invariably, that we are constrained to consider them as cause and effect. Increase of paper money raises prices, that leads to a large import of foreign goods, to profit by our high prices; this overstocks our market, and, aided by the bank contraction, which invariably takes place upon a large import, depresses the price of our manufactures below the cost of production. Hence embarrassments, breaking up of business, and bankruptcy.

The question involved is not whether we shall establish a protective tariff; but whether we shall have recourse to a tariff for revenue, and for revenue alone, and whether that revenue shall be collected for distribution, are the questions presented. Such a tariff, for such an object, the country would never bear: and I greatly mistake the indications of the times, if the country would sustain any such system of indirect taxation for any object.

Mr. President, I have said all I wish to offer, and will add, in conclusion, that, in my judgment, the true policy should be to keep down the tariff—to avoid all unnecessary taxation—to apply all our means for the legitimate uses of the Federal Government—to grant no exclusive privileges—to sustain every class with equal justice—to encourage settlements upon our public domain—to induce cultivators to become the owners of the soil. Thus we will add strength to our Government, by increasing the power, the virtue, and the intelligence of our beloved country.

NEW JERSEY ELECTION.

SPEECH OF MR. CLIFFORD, OF MAINE,

In the House of Representatives, January 10 and 11, 1840—On the resolution of Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, proposing to refer all the documents and testimony in relation to the New Jersey disputed election to the committee on that subject; and Mr. BELL'S substitute therefor, declaring that the gentlemen without certificates should not be qualified.

Mr. CLIFFORD said, it was true that this subject had occupied most of the time of the House since the assembling of Congress; and it was also true that the time had been chiefly spent in listening to the speeches of gentlemen who sustain the claims of the members commissioned by the Governor of New Jersey. Thus far very little had bee said in reply, by those who oppose the pretensions of fraud, and undertake to uphold the rights of the Representatives elected by the people.

The first three weeks of the session, he believed, were entirely devoted to the subject; and he had supposed that, after the decision upon the final proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] the matter would have been suffered, without farther debate or delay, to go to the Committee of Elections, especially after that gentleman himself had proclaimed that the victory was with the party in the majority; that the battle had been fought, and that he and his friends had lost it. But, when the honorable chairman of that committee [Mr. CAMPBELL] proposed a resolution having that object in view, new obstacles were thrown in the way, in the form of embarrassing amendments, contravening the past action of the House, implying censure of the majority, and thus re-opening the whole merits of the controversy. He disclaimed interposing objection to any proper amendment or to the usual range of debate; but he had a right to complain when gentlemen pass by the question of reference—he would not say by subterfuge—but for the purpose of reviewing the course of the majority, especially as they had been permitted to indulge in severity of remark, while he and others, who have equal rights, had not yet had an opportunity of saying one word upon the subject. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOTTS,] and others who preceded him, had taken this course; and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RANDOLPH] had been permitted, again and again, to occupy the time of the House in reiterating the same arguments, and reviewing the whole matter connected with the New Jersey election. Up to this time, Mr. C. said, he had contented himself with giving a silent vote on the various questions that had been presented in relation to this subject, taking care that the effect of every vote should be to protect the rights of the people; and he would still have continued to pursue that course, had it not been for some remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, who made it the ground of complaint that those opposed to him on this question had not entered sufficiently into the discussion, and insinuated that their silence was occasioned, not by a desire to avoid a useless consumption of time, but from a conscious weakness in the justice of their cause. Under these circumstances, and as the course of the House had been called in question, with very severe animadversion, he would ask its indulgence while he explained the reasons and motives which had governed him and his friends in the course they had taken, promising that he would not consume more time than was necessary, and that he would be as brief in the remarks he was about to offer as the nature of the subject would permit.

But, before he proceeded to the points he proposed to discuss, he would ask permission to do an act of justice to an individual who had been denied the usual privilege of speaking for himself. It was known to all that the official conduct of the Clerk had been repeatedly censured, and, as he believed, unwarrantably, during the pendency of the controversy growing out of the New Jersey contested election. It was equally true that he applied to the House to permit him to make a written statement, explanatory of his conduct, which courtesy was denied him; and, as it was now made a ground of attack, that the majority was not disposed to hazard their position by putting frth the reasons of their course, or by participating in the discussion, after having refused the Clerk permission to read his statement, he begged leave to do it himself, and if necessary to enable him to do so, he would read it, as a part of his speech, and he presumed no gentleman would object to it.

Mr. PECK objected.

Mr. CLIFFORD trusted that no gentleman on that floor would persist in the objection to his reading a paper which the CLERK had offered to the House in explanation of his conduct; which had so often been called in question by the most sweeping denunciations. He, Mr. C., did not claim to have much experience here, but he knew something of legislative proceedings, and he had never known this courtesy to be objected to but in two instances: one of which was a few days since, which was immediately overruled, and the other in the Legislature of Maine, where the request was denied, because the member was manifestly endeavoring to consume time unnecessarily.

Leave being granted—yeas 110, nays 68—

The CLERK read the following statement:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES U. S. Dec. 3, 1839.

Congress having adopted no general law to ascertain the title of those who claim a seat in the House of Representatives, nor any rule to organize the House itself, in the meaning of the Constitution, the following investigation is undertaken with the view of eliciting from former precedents, and past usage, those general principles of parliamentary law which should be received and acknowledged until modified by positive enactment.

The Commons House of Parliament, in Great Britain, from time immemorial, has been organized after the strictest mode of legal processes. Whenever a Parliament was to be called, the King gave warrant to the Lord Chancellor to summon the Lords spiritual and temporal, and to issue writs of election for the several counties, cities and boroughs, directed to the sheriffs of the same. By virtue of this authority the sheriffs sent their precepts to the election officers, commanding them to hold elections in those places entitled to representation in Parliament. Returns of the elections, in the form of indentures, were sent to the sheriff, and by him attached to the original writ, and forwarded to the Crown office, whence they originated, and were there filed. From these, in one authentic book, the names of all the knights, citizens, and burgesses were certified to the Clerk of the House of Commons. On the day the writs were returnable, (being the day for the meeting of Parliament,) the Lord Steward of the King's Household, in an ante-room, attended by the Clerk of the Crown, and Clerk of the Commons, with the rolls of such names of the Commons as were returned, commanded the rolls to be called, and those who answered to their names, received the oaths required by law. This ceremony completed, the members took their seats in the House, and waited a summons from the King to come into his presence. After hearing the King's speech, leave was then granted them to assemble in their usual place of meeting, and to make a choice of one from among themselves to be their mouth and Speaker. The nomination was generally made by one of the King's officers, and agreed to without a division. If, however, others were named, the House proceeded to the question, and directed the Clerk, "sitting at the board, (as the order is, before the Speaker be chosen,) to make the question."

From this mode of procedure, two important conclusions are to be drawn: First, that the Commons were regularly organized and constituted a House, capable of propounding and deciding questions, before the election of a Speaker. When the roll had been called, members had answered to their names, taken the oaths prescribed by law, and seated themselves in their usual place of meeting, there was then a House of Commons. The appointment of one to be their mouthpiece, was important for their own convenience, but not necessary to constitute a House. There were Parliaments before Speakers, is an ancient and significant phrase. Indeed we are told by historians that at first there were no Speakers; but some person was selected as "spokesmen" for each particular occasion—that then the same individual was nominated for the entire session, qui avait les paroles pur les Communes; and not until the time of Richard II, was he styled parlour pur les Communes, or Speaker of the Commons.

A memorable case occurred in the time of James II, 1678, when the Commons were without a Speaker for an entire week, and at last prorogued without having made an election. They at first had selected Sir Francis Seymour, and presented him to the King for confirmation, supposing the ancient usage in that respect to be a mere ceremony. But the King, wisking to test the strength of his prerogative, refused to sanction the nomination. They then returned to their own House, without any one at their head, Sir Francis not making his appearance. This occurrence was on Friday; and until the next Thursday the House was engaged in long and warm discussions on various subjects, adjourning at the same time from day to day. Propositions were made to appoint a chairman, and rejected. Committees were appointed to hold conferences with the King; others with the House of Lords; others, again, to search the records for precedents to guide their proceedings; and after a week thus spent in fruitless efforts, they were disbanded without coming to a conclusion among themselves, or an agreement with the King. This case is to be found in Grey's Debates, vol. 6th, page 404.

The old Colonial Assemblies, having the British Parliament as a model, were organized in the same way, and our present State Legislatures also, varying only in a few unimportant particulars. Whenever, at the time appointed, members presented themselves at the seat of Government, assembled in their usual place of meeting, took the oaths prescribed by law, and ascertained a quorum to be present by the calling of a roll, there was then duly constituted a House competent to entertain and decide all propositions touching the privilege of members, the claim to contested seats, and whatever else that might appertain to their more complete organization.

There are doubtless many gentlemen here present, who remember cases similar to the one referred to in the British Parliament, where their own Legislatures were engaged for days in discussing and deciding questions, before the election of a Speaker—that office being regarded, as it undoubtedly is, a mere instrument, a labor-saving machine to themselves.

The second conclusion to be drawn from an observation of the mode of organizing Parliament, is the extreme liability to fraud, and the imposition of spurious members. None but those whose names are recorded on some return filed in the Crown office, are permitted to take their seats. It is obvious, therefore, that two officers alone, or either one, the sheriff of the county who makes the return, and the clerk of the Crown who files it, have it in their power to make such returns as they please.

Perceiving the great advantage he possessed, the King, at an early period, attempted to interfere, and dictate who should be returned to the Commons. In 1603, Sir Francis Goodwyn was elected from the county of Berkshire; returns were made in due form, and sent to the Crown office. The King pronounced him ineligible, and ordered the Chancellor to issue a new writ; which was done. Sir John Fortesque, one of the King's council, was elected, the returns filed, and his name placed on the rolls of Parliament.

The sturdy and free hearted yeomanry of those old days promptly resisted this procedure; and in process of time succeeded in wresting from the King his assumed prerogative of interfering with the return of members filed in his office of chancery. Driven from this stronghold, he resorted to the next which proved to be the most vulnerable point. By means of secret agents and emissaries, he completely effected his object, in bribing and suborning the sheriffs and their assistants. The books of law, and the reports of parliamentary decisions, are absolutely filled with cases of defective and partial returns, double returns, and false returns, knowingly and fraudulently made by those who had taken an oath to act justly and impartially, but who could not resist the rewards or the threats of a monarch and his nobility. So thoroughly corrupt had Parliament become in consequence of the frauds practised on the returns of its members, a rule was adopted, in process of time, by which those returns were very little regarded. Perceiving that a rigid adherence to legal processes and technicalities had not only broken down the character and integrity of the Commons, but was fast becoming the means of undermining the liberties of the people, they soon learned to draw a just and obvious distinction between a civil and political process; holding that a strict interpretation of the one might screen the community from the grinding exaction of creditors, while a strict adherence to the other was only the means of corrupting public officers and of practising a fraud on the rights of the people.

So early as 1707, an order was adopted by the Commons, "that all petitions at any new Parliament, relating to elections and returns, be delivered to the Clerk of the House, and be laid by him on the table before the Speaker was chosen." And it was subsequently ordered that those cases should be considered before proceeding to any other business. In the mean time, those claiming the disputed seats, were not allowed to participate in the proceedings; indeed were prohibited by severe penalties.

Thus we see, that even in England, where the rights of the people are not regarded of paramount importance, the House of Commons in self-defence, to protect itself from corruption, and the intrusion of spurious members, was compelled to disregard the technicalities of law, to look beyond the mere formalities of a return, which was no longer prima facie evidence of membership, but an instrument of fraud, to pass by all those intermediate stages, so readily and constantly perverted, and look at the actual state of the case—the elections, as they really took place among those who had "the right of election."

In some of the States of this Union, a similar course is pursued, though their laws, if strictly interpreted, and rigidly adhered to, would place it in the power of the Executive to agurnise a Legislature in the first instance, after their own will; and thereby contravene the wishes of the people, and perpetuate the power in their own hands.

In Virginia, for example, a strict interpretation of the law would place the organization of the Legislature, in the first instance, in the hands of the Executive Council.

But they have never interpreted the law as conferring any power on them, merely to administer the prescribed oaths; they never examined the certificates of members, or took cognizance of their title in any way.

A high Executive officer of Pennsylvania, acting under laws not more rigid than those of England or the State above alluded to, but feeling it his duty to follow the minutest technicality in regard to returns, rejecting all those of a conflicting nature, and presenting to the Legislature those only he deemed official, was well nigh involving that ancient and patriotic Commonwealth in revolution and civil war.

Had the Secretary of State presented both returns from the county of Philadelphia, and explained the circumstances so far as they had come to his knowledge, he would have relieved himself from a very delicate position, thrown the responsibility of deciding the case where it properly belonged, on the House of Representatives and the Senate, and, in all probability, would have prevented those distressing scenes which followed the course he actually pursued. And much of the testimony given before a committee of the Legislature appointed to examine into the causes of the difficulties at Harrisburg, and many other recent events, all prove that, had he pursued the course above indicated, no difficulties would have arisen, and general satisfaction would have been given to the wise and candid of all parties.

Congress, however, both in regard to the return of its members and its mode of organization, is governed by no statute or prescribed rule of any kind. Originating, as it did, under circumstances altogether different from those of the Commons House of Parliament, it must necessarily, for its own guidance, have given birth to a set of principles entirely at variance from those of a Legislature, which sprung, in the first instance, from the will of a monarch, and was only enabled, after many generations of contest between their own privileges and the prerogatives of the Crown, to establish something like the independence and stability of a representative body.

Congress, as it is well known, took its origin in the conventions or assemblies of deputies sent by the Colonies to consult for their defence and mutual welfare in a time of common danger. The first that met in Philadelphia, in 1774, was composed of men possessing every variety of credentials. Some were deputed by the Colonial Legislature, others by popular assemblies, and others again by mere committees of safety.

Assembling, however, at the imminent hazard of their fortunes and their lives, the simple presence of any man was a sufficient guarantee of his honesty and zeal. Coming together for the first time, personally as strangers to each other, but well known as the bold defenders of a common cause, they forthwith, making no question of each other's authority, proceeded to elect a President to preside over their deliberations, and a secretary to record their proceedings. After they had formed themselves into a deliberative body, they then caused the credentials of those present to be read and approved. The Congress which assembled in May, 1775, was organized in the same way—not calling for the credentials of members until the House had been formed. After the articles of Confederation had been adopted, the mode of organizing Congress was varied. The credentials were first produced and passed upon, before they proceeded to the election of officers.

In the second Congress, which met under the articles of Confederation, the delegates produced their credentials in the first instance, which were read and referred to a committee "to report thereon as soon as may be." The committee reported the next day, and, all being approved, they then proceeded to the election of president and secretary. This preliminary examination by a committee, was never practised before or after the Congress which met in 1784. In 1785, they handed in their credentials, which were read without being referred, and then proceeded to their elections. At the next Congress, in 1786, the credentials were referred to a committee after the election of officers, but were not reported on until a late period.

The journals after the First Congress, which met under our present Constitution, run in these words. "The following members of the House of Representatives appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats." And such is the tenor of every journal until a very recent date. Thus, it appears, that from the first time we had any organized system for the government of the States, some kind of credentials or evidence of membership, was expected and required before any one could participate in the deliberations of Congress. But the nature of those credentials, and the mode of determining their validity, have always been various, and to this day, are not directed by any general law. The Constitution has conferred on Congress the power of adopting a system of general regulations in regard to the elections and the returns. But this provision justly excited the jealousy of those who were friendly to the independence of the States. It was warmly resisted by many of the State conventions assembled to adopt the Constitution; and the point was only yielded on the promise that the Constitution should be amended in that particular so soon as it had been adopted. Accordingly, at a very early period in the First Congress, Mr. Burke, of South Carolina, moved the following amendment: "Congress shall not alter, modify, or interfere in the times, places, or manner of holding elections of Senators or Representatives, except when any State shall refuse, or neglect, or be unable, by invasion or rebellion, to make such elections." It was argued, in favor of this amendment, "that the clause of the Constitution conferring on Congress the power to regulate elections was obnoxious to almost every State; that it put it in the power of that body to establish a Government of an arbitrary kind. If the United States are desirous of controlling the people, they can do it by virtue of the powers given them in the 4th section of the 1st article; and whenever they choose to exercise those powers, then farewell to the rights of the people, even to elect their own Representatives. When did a confederated Government have the power of determining on the mode of their own election? In the order of things, that power should rest with the States respectively, because they can vary their regulations to accommodate the people, in a more convenient manner than can be done in any general law whatever." Such were the arguments advanced in defence of the amendment; but it was lost by a majority of five votes. So obnoxious, however, is any general law of elections, that though many arguments of convenience and expediency might be urged in its favor, none has ever been adopted; repeated attempts have been made, but always signally failed; and we may venture to say that none ever will be adopted, so long as the great and important doctrine of State Rights is regarded.

In the meantime, the mode of procedure in regard to the organization of the House, and the admission of members, seems to have varied at different times, and never controlled by any general parliamentary principle. Of late years, those evidences of membership, called credentials, are forwarded by very few of the States, and are rarely ever presented by members; so that the phrase found in the older journals—"presented their credentials"—has not been inserted for the last twenty years, because it expressed an untruth, none ever being presented.

It has now become a matter of vital importance to elicit from past experience and former precedents some general principle, governing all cases, and admitted as a sufficient rule by which the title of membership in the first instance shall be determined, and the House provisionally organized. And for this purpose, bearing in mind that this provisional organization is a mere incipient stage towards a more perfect legislative body, and always subject to the control of a majority, there can be no better rule than that which has been practised on by Congress from a time that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. The rolls of the House of Representatives have always been made up from those names who, from common notoriety, and the general consent of all parties, were acknowledged to be members of Congress. Common fame and newspaper reports may appear to be a slender reliance for so important a matter; but, when further examined, will prove of highest and most trustworthy authority. The press has become a fourth estate in the Government of civilized society. All matters appertaining to elections, returns, and public characters, are thoroughly sifted, and made known to the whole world. Our country, too, ever has been, and ever will be, divided into two contending parties; these principles of hostility are implanted in the human heart, and, in some form, will ever exhibit themselves, and a wakeful jealousy will ever keep them observant of each other's conduct; so that by means of these opposing elements, with the aid of the press, the truth, and the whole truth, in regard to any political matter, may be as well known to those who live in the remotest parts of the Union, as to those who were eye witnesses of the transaction.

Our elections are not held in obscure boroughs, and by a few electors, as in England. Fifty thousand people are interested in the result of each election. An active and warm canvass commences between the contending parties for many days before the voting is commenced; the candidates in many States go from house to house, from village to village, discussing important questions, and setting forth their respective claims. In other States the same publicity is given to their proceedings through the press. When the election comes on, hundreds in open day press to the polls to give their votes. The progress of the election is watched from the beginning by suspicious, vigilant, and anxious partisans of the respective candidates.

The result, when announced, is known through the entire district, spread on the wings of the wind through the State, and soon becomes the subject of speculation and of interest to the intelligent portion of fifteen millions of people. It is obvious, therefore, that by this process it is utterly impossible for any fraud or deception to be practised without immediate detection. The precise state of the poll, the number of votes given, the exact majority, and all questions and disputes growing out of the elections, become the most prominent part of the history of the day; and no private papers, (as all credentials are,) however well authenticated, can enable the proper officer to make up a more complete and satisfactory roll of members than he can form from the current history of the times. He is made as well satisfied as he can be of any human event, by common notoriety and the consent of all parties, that certain men, (or more properly, as the individual may be unknown,) certain names, are elected as members of Congress; and the next most important point is to identify the name with the individual actually elected.

The mode pursued by Congress in this respect also, is a plain and simple one. When the day appointed by the Constitution and the laws for the meeting of Congress has arrived, and those who are members, or claim to be members, present themselves in their usual place of meeting; and when, at the appointed or usual hour, the officer to whom has been entrusted, by long and undisputed usage, the duty of making a roll of members on the principles above indicated, presents himself, announces that he is about to call the names of those who are members of the House of Representatives—when he actually calls a name, and one rises from his seat, or audibly answers to that name, there can be no question in the mind of any one that he is the individual actually elected and entitled to his seat. Under color of a piece of paper or parchment, which he can procure by fraud or bribery, and under protection of the secret ballot box, one might have the hardihood to present himself, go through the forms of initiation, and aid in doing infinite mischief—in subverting the Constitution itself—before he could be detected; and then, by aid of his own voice, might save himself from ejection and punishment.

But here no one can conceive the possibility of such a thing. It is not in the human heart to strain itself up to the practice of a fraud, surrounded by existing circumstances. Silence and secresy are essential to the perpetration of crime. But here are assembled, in open day, the Representatives of six and twenty States; and a vast concourse of people from all parts of the Union, anxiously watching the minutest procedure. Can it be possible that one would rise in such a presence, and answer to a name that is not his, and claim a seat to which he has no title? It is not in man to act so base a part. When, therefore, the roll has been called through, and a sufficient number have answered to their names to constitute a quorum, there is then a House of Representatives, as contemplated by the Constitution; for it says, each House shall elect its own officers. As there are Parliaments, so there must be a House of Representatives, before the election of Speaker. And there is no other way in which a House can be constituted, than the one just described. When that process has been completed, there is then a House of Representatives, competent to entertain and decide all questions touching the privilege of members, the claims to contested seats, and all matters appertaining to their more complete organization. They cannot enter on the ordinary business of legislation as prescribed and limited by the Constitution, because they have not taken the oath to support the Constitution: which, by some inadvertence, is required to be administered, not by a judicial officer, but by the Speaker himself after his election.

While thus engaged in the adjustment of preliminary questions, the House must be governed by the common law of Parliament, without which no deliberative body can exist. It is true they are not bound by the rules of a preceding Congress; but those rules, like statutes, do not create or destroy, but only limit and define a general principle. Take away the limitations, and the principle exists in its original force.

When thus constituted and organized into a House of Representatives, it is then the duty of the proper officer to lay before them all contested cases, and the evidence in his possession, that they may proceed, according to the Constitution, to decide on the elections, returns, and qualifications of those contesting. After the most laborious investigation into all the precedents, from the earliest times, both in our own country and in England, I have come to the conclusion that this is the only safe and proper course to be taken.*

Though long usage, and the necessity of the case, have imposed on the Clerk of the House the duty of making a roll of members, to be called at the opening of Congress, yet he has no authority whatever to interpose in doubtful cases, or throw any obstacle in the way of an immediate adjustment by the House. Where there are no difficulties, his course is plain; but in all matters of doubt, he is bound to present the evidence in his possession, and throw the responsibility of deciding, where it has been placed by the Constitution, on the Representatives of the people. No party can take exceptions, no individual can be aggrieved by this course It will be as much in the power of the House to act on them when called at the end of the roll, as if they had been called in the regular routine, according to past usage. And by the mode here proposed, one great advantage will be gained in having a House organized and competent to entertain and decide all questions touching the privilege of members, before any contested cases shall come before them for consideration.

Believing that Congress, originating in peculiar circumstances, and being a Government of confederated States, must necessarily be controlled by laws different from those of the House of Commons, or the State Legislatures exercising jurisdiction over a consolidated mass—believing that the present mode of testing and recognising members is more efficacious than any positive enactment can be made—that it is more open, impartial, and consistent with our federative system, and that it is less liable to be perverted, under color of law and strict technicalities, into an instrument of fraud—believing that when a roll, made up of the names of those who, by common notoriety and the general consent of all parties, were recognised as members of the House of Representatives, has been called through, and a sufficient number have answered to their names to constitute a quorum, that then there is a House of Representatives as understood by the Constitution, controlled by the common law of Parliament, and competent to decide all questions touching the privileges of members—and believing that then, and not before, all contested cases, with the accompanying testimony, should be laid before them for consideration, I feel it a solemn duty incumbent on me to proceed in this mode to organize the House, so far as necessity, and unbroken usage from time immemorial, have thrown that task on the Clerk of a preceding Congress.

Having made a roll of those names who, by general notoriety and the common consent of all parties, were members of Congress, I prepared a brief statement of the New Jersey contested case, in the following words, which it was my intention to lay before the House so soon as a quorum was ascertained to be present:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY.

DOUBLE RETURN.

There is, in my possession, commissions of the Governor of New Jersey, addressed to JOHN BANKER AYCRIGG, WILLIAM HALSTED, JOHN P. B. MAXWELL, JOSEPH F. RANDOLPH, CHARLES C. STRATTON, and THOMAS JONES YORK, esquires, of which the following is a copy:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,

To JOHN B. AYCRIGG, of the county of Bergen, esquire, GREETING:

It appearing to the Governor of the State of New Jersey, and the Privy Council thereof, that you have been elected by the people of the State of New Jersey to represent the said State in the House of Representatives of the Twenty-Sixth Congress of the United States, you, the said JOHN B. AYCRIGG, are therefore commissioned to represent the State of New Jersey in the House of Representatives of the United States, during the Twenty-sixth Congress. In testimony whereof, &c.

[Signed.] WM. PENNINGTON.

By the Governor:

JAMES D. WESTCOTT, Secretary of State.

(The same in relation to the other five members.)

I have, also, in possession the certificate of the Secretary of State, of the State of New Jersey, of which the following is a copy:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY, ss.

I, James D. Westcott, Secretary of the State of New Jersey, do hereby certify that, upon a careful examination of all the returns made by the several clerks of the respective counties in said State, and filed in my office, and also of returns of votes given in the townships of South Amboy, in the county of Middlesex and of Millville, in the county of Cumberland, verified by the affidavits of the several township officers of election in said townships respectively; which townships returns were not included in the returns of the clerks of said counties of Middlesex and Cumberland, and which were directed to be filed by the Governor, and now remain on file in my office, of the election for members to represent this State in the House of Representatives of the Twenty-sixth Congress of the United States, held on the ninth and tenth days of October, anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, it appears that PHILEMON DICKERSON received 28,453 votes, MANNING FORCE 28,314 votes, PETER D. VROOM 28,492 votes, DANIEL B. RYALL 28,441 votes, WILLIAM R. COOPER 28,455 votes, JOSEPH KILLE 28,426 votes, JOHN B. AYCRIGG 28,294 votes, JOHN P. B. MAXWELL 28,383 votes, WILLIAM HALSTED 28,337 votes, JOSEPH F. RANDOLPH 28,427 votes, CHARLES C. STRATTON 28,396 votes, and THOMAS JONES YORK 28,321 votes, and by which it appears that, at said election, PHILEMON DICKERSON, PETER D. VROOM, DANIEL B. RYALL, WILLIAM R. COOPER, JOSEPH KILLE, and JOSEPH F. RANDOLPH, received a majority of the whole number of votes given in the State of New Jersey for Representatives of said State in the House of Representatives of the Twenty-sixth Congress of the United States. In testimony whereof, &c.

[Signed.] JAMES D. WESTCOTT.

This to my mind is clearly a case of double return—a conflict between two authentic public documents. Which ought to have preference is not my province to decide. Each State has its own mode of conducting and publishing its elections. Some are content with the mere certificate of a sheriff, others adopt a more formal mode through the proclamation or commission of a Governor, but in either case there is nothing more than a mere ministerial function to be discharged. Whether a Governor or a sheriff, he is pro hac vice, only a conduct pipe, or medium through which the people convey their wishes to the individual elected, and the body to which he is accredited. If the Governor's commission amounted to more than that, it would lead to this absurdity, that one member of Congress would have a higher title than another to this seat. It would, also, lead to this consequence, that a Governor, by placing the commission under seal of the State in the hands of an individual, would make his title beyond dispute, and would finally place it in the hands of the State Executives, to return what members they pleased to Congress—a high prerogative claimed by the Kings of England, but indignantly rejected by the Commons at an early period.

I hold, therefore, that the Governor's commission or proclamation, like a sheriff's certificate, is nothing more than the prima facie evidence of an election, liable to be rebutted by other evidence of equal authenticity, as in this case by the certificate of the Secretary of State with the seal of his office, in which he certifies that "it appears that at said election, PHILEMON DICKERSON, PETER D. VROOM, DANIEL B. RYALL, WILLIAM R. COOPER, JOSEPH KILLE, and JOSEPH F. RANDOLPH, received a majority of the whole number of votes given in the said State of New Jersey for Representatives of said State in the House of Representatives of the Twenty-sixth Congress of the United States."

Not feeling it my duty to determine between an authentic document, which declares that certain men are elected members of Congress, and another document of equal credibility, which declares that certain other men have the majority of votes, I submit the case, with the evidence in my possession, to the consideration of the House

I prepared a statement, also, of the Pennsylvania case, in the following words:

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

THIRD CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT, DOUBLE RETURNS.

I have in my possession a certificate signed by three "judges of a general election, held at the several election districts, composing the Third Congressional district, on Tuesday, the 9th day of October, 1838," in which they "do certify that the following persons had the number of votes affixed to their respective names, to wit:

CHARLES NAYLOR had six thousand six hundred and sixty-nine votes - - - - - - - - - - 6,669

CHARLES J. INGERSOLL had five thousand eight hundred and ninety-four votes - - - - - - - - - 5,894

CHARLES NAYLOR having a majority of the votes polled, is elected a member of the twenty-sixth Congress," &c.

Accompanying this certificate, is a proclamation of the Governor of Pennsylvania, put forth on the 1st December, 1838, whereby it is published and declared "that CHARLES NAYLOR has been returned as duly elected in his Congressional District," &c.

In addition to these documents, and in conflict with them, I have a certificate signed by three other "judges of a general election held at the several election disctricts, composing the Third Congressional District of Pennsylvania, except the incorporated district of the Northern Liberties, which returns were rejected, on Tuesday the ninth day of October, 1838," in which they "do certify that the following persons had the number of votes affixed to their respective names, to wit:

CHARLES NAYLOR, three thousand three hundred and fifty-four votes - - - - - - - - - - 3,354

CHARLES J. INGERSOLL, three thousand nine hundred and fifteen votes - - - - - - - - - - 3,915

Accompanying this certificate, which was forwarded to the office of the House of Representatives on the 8th November, 1839, is a note, according to the law of Pennsylvania, addressed to the House of Representatives, by FR. R. SHUNK, esquire, Secretary of the Commonwealth, in which he states that, from the returns of a general election held on Tuesday, the 9th of October ,1838 ,in the Third Congressional district, "it appears that CHARLES J. INGERSOLL was duly elected to represent the said district in the 26th Congress."

At a subsequent period, to wit: on the 28th November, 1839, a proclamation of the Governor of Pennsylvania was received, which proclamation was put forth on the 25th of November, 1839, and declares "that CHARLES J. INGERSOLL, as aforesaid, has been returned as duly elected in the Third Congressional district, on the 9th of October, 1838, as a Representative of the people of this State in the Congress of the United States," &c.

Believing this to be a case of double returns, and that it is not my province to determine between the contesting parties, I submit it to the consideration of the House, which the Constitution has made the sole tribunal to judge of the election, returns and qualifications of its members.

Respectfully,

HUGH ALFRED GARLAND,
Acting Clerk of the House of Reps. U. S.

[Here, at the call of some member, the Clerk read an appendix to his statement, citing authorities in support thereof.]

Mr. CLIFFORD resumed, and said: It is no part of my intention to comment upon the paper just read, or in any manner to refer to the authorities appended to it, in support of its positions. The document is before the country, and my purpose is answered. It will speak for itself; breathing, as it does, the same spirit of conscious rectitude and manly independence which has characterized the conduct of the Clerk throughout. The argument is convincing and unanswerable, and the authorities full and explicit. It seems to me that every one not blinded by partisan feeling, and whose pride of opinion is not made inveterate by prejudice, must yield assent to its conclusions. But, whatever opinions may be expressed or entertained by the apologists of fraud, it is not going too far to say, that the author of the statement will receive from the candid of all parties the commendation due, and always accorded, to a faithful and unflinching discharge of duty, under circumstances involving high and delicate responsibility. It is true that public opinion, under the guidance of falsehood and misrepresentation, is sometimes severe, but the ultimate judgment of the people will do ample justice to every public servant, however elevated or humble his station may be.

It is not denied, and, if it were, immemoria usage has sanctioned the practice, as every one may know by examining the records of this House, that it was the duty of the Clerk to prepare a roll of the members, and to preside, in a qualified sense, during the first stages of organization, for it cannot be forgotten that he commenced the call of the States by general consent. But how should the roll be constituted? Of every one that makes claim to a seat? In double returns, the principle is inadmissible, and would work an outrage upon the Constitution itself, by increasing beyond limit the number of which the House is composed. In cases of controversy, shall the Clerk decide? This would be an assumption of power contravening the plainest principles of the Federal compact, and dangerous to the rights of the people of the several States, who have conferred no such power. What should be done? Why, to my mind, it is self evident that the roll should be made up of the undisputed names of the Representatives elect, and that contested cases should be referred to the House for decision. The ingenuity of man cannot devise any other course, in consonance with the spirit of the Constitution, without putting in peril the right of the people to choose their own Representatives.

But, sir, let me hasten to a more important inquiry touching the power of this House to ascertain its own members, before the election of "their Speaker, and other officers." It has been denied; and the best way to obviate the grounds of the denial, will be to know that it exists. During the three first weeks of the session, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] participated largely in the discussion, with a determination and perseverance which deserve a better cause, though I infer, from recent events, that his friends have more confidence in his ability to execute than to plan a campaign. The substance of his positions, as they have impressed themselves on my mind, may be stated in a few words, without attempting to give his language. He maintained that the return or commission of the Governor was prima facie evidence, for the person holding it, to a seat; but that the House, in its then chrysalis state, as he called it, had no power to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members. Fully concurring that the return is presumptive evidence of right, I will attempt to prove that the House had the power coeval and coextensive with the assembling of the members, on the first Monday of December last, to judge of the constitutional element of which it should be composed. From necessity, saying nothing about expediency, which ought to have very little weight in determining a question touching the existence of constitutional grant, it must exist somewhere, else prima facie evidence, that is, on its face, or, in parliamentary language, at first blush, may constitute membership, by conferring a conclusive right in the first instance, even in cases of palpable fraud or gross corruption.

But where does the Constitution place it? Article first, section second, provides that "Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Surely this provision has no qualifying phrase, but is as explicit as language can make it; and, in the absence of any restraining clause, it is a very sensible rule that the constructionist is compelled to believe that the Legislature intended what it has said. The expediency or inexpediency of law, much less of the Constitution, is not open to any right of construction; and if it were, it cannot avail for any purpose to those who sustain the claims of fraud against the rights of the people. The reason and justice of the thing are against them.

It is said, however, that the word "House" means an organized body of members, acting under the sanction of an oath; and this is called a limitation; and in one aspect it is, while in others it is a most latitudinous construction. It works a limitation of the power as to the time of its exercise, but at the same time is made to absorb the functions of another grant, which no one will deny is made by the use of the same word to which, if the same qualification be applied, the grant becomes nugatory, and neither power can be exercised. Thus: "The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers." The election of a Speaker is the important ingredient of organization; but if the word "House" means an organized body of members, then organization must precede the election of Speaker; and if so, the provision is felo de se, for no organization can ever take place; and without it, gentlemen say there can be no tribunal authorized to canvass the elections, returns and qualifications of members. If so, the Government is at an end, and we are, in sober truth, in the midst of revolution. But, sir, the judicial tribunals never attempt to limit or extend the natural import of words, which are independent of any qualifying phrase, except to prevent fraud, or to protect individual rights. In such cases, as a dernier resort, a feeling of charity, if I may give it that name, induces the belief that the Legislature intended to advance the principles of natural justice. But it is scarcely charitable to believe that the framers of the Federal compact intended that any person, other than a Representative chosen by the people, should be permitted to participate in the deliberations of the popular branch of the Government, and especially not, as it is provided that the House of Representatives shall be chosen every second year by the people of the several States; and it is even less so, if possible, that they ever intended that the detail of that compact should be so contradictory and impracticable, that it would be impossible to carry one part into effect without nullifying another. The Constitution was formed by honest and consistent men, and its provisions, in my estimation, are consistent in themselves, and reconcilable with each other. Let this be explained, if it can be, consistently with the position assumed. It is not within the scope of my humble ability, nor do I believe that the people of the country will ever admit it; and let those who maintain it look well to the ground upon which they stand, "lest they fall."

But, if the right of ascertaining its own members is not expressly granted to this House before the election of Speaker, it is clearly and necessarily to be implied from the power of organization, which it is admitted is expressly conferred in the latter clause of article first, section second, before cited, that the House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, which is the only organization contemplated or known in this branch of Congress. The right to elect Speaker is clearly an express grant. But how is the power contended for to be enforced? To this I answer emphatically, that it is properly an incident to the right of formation, and necessary to its execution, to prevent the minions of party from trampling under foot the most important element of a Republican Government—the sovereignty of the people. My language, sir, will inform you of the source from which my principles of construction are drawn. It is marvellous that any appeal should be made to the doctrine of State Rights, in the sense in which I have been taught to respect it, as a defence of one of the grossest attempts in the annals of the nation to prostrate the vital principle upon which the doctrine is based. State Rights! Let me refer to one of its founders: "Whenever, therefore, a question arises concerning the constitutionality of a power, the first question is, whether the power be expressed in the Constitution. If it be, the question is decided. If it be not expressed, the next inquiry must be, whether it is properly an incident to an express power, and necessary to its execution. If it be, it may be exercised by Congress. If it be not, Congress cannot exercise it." —Virginia Resolutions, 1799, 1800.

The application is so apparent, that no comment can give strenth to it. These rules, in my estimation, may be safely applied to every part of the Constitution, without, in any instance, hazarding the intention of the framers; and if they were more studied, more carefully adhered to, and less talked about, there would be greater safety to the country against any infraction of the fundamental law. Such are, very briefly, my views as to the true rendering of the Constitution; but I will take the liberty to remark, before leaving this branch of the inquiry, that the whole subject of construction is very elaborately considered in the resolutions to which I have adverted, as a sound exposition of the implied powers of Congress.

The doctrine of casus omissus, in regard to the element of which the popular branch of this Government is composed, or the right and power of perfecting that element into the form of a constitutional House of Representatives, cannot be admitted. It is too deadly in its consequences to receive favor, even for a moment. The framers of the Constitution could not have overlooked so important a matter, for it will be remembered that the foundation principle in the formation of this body, under the Constitution, is the right of the people to choose their own representatives. It is an important right, and one that gave birth to the Revolutionary scenes of our country, of which New Jersey may boast her full share, and to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SERGEANT] adverted with so much fervor and eloquence. It is one for which the patriots of that day contended with earnest solicitude, and when entreaty proved fruitless, and all peaceful efforts to secure it had failed, they did not hesitate, in the defence of it, to pledge their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor; and now, when it is amply secured, it should not be hazarded by construction, or defeated by fraud. The struggle to which the honorable gentleman alluded was not for "seals" or "stamps," nor even for the forms of law. The people of that day had enough of these ensigns of monarchy; the allusion is a perversion of history; they fought for liberty, and the right of representation.

Even in the British House of Commons, where this principle is less understood, and, consequently, less highly valued, from immemorial usage, in cases of double returns, both claimants are required to retire and refused the right to participate in the doings of that body, until their respective claims have been investigated, and decided by the undisputed members.

The right to decide implies a time to examine and consider. The necessity of decision upon a controverted right to represent, precludes the exercise of the right, if it may be called such, pending the necessary investigation, and while its existence is undetermined, unless it be better that the people shall be misrepresented in the councils of the nation, through the medium of fraudulent returns, than not represented at all. The foreign ambassador cannot be accredited, while his official character is in dispute. A decision cannot be expected upon any just principles, without a full investigation; controverted facts must be proved; time must be allowed to procure evidence, and to consider it, after it is produced; and whatever delay may be necessary to the prerequisites of a final determination may be fully justified by the authority which is expressly conferred to "judge." If the House may judge, it must first hear. The parliamentary usage which excludes the exercise of delegated power, while it is uncertain whether it has been conferred, is but the dictate of common sense, which pervades the general transactions of life. In matters of business, commercial men do not have transactions with an agent, while his agency is in dispute. No, sir, that enterprising and valuable class of our citizens are too provident in their dealings to entertain for a moment a principle so much at variance with common prodence, and so hazardous in its consequences.

If there was any ground to believe that the desire to be consistent could have any influence over the prejudice of party feeling, I would endeavor to convince honorable gentlemen of the minority that they are committed to the principles which I maintain, in reference to the subject under consideration, unless it be said that Kentucky is not now "in the line of safe precedents." But, however that may be, I propose to strengthen my position, that the power to judge of the returns is coextensive with the assembling of the members, by adducing a few authorities from the journals and decisions of the House, from which it will also appear that, as a party, they cannot escape the charge of inconsistency, though the fact may be ever so unavailing:

"On the first day of the meeting of the Twenty-third Congress, the House was, agreeably to usage, called to order by its acting Clerk, M. St. Clair Clarke, who proceeded to call the roll of the members by States, beginning with the State of Maine. Having proceeded as far as the State of Kentucky, before its members were called, Mr. Allan of that State rose and asked permission to address the House. He observed, among other things, that the State of Kentucky had been declared entitled to thirteen Representatives, but that, in casting his eyes around the Hall, he recognised fourteen gentlemen ostensibly claiming to be Representatives and members of the House. From the circumstances of the case it was obvious that the question of their right to a seat must be decided in the present stage of the proceedings. The question arising from these conflicting claims was one deeply interesting, not only to their own immediate districts, but to the State at large; so much, so that the delegates from the State had met together, and deemed it their duty to take the novel case under their most serious consideration."

The Federal delegation in that Congress, from the State of Kentucky, included in its number some of the ablest lawyers in the country, and were very competent to decide, after "a most serious consideration," at what stage of the proceedings it was obvious that the question of right should be determined. It has been well said that principles never change. What was obvious then, is equally obvious now, though a certain class of politicians may not be able to perceive it with equal clearness. The whole argument resolves itself into a mere question of expediency, or rather of inconvenience. Usage has been much relied upon as condemning the course of the majority. It may safely be admitted that the argument of inconvenience, as to the time of exercising the acknowledged power of the House over the election and returns of its members in ordinary cases of contested election, before organization, presses itself with much force. It may or may not be exercised as the magnitude of the question, and the circumstances out of which it has grown may seem to justify. The canvass must be had, but the members under the limit of a sound discretion, may determine at what period of the session it is expedient to enter upon its examination. Usually it is not expedient to do so in the incipient stages of organization. Hence the usage to which reference has been made. The case from New Jersey stands alone in the history of the country. It has no parallel. No one has undertaken to deny the expediency of investigation if we have the power.

In further prosecuting this inquiry, let me again refer to the case of Letcher and Moore, where the power contended for was distinctly maintained and admitted by the most talented men of both of the great political parties of the country, and solemnly affirmed by the House.

Mr. Allan, in the conclusion of his remarks, said that:

"In order to enable the House to decide the controversy between these claimants, he would ask the Clerk whether he had in his possession any certificates or other vouchers in relation to the election in the district from which both these gentlemen came, and if he had, he would call for the reading."

The papers were read, including the "poll books, duly certified."

No one can deny that the facts of the two cases are precisely similar, as well as the course of proceeding. The authority of this case, in the aspect in which it is now presented, has not been assailed, but has been passed by in silence. It is impossible to escape it on the score of acquiescence, for up to this time the parties had made no arrangement, as will be readily perceived by the published debates to which I refer, as well as to what succeeded.

Mr. Wayne, of Georgia, an Administration member, said that—

The person claming to be substituted for the individual upon the roll, ought to produce his credentials, and say whether those were the papers on which he intended to found his claim to a seat. If that were done, he would be ready to pass upon them.

Mr. Allan, a Whig member, in his second speech, said that—

He understood himself to possess the right of rising, and presenting the question in this case to the House. This was a House; under the view of the Consitution it was competent to perform any act pertaining to the House of Representatives, and its first duty was to ascertain who were its own members. This was a representative Government, and the first question which demanded attention was, whether individuals claiming to be their representatives, were actually their representatives.

Mr. Burgess said—

The House ought to go behind that paper (the returns) to the poll books, to ascertain whether the electors did vote or not, and then leave the question of their right to vote, &c. to the election committee. He repeated, that in their decision the House were bound to approximate as closely as possible to the people, in order to the better understanding of the public will.

Mr. Archer, among other things, said, in the second stage of the proceedings—

He could not avoid expressing his unfeigned surprise at the observations that had fallen from several gentlemen who had addressed the House on both sides of the question. * * * * He contended, as we understood him, that the House ought at once to decide without referring it first to a committee, and that the course pursued by several honorable gentlemen who preceded him, went to abrogate the most important rights and privileges of that assembly. What did the Constitution say? Why, that the House was to be the sole "judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its members." It would be derogatory to that legislative body to say aught against this doctrine. * * * * There was another view of the question, and one of great import, which should be considered, and that was, suppose a return was made, perfect in all its forms, and at the moment of presenting it, a gentleman were to rise and offer to prove, at the bar of the House, that the return was an imposition, would any honorable member tell him that the House was precluded from entertaining such an allegation? If a mere return were deemed a sufficient qualification, then any one producing a required form became at once a member of that House.

Mr. Jones of Georgia said:

Mr. Letcher [the Federal claimant] had produced his certificate, (the poll books,) in which it was certified that the majority of qualified voters, in the whole five counties, had given their votes in his favor. It had been argued, and correctly argued, that he who had such a majority was the member entitled to a seat.

Mr. Beardsley said:

"He conceived that gentleman were mistaken in supposing that it had been argued that the House had not the power of looking back to facts and circumstances connected with the certificate which had been offered by Mr. Moore at the table. The argument that he had heard, was that the usual mode of proceeding was not to go behind a certificate on a question as to its validity.

This disclaimer was made necessary by the evident mistake of the gentleman from Virginia who had preceded him, and is very strongly corroborative of the ground assumed that in the discussion of that case, both parties denied any limitation as to the power of the House to canvass the returns, and ascertain its own members.

At the close of the debate, the following resolutions presented by Mr. Hardin, a Whig member, were adopted with great unanimity, upon which no comment is necessary:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections, when appointed, inquire and report to this House, who is the member elected from the Fifth Congressional District of the State of Kentucky, and until the committee report, as herein required,

Resolved, That neither Thomas P. Moore nor Robert P. Letcher shall be qualified as the member from said district.

Upon these remarks and authorities I will rest this part of the argument, assuming hereafter the power of the House to decide any matter necessary to be decided in order to form a constitutional House of Representatives, before that election is effected; and I do it the more cheerfully, without further consideration, as many who denied it under the counsel of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] have virtually acknowledged their error, by abandoning their position.

It has now become important to consider the "black letter" position of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] that the commission of the Governor, as he calls it, is conclusive evidence to the person holding it to a seat in this House for all purposes of organization. That gentleman did not take part in the early discussion of this question, for reasons, no doubt, that were satisfactory to himself, and of which it does not become me to enquire, except for the purpose of making the change in the ground assumed in the debate. Before, it was said, and justly, I contend, in reference to the return or commission, that it was prima facie evidence of a right of membership. But, sir, this new doctrine gives it all the validity of an Executive commission, empowering the individual who holds it to take the seat, and to perform the high functions of a Representative of the people, by virtue of the paper title of the Governor. It is said the franchise is as effectually secured by the return, as the title to real property is by deed. No one can complain that the position is not sufficiently broad to cover the case. The analogy, however, is not just; but if it were, the mere formalities of a deed are often a very frail reliance for the security of title. It is a familiar maxim, that no man can transfer to others rights more extensive than he possesses. If the grantor had no estate, nothing passes by the deed. In many cases, an agent duly constituted, acting in pursuance of his delegated authority, may transfer the rights of his principal; but if he transcends that authority, his acts are void. The Governor of a State, in the exercise of his Executive functions, represents the sovereignty of the people as in appointments to office, thus conferring power to act in the name and behalf of the sovereign authority itself. The right to appoint implies the right of selection, subject only to the constitution and laws of the State. It is no part of my intention to misstate the argument. It is not asserted, I admit, in direct terms, that the Governor of New Jersey has the right to appoint a member of Congress; but it is asserted that he may commission, and that his commission, in the first instance, gives a conclusive right; and if so, it is my object to prove that it is equivalent to the power of appointment.

The proposition was proclaimed without qualification, though the gentleman did not condescend to inform us why it was conclusive, or to define the boundaries of this divine right, nor when it would cease to possess this omnipotent character. All these matters were left by him to conjuctue, so far as I understood. The question, therefore, may still be asked, when will it cease to be conclusive? Another gentleman has said that the commission is conclusive, until the claim of the member has been investigated by the Committee of Privileges and Elections, and decided by the House, but the commentary, if possible, is worse than the text. If the paper is conclusive until decision, it is impossible to investigate or decide. There are some propositions so perfectly contradictory and irreconcileable with themselves, that the best answer that can be made to them is to repeat them. No authorities have been cited in support of this position, for the reason, undoubtedly, that none can be found; and no one, so far as I recollect, has condescended to give even his own reflections as to the grounds upon which a principle, entirely new in the history of legislative proceedings, is based. If the advocate of this new kind of estoppel had defined its boundaries, and given the source from whence it is deprived it would be less difficult to examine it. They say the commission is conclusive in the first instance, but they do not incline to give any information why it is so, nor by what process it is to be divested of its primary importance, so as to enable the House to canvass the elections and returns of its members.

In examining this new ground, assumed in behalf of these pretenders, it is important to understand terms, in order to apply them with precision. The certificate of the Governor has been denominated a commission, and regarded in the sense of a commission of appointment. This is error. What is a commission? Some of the best legal writers define it, "Letter patent, from porper authority, given to a person as his warrant, for the exercise of certain powers, in the sense of delegates with the civilians. What is the signification of letters patent? A writing executed and sealed, by which power and authority are granted to a person to do some act or enjoy some right. It is manifest that the certificate of returns, in this defined and legal sense, cannot be regarded as a commission, unless we are prepared to sanction the doctrine, that, to some extent, the constituent principle of representation on this floor is confided to Executive discretion. What is a return? In a few words, it is the rendering back or return of a writ, or execution to the proper office or court; or the certificate of the officer executing it, endorsed thereon. The language of the Constitution, which ought to have some weight, in my estimation, is the "RETURNS" of its members. But it may be said, as there is no writ so there can be no return endorsed thereon. In England, the election being closed, the returning officer of the borough returns his precept to the sheriff, with the names of the persons elected by the majority, and the sheriff returns the whole, together with the writ, which issued from the clerk of the crown in chancery to the office from which it emanated. The place of the writ in this country is supplied, and its offices performed, by the constitution and laws of the several States regulating elections, and prescribing the time, place, and manner of holding the same. Consequently, we have nothing but the return. The object of the writ in England is to fix the time, and in some instances, I believe, place of hilding of the election. Here, that is supplied by law. So that whether we use the word commission or return, it is merely a certificate of facts; and, I grant, when it is formal and legal, it is presumptive evidence of the truth of the facts which it certifies, and it is no more, no less.

Now, sir, every lawyer, as well as every man of common sense, knows that prima facie or presumptive evidence, from its very nature, may be controlled by opposing proof, when the presumption is not in accordance with the truth of the fact to be inferred. No principle of law is better settled or more generally understood. The application of this principle to the returns of members has never been denied or questioned in any decision of this House, but has been uniformly applied since the foundation of the Government, in every contested election, without a solitary exception; and upon this point I challenge contradiction. It is applied in the House of Commons and in the States of this Union, and must be applied here, if we have any regard for the Constitution or the rights of the people. The case of Spaulding and Meade is so eminetly decisive of this point, that no degree of ingenuity can possibly escape its application.

Now, (said Mr. C.) I will read one of the returns in dispute, the better to enable the House to understand what it purports to be on its face.

[L. S.] STATE OF NEW JERSEY.

To ——.

It appearing to the Governor of the State of New Jersey, and the Privy Council thereof, that you have been elected by the people of the State of New Jersey to represent the said State in the House of Representatives of the Twenty-sixth Congress of the United States, you, the said —— ——, are therefore commissioned to represent the State of New Jersey in the House of Representatives during the Twenty sixth Congress.

This paper is called a commission, though it does not, on its face, purport to confer any power independent of the fact of election by the people; but, if it did, like all the arguments on the other side, if it proves any thing it proves too much. If its language is to be taken literally, which no sensible man will pretend, the person holding it is commissioned during, or througnout the Twenty-sixth Congress; and it is no more a violation of any right to examine into the facts upon which it purports to be founded, on the first day of the session, than it will be on the last. But this paper is no more than a certificate of facts, certifying that the person holding it had been elected by the people, which certified fact is now ascertained to be a falsehood, and was equally well known to be so at the time the certificate was made; and yet, if the argument holds, good it is binding upon the deliberations of Congress for an indefinite period of time. I have before attempted to prove that it is a return, and not a commission in the sense of the Constitution and that its sufficiency must depend, in case of dispute, upon the truth of the fact which it affirms.

Much has been said about disfranchisement, State sovereignty, and the violation of State laws, as if it were impossible to investigate the legal pretensions of these claimants without in some measure, degrading or infringing the sovereignty of the people of New Jersey; but those charges are so undefined, and undefinable, that it is yet uncertain, in my own mind, whether I understand the precise grounds upon which they are attempted to be sustained; or, indeed, if they are expected to be regarded in any other light than as the merest appeals of party declamation to the passions and prejudices of the local feelings of the people; but, as they have been repeatedly put forth, for what purpose it is not necessary to inquire, it becomes important to give them a passing remark.

It is readily admitted that, in the absence of national legislation, it is the right of the States to prescribe the time, place, and manner of holding elections, and that State regulations in this behalf are of binding obligation upon the deliberations of Congress, and thus far there is no conflict of jurisdiction; and when this is admitted, nothing further can be claimed, as all must perceive, without necessarily bringing into collision the highly important power of both branches of Congress, in reference to the election of their members, with the laws of the several States. All State laws, therefore, upon this subject, which look to other objects than those to which allusion has been made, are enacted for the convenience of Congress, and subordinate to the Federal Constitution, which makes this House the sole "judge of the return of its members." It is a very poor compliment to the general intelligence of that patriotic State, to suppose that its citizens can be deceived by such shadowy denunciations, or imaginary wrongs, having no existence except in the distempered imaginations of violent partisans.

Without further remark, (said Mr. C.) upon this part of the case, I will ask a few moment's attention to the election laws of New Jersey, which are pertinent to the inquiry, and, also, to the facts of the case. Very ample provision is made against error or fraud on the part of the subordinate returning officers, with a view, as all will readily admit, to secure to the majority of the State the representation of its choice:

"To take an account of, and cast up the votes given for each candidate, make a list of the same, which list they shall sign, certify, seal up, direct, and transmit to the clerk of the county, who shall attend at the court-house of the county on the Saturday next after the day of election, for the purpose of receiving the same, which list shall be delivered to him before five o'clock in the afternoon of said day, which said clerk shall proceed, in a public manner, to make one general list of all the candidates voted for as aforesaid, together with the number of votes received for each of them, and shall transmit the same, at the expense of the State, to the Governor or person administering the Government, within seven days thereafter, having first caused a duplicate thereof to be filed in his office, together with the lists from the said townships."

The Governor is directed:

"If the certified lists of votes given for Representatives in Congress shall not be received from the clerks of any of the counties of the State, by him, within seven days after the time prescribed by law for casting up the same, &c. by the clerks as aforesaid, forthwith to send express to the clerk of the county or counties from which such certified lists have not been received, and to procure the same at the expense of the State."

The Governor is also directed:

"Within five days after receiving the said lists, to lay the same before a Privy Council, to be by him summoned for that purpose, and, after casting up the whole number of votes from the several counties, for each candidate, the said Governor and Privy Council shall determine the six persons who have the greatest number of votes from the whole State, for Representaties in Congress of the United States from this State," and forthwith commission them, &c.

The clerk of Middlesex county, in his return to the Governor enumerated the return from each township, except the township of South Amboy, in regard to which he appended in substance that he had received no return made according to law. The certificate on its face shows, beyond controversy, that some return had been received, and that the clerk had been guilty of an unwarrantable assumption of power, and in no way justified by the laws of New Jersey, and should have received with promptness the correcting hand of the Governor. In the case from the county of Cumberland, the return from the township of Millville was made to the clerk of the county, in due form of law, but was delayed about five hours behind the time required by law, and was rejected by the clerk, and omitted by the Governor. Both these returns, which had been improperly rejected by the subordinate officers, were immediately sent up to the Governor, and by him laid before the Privy Council, with the residue of the votes of the State, but were not included in the ultimate return now on the table, for the reason that those high functionaries had not received them through the medium of the clerks of the respective counties, although the law of New Jersey makes it the duty of the Governor, in all such cases, within seven days after the time prescribed by law for casting up the returns, forthwith to send an express to the clerks of the county or counties, from which such certificate lists have not been received, and to procure the same at the expense of the State; and the only way this plain duty is attempted to be obviated, and the only excuse put forth for its non-performance, is contained in the grave assertion that, as a return had been received, no matter how fraudulent, the Governor could not know that it was incomplete. This is special pleading of the most odious character. What are the "certified lists" of votes which, in the contingency named, he was bound to procure, at the expense of the State? Are they partial lists? Certainly not. Are they fraudulent lists? No one dare assert it. What kind of lists? The answer is plain; full lists of the votes of the whole State, for the law requires the ultimate return to be based upon the majority of the votes of the whole State, and, regularly, it should certify that fact; and should not stop short, as in this case, with the unsatisfactory allegation that: "It appearing to the Governor that you have been elected by the people," &c. but should follow the law of the State, by averring that the person holding it has been elected by a majority of the votes of the whole State; and surely this House cannot be bound by a paper, which, in itself, is incomplete. Further, the townships of New Jersey, like the townships of New England, are created by a public law; and it has been well said, that the humblest citizen must, at his peril, take notice of the law, and that ignorance, in this respect, works no excuse. But this Governor cannot escape with this flimsy excuse, miserable, indeed, as it is: for the authenticated copies of the certified lists, which had been suppressed by the subordinate officers, were placed in his possession, before the meeting of the Privy Council, and he himself, submitted them to their consideration, and yet refused to include them in the ultimate return. It is, therefore, clear, that what he, in his official capacity, certified to be true, as a man he knew to be false. There might have been some semblance of justice in the course of the Governor, if the returns had been special, setting forth the facts in dispute, and leaving the whole subject to the determination of this House; but even this trifling concession from what he himself seems to have regarded as strict law, was stubbornly refused, or carefully neglected. It has now become necessary to understand the true meaning of the statute which provides for an express at the expense of the State, when the certified lists have not been received. The fundamental rule of construction is the intention of the Legislature; and if the judicial tribunals, upon which the duty of construction more generally devolves, are bound to give effect to the intention of legislative enactments, without any discretion to disregard it, no good reason can be assigned why the Governor of a State, in the discharge of a ministerial duty, should not be held responsible to the same wholesome rule. The intention of the Legislature may be usually gathered with unerring certainty, if the language is not contradictory, by considering the mischief which existed to which the remedy was applied, and the nature and character of the remedy itself. What was the mischief? Undoubtedly the failure of returns, through the errors or frauds of the subordinate returning officers. Fallacy cannot defeat this inference, nor argument give weight to it. The law which has been cited is the remedy, making it the duty of the Governor, in cases of omission or fraud, to procure them by express, at the expense of the State. It is, therefore, clear to my mind, that the Legislature never contemplated the narrow construction set up, the effect of which is to defeat the object in view, but that the remedy was intended to be as broad as the mischief which existed, and to cover the case of every failure of returns; thus securing, without possibility of mistake, the votes of the whole State. To this object all the election laws of the State point, in order to ascertain the constitutional basis of election—the majority of the votes of the whole State—by which to determine the six persons who have the greatest number of votes. These are remedial laws, intended to furnish security to the right of suffrage and of representation, against the peril of ignorance and the corruption of party; and, as such, should receive the most liberal construction. They do not affect life or personal liberty, as in the criminal code, where the letter, and not the spirit of the law should govern in favor of the accused, but are designed to increase the safeguards, heretofore found insufficient, around the first principle of republican freedom—the right of the people to constitute their own representation. It is impossible, in my humble opinion, for the State authorities of New Jersey to escape from the responsibility which they have voluntarily assumed.

No one can be less inclined to do them any injustice than myself; but let them stand upon the ground they have selected, and not attempt to make any new issue. It comes too late. If gentlemen will reflect but for a moment, they will perceive that, if Governor Pennington really believed himself so blinded by his station and the forms of law, that he could not take notice of the fact, which, as an individual he knew, and which I contend he was under every obligation to regard, that the votes of two townships had been suppressed in the returns of the clerks, in consistency with his principle, he could not know what still rests on rumor, that alien votes had been received at the polls; for if an individual attempts to excuse himself for the non-performance of duty, on the ground of error of judgment, and expects to be credited for sincerity, and to escape imputation of bad faith, he must be consistent in his error. In this behalf, if I am not greatly mistaken, the Governor of New Jersey, in the shiftings and windings of this debate, has had much occasion to exclaim, "save me from my friends."

Another ground of argument much relied upon in the early stages of the discussion deserves to be considered, for it is exceedingly plausible, and well calculated to make a wrong impression. It is substantially that the claimants holding the ultimate return are members, to some extent, without reference to the fact of election; because, by virtue of the return they are, of right, exempted from arrest, and, under the limitations of law, may exercise the franding previlege; and it is, therefore, insisted that they ought to have seats in this House during the organization, and, until investigation by the election committee, and final decision upon the merits. It is due to candor to admit that, for the moment, the argument made an impression; but, upon reflection, it occurred to me that it proved too much; for it is clear, in my judgment, that in cases of double returns, from necessity, each claimant must enjoy the right of appearing at the bar of the House, to prosecute his claim to a seat; and that the judicial tribunal cannot take cognizance of the dispute, or in any manner determine which his, or which is not, entitled to the exemption. It would be subversive of the power of both branches of Congress to "judge" of the matter in question, and might endanger the existence of Congress itself, by detaining the members of which it should be composed. After arrest, and application for discharge, if made dependent upon the actual right to a seat, and pending the investigation of the evidence of that right, the constituency would be unrepresented, saying nothing about the conflict of jurisdiction which must inevitably ensue. The doctrine is inadmissible. It is the right of the constituency, as well as the convenience of the member, which are the basis of the privilege of exemption from arrest. But, said Mr. C. as this whole subject was very fully discussed at the first session of the Fifteenth Congress, in the very able report of John W. Taylor, late Speaker of the House of Representatives, in the celebrated case of Herrick and Hammond, and settled by the House, I prefer to refer to the report, recommending it to the especial consideration of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD] for whose more immediate benefit it is cited.

"Our rule, in this particular, (the appointment of committees,) is different from the House of Commons. It is also better, for it makes our theory conform to what is fact in both countries—that the act of becoming in reality a member of the House, depends wholly on the will of the person elected and returned. Election does not, of itself, constitute membership, although the period may have arrived at which the Congressional term commences. * * * * Neither does a return necessarily confer membership; for if he in whose favor it be made should be prevented from taking a seat at the organization of the House of Representatives, he might find, upon presenting himself to qualify, that his return had been superseded by the admission of another person into the seat for which he was returned. * * * * Several other cases might be cited, where persons were returned who never, in fact, became members; but where others because members who were not returned Neither do election and return create membership. These act are nothing more than the designation of the individual who, when called upon in the manner prescribed by law, shall be authorized to claim title to a seat. * * * * Yet it would be easy to state cases where he would not be permitted, for a moment, to occupy a seat, notwithstanding the regularity of his election and return. * * * * Each House of Representatives is a distinct legislative body, having no connection with any preceding one. It commences its existence unrestrained by any rules or regulations for the conducting of business, which were established by former Houses, and which were binding upon them. It prescribes its own course of proceedings, elects its own officers, and designates its own duties."

"The privilege of exemption from arrest, granted by the Constitution to Representatives before a meeting of the House, and after its adjournment, furnishes no argument in favor of their membership at such times. Exemption from arrest is a privilege as old as the Parliament of England. There it is extended, not only to members, but to their servants, horses, and carriages. Our Constitution adopts the very words of the common law, but restricts the privilege to members. In both countries the object is the same, not the benefit of the member, but of the public service. It is an essential incident to the right of being represented, and a consequence of that right. But that membership is not co-extensive with the enjoyment of that privilege, is manifest from the consideration that such a construction might make the members of one Congress continue in office, not only after the Congress has expired, but also after the next Congress was actually in session. This construction, therefore, is not only absurd, but it serves to illustrate the fallacy of that suggestion which fancies the Representatives of one Congress succeeding to the seats of their predecessers as members of the same corporate body.

"The privileges of franking letters, and of exemption from militia duty, are not granted by the Constitution They are established by law, and liable to be changed at the will of the Government. They have been extended, and my be restricted as public convenience shall require. Previous to the last Congress the privilege of franking was not enjoyed until after the commencement of each session. But as that does not prove negatively that persons elected to the House of Represeniaves were not members before that time; so the existing law does not prove affirmatively that they are. It is true that the words 'members of the House of Representatives' are used as descriptive of the persons to whom the privilege is granted, but if certainly was used without intending thereby to expresse an opinion, much less to decide, when membership commences and probably without in anywise adverting to that inquiry. The late war had created claims in every part of the country, which it was found convenient to send by mail to those who were elected to Congress in the several districts previous to their leaving home. The law was passed with a viewe to the convenience of these public claimants, as well as to that of the Representatives elected. We have seen that in England, this privilege is enjoyed before the commencement of membership, and probably for a reason similar to that above mentioned.

It is impossible to follow the debate on the other side into all its windings, for if there is any one characteristic which prevails thoughout it is the constantly varying and uncertain character of the positions which have been assumed, so much so that I despair of being able to do more than to what indirection you please, if it prevails, the right to represent emanates from the Executive, and not from the people.

The other branch of Congress is somewhat differeived, as conferring a conclusive right, during the organization of the House. It seems to me that any man capable of distinguishing between a "hawk and a handsaw," must perceive, at sight, that the provision cited has no reference, under any circumstances, to the proceedings of either branch of Congress, but applies solely to the public and judicial intercourse between the several States. I do not deem this point worthy of a more serious reply. It must have been made inadvertently, and without any consideration. All these various positions, when stripped of their verbage, and carried to their results, will be found to resolve themselves into one general principle as uncongenial to the genius of Republican institutions as monarchy itself. It is Federalism—it is vested right—it is estoppel. Give it would abrogate the most important powers of this House, and, in effect, repeal the Constitution itself. No one has denied the official character of the Governor, or questioned the authenticity of the seal of State; therefore, no one has contemned the public authority of New Jersey. The people of New Jersey will not be influenced by such flimsy appeals to local prejudice. They have too much discernment to be thus easily deceived. Driven from this position by its own inherent weakness, without scarcely waiting for a reply, the advocates of these pretenders undertake to entrench themselves behind that clause of the Constitution which provides that "full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State;" and it is, therefore, insisted that the return of the Governor must be authority of a sovereign State, I must be permitted to say that I scom mere declamation, "sound and fury," meaning nothing. The Governor, in making the return of an election, performs only a ministerial act, and not an Executive function. In the exercise of that duty, he is an officer of the law, and not of the Constitution; for, in many of the States, as in England, the return is made by the sheriff, and, in some instances, by his deputy. The seal of State proves that William Pennington is Governor of the State of New Jersey; no more and no less. It has reference solely to the official character of the Governor, and imparts no verity to the facts set forth in the certificate. If the argument could have weight, like many others which have been adduced on the same side, it would prove too much; and, if carried out, glance at some of the most important. It forcibly reminds me of the maxim, that truth is simple, error complex. But the several propositions, irreconcilable and contradictory as they are, have a common object, to defeat or delay the just rights of the members who are entitled to seats from the fact of election. There is, however, one other argument, if it may be called such, which should not be passed by in silence; not because it possesses the virtue even of plausibility, but because it is supremely ridiculous. It is derived from the official sanctity of the seal of State. Disclaiming any intention to treat with indignity the public ferently constituted, and was intended to subserve many different purposes. Like the House of Representatives, it has legislative power; but, in many cases, it also exercises judicial and executive functions. It therefore became necessary, in the formation of the Government, to provide for its perpetuity—a characteristic which does not belong to the lower House, though consolidationists have attempted to maintain it. Consequently, when vacancies happen during the recess of the Legislature of any State, "the Executive authority thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

This case stands alone in the Constitution, and is an exception, growing out of necessity, to a rule otherwise universal, that the Executive of a State cannot constitute or appoint, directly or indirectly, a member of either branch of Congress. In such cases, the Governor appoints and commissions. The selection rests in his discretion, and the field is as broad and open to him as the Legislature. The authority of the Senator emanates from the Executive, through whom he derives power to represent the sovereignty of the State. In all other cases, the Senators are elected by the Legislature; but the return, like the return of a member, issues from the Governor. It may not be uninstructive to know the difference between the return, in case of an election, and the commission, in case of an appointment.

RETURN.

—— —— Governor of the State of Mississippi,

To all who shall see these presents, GREETING:

Whereas the Legislature of the State of Mississippi did, on the thirtieth day of January, anno Domini 1839, elect —— —— esquire, a Senator in the Congress of the United States for the constitutional term of six years, from the fourth day of March next. Now, know ye, that, in consequence thereof, and by virtue of the Constitution and laws, I do hereby certify that —— —— is duly elected Senator in the Congress of the United States, from the State of Mississippi, for the constitutioanl term of six years, from the fourth day of March next.

COMMISSION.

THE STATE OF MISSISSIPPI:

To all who shall see these presents, GREETING:

Whereas, a vacancy has occurred in the office of Senator in the Congress of the United States, by the resignation of the Hon. —— ——, of the State of Mississippi,

Now, know ye, that in consequence thereof, and by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, and the constitution and laws of this State, we do hereby appoint —— ——, of ——, Senator in Congress, to fill said vacancy, and empower him, the said —— ——, to execute and fulfil the duties of that office according to law, and to continue in office for the period prescribed by the Constitution of the United States.

In testimony whereof, I, —— ——, Governor of the State [L. s.] aforesaid, have caused these letters to be made patent, and the great seal of the State to be hereunto affixed.

But again: If the power contended for does not exist, the important limitations as to the qualifications ot members, or perhaps I should say the disqualification, of individuals, may often be defeated.

"No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen."

If the doctrine assumed on the other side be true, minors and aliens, as well as the citizens of a foreign State, may be enabled, by virtue of a return, to ride over these salutary restrictions. Further:

"No person holding any office under the United States, shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office."

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] has a very great horror of Executive influence upon the deliberations of Congress. In the ardor of his zeal to resist it, the shadow is mistaken for the substance. No retreat is so remote, no citadel so safe from its approach, that, in the lofty conceptions of his imagination, he does not see the strong arm of Executive domination held in terrorem over his head, and himself in danger of annihilation. Like the Indian in pursuit of his God, he sees it in the cloud and hears it in the wind. But, sir, disguise it as he may, if his construction prevails, the highest officers of the Government, civil or military, may have seats in either branch of Congress for an indefinite period; and the very Executive influence which he so much dreads may be exerted in the most direct, and, therefore, most dangerous form—to perpetuate the power unconstitutionally obtained—in utter prostration not only of the primary principle of representation, but the letter of the Constitution itself.

Permit me to suggest another difficulty. The personal identity of members must be ascertained, even in the call of the roll. The experience of this session proves conclusively to my mind that general consent will be always unattainable when any thing of importance is to be decided in a deliberative assembly. Identity itself is a question of fact dependent upon evidence in case of dispute, and cannot be determined except by a tribunal of competent authority. It has already appeared that the incidental powers of Congress are derived from a principle of necessity, growing out of an existing obligation to carry in o effect other powers, which are expressly delegated. Is it not necessary and proper to exclude a forged return the moment it appears in this Hall? The interrogatory speaks its own answer. The power of Congress over the returns of its members cannot be abridged without danger on all sides. The certificates would at once become negotiable in the election of the Speaker, and other officers, and members may vote by proxy with impunity.

It has been my desire to treat this subject fairly and with candor, and to come to a correct result. How far I have succeeded, must be left to the judgment of others. My own mind rests satisfied with these conclusions, that the ultimate return of the Governor is only prima facie or presumptive evidence of right, and, like all other presumptive evidence, is open to opposing proof; and that the proof exhibited is ample and plenary to control the prima facie presumption arising from the certificate; and that the power of this House to ascertain its own members, is coeval with the assembling of Congress.

Before I conclude, with permisson, will say one word to the gentleman from Virginia, who sits before me, with no intention to question thee propriety of his course. But as he has diverted to the new relation which he bears to this controversy, and as there is some analogy between the Committee of Elections and a jury of trials, he will permit me to relate to him an anecdote which took place in the courts of Maine. A gentlemen of great eminence at the bar, while addressing a jury in the defence, was interrupted by the foreman, durng the exordium of his remarks, in a manner to indicate that he had prejudge the cause. The counsellor heard him patiently, but immediately remarked, that as it was manifest the foreman had formed an opinion, he would address himself to his eleven fellows; and throughout the argument, whichwas convincing and unanswerable, was very careful to have it understood that he was speaking to the eleven jurors, who had formed no opinion. After the cause was committed, the jury retired, but in a few minutes returned into court with a verdict for the defendant. Curiosity was excited, as the law of the State requires unanimity in verdict. It was soon ascertained that the foreman, sensibly impressed with the impropriety of his course, had submitted the cause to the decision of his fellows, declaring his willingness to concur in the result. It is to be hoped the moral wil lbe lost

One word of politics, sir, and I have done. We have heard of the rising prospects of the Whig party—that a new impetus has been given to Whig principles—that they are sweeping over the land like fire in the prairie. Be not deceived; the hour is not yet come; but it will come, and, judging from the late victories in the South and West, on the one side, and from the more recent whisperings of discontent, jealousy, and disappointment on the other, it does not require the gift of prophecy to foretell that a brilliant victory awaits the friends of freedom and equal rights in the total overthrow of Federalism, with all its kindred evils, from which its supporters will not be able to recover during the next quarter of a century.

THE PROTECTIVE POLICY.

REMARKS OF MR. WEBSTER,

IN SENATE, MARCH 3, 1840.

The Report of the Select Committee on the assumption of the State Debts being under consideration—

Mr. WEBSTER said it was not his purpose, at present, to enter far into the wide field of debate which was opened by this discussion. Another opportunity would probably present itself for the expression of his opinions upon the general state of the country, and the measures which he thought to be called for by the crisis. My single purpose now (said Mr. W.) is to make a few remarks upon the speech of the honorable member from South Carolina, delivered some days ago, or, rather, upon some of the topics of that speech. I had not the pleasure of hearing the speech, but I have read it attentively, with the respect due to the subject and to the author, and the remarks which I propose to make upon it I desire to address to the honorable member himself, and his friends who think with him, as well as to the rest of the country. It is an able speech, showing much thought and reflection, as well as much acuteness, and exhibiting, on the whole, a spirit apparently not unkind towards all the great interests of the country. My remarks shall be in the same spirit.

1. In treating of protection, or protecting duties, the first proposition of the honorable member is, that all duties laid on imports really fall on exports; that they are a toll paid for going to market. This, certainly, is not very obvious, but he says it is the received doctrine of the South. He does not argue the point on this occasion; he only states it as the fixed belief of the South. I shall not argue it, but content myself with saying that I have never been able to agree to this doctrine. The question was debated with much ability some years ago between my honorable colleague and a distinguished gentleman from South Carolina—both being at that time members of the other House. The South Carolina doctrine was then called the "Forty-bale Theory;" and the result of the discussion certainly left most of us in the North still adhering to the old doctrine, viz: that when duties are laid upon imported articles, it is the consumer who pays; and of course, that each part of the country pays in exact proportion to what it consumes. We think that the trade outwards has little or nothing to do with the subject. We think the substantial question is, who consumes the taxed article? I can, indeed, conceive a possible case in which this general truth might be qualified. If one country exported to another a raw material which it could sell nowhere else, and which no other country could furnish, why then, so far as duties on imports affected the sale of fabrics manufactured from that raw material, or perhaps other articles imported into the country producing it as its equivalent in return, so far it might be true that the duties would have an influence to check exportation. But no such case exists with us. The South and the West sell their cotton both at home and abroad. But they are not the sole producers of cotton. They have competitors. There is a market on both continents; and in one of them they find the cotton of South America, Texas, India, and Egypt, in a struggle for prices with their own. Our Southern and Western States have a fair demand; nothing obstructs their sales; as in all other cases, the prices are regulated by the supply and the demand. The pay no duty on going out, and if they can produce as cheaply as others, they can afford to sell as cheap. Their commodity, sold in foreign markets, mingles with the commerce of the world. They have received their price for it, and their connection with it has ceased. Whether it comes back here in a manufactured shape, or goes elsewhere, is no matter to them, as mere raisers and sellers of the article. If any portion of it comes back here, as doubtless it does, it is a portion which has been purchased in the general market of Europe, manufactured, and perhaps, mixed, in the very process, with the cotton of other countries, and reaches our shores as a foreign article for sale. Foreign labor and skill have become incorporated with it, and constitute its chief value. At our custom-house it is made subject to a duty, which is supposed to raise its price; and, it seems to me, if this be the effect of the duty, it is its whole effect. It reaches no further. I do not see how it acts back upon the original grower of the article in South Carolina. It no more affects the cotton grower in South Carolina, except so far as he is a consumer, than it affects the cotton grower in South America, India, or Egypt. The thread of causes and effects in this case, if there be any such thread, becomes quite too fine and attenuated to be felt or followed, from the higher price paid by the consumer, in consequence of the duty, back, through all the intermediate stages, to the influence of that higher price upon the original cost of the raw material. The same is true in regard to all imported articles not produced from the exported cotton. How is it possible to say that duties on such articles, iron, and woollen cloths, for instance, are a burden or discouragement on the raising of cotton?

But suppose I admit the South Carolina doctrine—suppose I admit that duties on imported merchandise really fall back, and become a charge on the exports of the country; and suppose I admit, what is true, that cotton grown in the Southern States constitutes a great portion of our exports—it does by no means follow from all this that the burden of these duties falls on the South, in proportion to the exports which leave its ports. And the reason is this: these exports are not altogether the result of the skill, labor, or capital of the South. Cotton, though it grows exclusively on Southern fields, is not, in truth, a mere Southern product. Much of the labor of the Middle and Northern States has mingled with it before it becomes an article of export. It is a joint production, to which many parts of the country contribute. The grain-growing States north of the Ohio help to raise and to export cotton, by furnishing provisions to those who cultivate and gather it. Kentucky and Tennessee do the same thing, by the cattle, horses, mules, and swine upon the foot, which they supply for the use of the cotton plantations. New England does the same by the clothing, furniture, utensils, and other manufactured articles, which she supplies for the like purpose. All these contribute to this export of cotton. So that, if it were true that duties at the custom-house on imported goods are a tax on exports, that tax would not fall exclusively on the South.

The value of this export, again, in the foreign market, is enhanced by the cost of transportation. Freight has become incorporated with it, and makes part of its price. At present prices, freight to Europe is probably equal to one-eighth of the cost of the article at New Orleans or Mobile. This freight is a Northern earning; and to this extent, therefore, the navigating interest contributes to the value of the exported article. So that duties, if they were a tax on exports, would not fall exclusively on the South, but would affect the grain-growing, the provision-raising, the stock-raising, the hemp-raising, the manufacturing, and the navigating interests.

But the more we trace this branch of the business of the country, or any other, through all its processes and all its ramifications, the more clearly we shall see, I think, that the old rule is the true rule, and that duties on imported goods are paid by different parts of the country, exactly in proportion to their consumption.

II. Another opinion of the honorable member is, that increased production brings about an expansion of the currency, and that every such increase makes a still further increase necessary.

His idea is, that if some goods are manufactured at home, less will be imported; if less goods be imported, the amount of exports still keeping up, the whole export being thus not paid for by the import, specie must be brought in to settle the balance; that this increase of specie gives new powers to the banks to discount; that the banks, thereupon, make large issues, till the mass of currency becomes redundant and swollen; that this swollen currency augments the price of productions, in our own manufactories, and makes it necessary to raise still higher the prices of their products, and this creates a demand for the imposition of new duties. This, as I understand it, is the honorable member's idea.

Now, it appears to me that there are several things worthy of consideration in regard to this supposed course and progress of things.

In the first place, it is far from being always true—I doubt much whether it be generally true—that importations fall off in consequence of carrying on some branches of manufacture at home. Our history certainly shows no such result, looking through the whole of it, for twenty years. If there be a large export, the return, if not made in one article, will generally be made in some other. It will usually happen in some way that, taking all branches of the trade of the country with all other countries together, the imports, in a series of years, will be about equal to the amount of exports, and the earnings of freights. We have now a list of free articles, of some of which the importations have been not only large but extravagant; quite large enough at any rate to absorb exports; and quite too large, in my opinion, for the good of the country.

The gentleman very properly admits that specie cannot, for a great length of time, set towards our country, from all others, to settle balances of trade, and to make up the deficiency of imports in relation to exports. Specie does, indeed, come to pay up an occasional balance in the trade between a particular country and the rest of the world, and it soon goes away again to supply a deficiency in the place it came from, or some other place. There are vibrations in trade, and gold and silver correct these vibrations. But there are other causes which sometimes operate with more violence. Disorders in the currency, and expected short crop, a political crisis, the fear of war, a panic of any kind; any of these things is able to disturb the natural course of commercial dealings, and to arrest gold and silver, while they are peaceably performing the common functions of trade. Hence, if we see a very large import of specie in any one year, it does not necessarily follow that our imports have, to that extent, fallen short of our exports. This import of specie may be owing to one or more of the extraneous causes above mentioned; and, in not alluding to these causes, I cannot but think the gentleman has overlooked a matter very important to be observed. In our trade with some particular countries, too, the return is in specie in a very great proportion. And, as this trade is very irregular, the quantities of specie received from it in different years are very unequal. Thus, in 1833, the whole import of specie into the country was 7,000,000; the next year, 1834, it was seventeen millions. In 1836, it was thirteen millions; in 1837, it fell to ten millions; and in 1838 rose up again to seventeen millions. Such fluctuations find no corresponding alternations certainly in the general balance between exports and imports. The general truth is undeniable, that the tendency of gold and silver, in the ordinary operations of commerce, is to flow to that country which has become a creditor country, by the excess of its exports over its imports; but then their general tendency is so often diverted or arrested by the interference of other causes, that the amount of importation or exportation of specie for a given year, is not a criterion by which the balance of trade, or the amount of exports compared with imports for that year, can be decided.

A great portion of the specie imported into the United States, comes from South America and Cuba, by way of New Orleans, and other ports, and is the return for provisions, and more largely for manufactured articles, shipped to those countries. This fact is important, and deserves consideration, in acting upon all subjects of this kind. It is undoubtedly true that the manufactures of the country bring into it a large supply of specie from South America and the West Indies.

The honorable gentleman, in maintaining his proposition that protection leads to an expansion of the currency, argues that the tariff of 1828 turned the balance of foreign trade in our favor; that this brought in specie; that the like cause turned the domestic trade in favor of the manufacturing States; and that the expansion of circulation, of which he exhibits tables, in those States, is thus distinctly traced to the effect of protection, as tending to bring gold and silver into the country. But all this, I think, admits of doubt. Post hoc, ergo propter hoc, is not received as good logic. It strikes me, this import of silver, and therefore the expansion, so far as it resulted from that import, is quite as likely to be referable to the other causes which I have already mentioned. The specie, it is said, was collected in masses in the North, and there the currency was expanded. But was it not expanded, too, in the South? The gentleman's tables only show four or five Northern States; but how was it, and how is it, in the cotton-growing States? Has there been no expansion in Mississippi and Alabama, or less expansion in those States than in Massachusetts and Rhode Island? It will be found, I think, that there was the least expansion, just where it is said the specie was thus brought in, by the course of trade.

The next stage in the gentleman's argument is, that this supposed expansion of the currency would increase the cost of producing manufactured articles at home. How increase this cost? In no way but by increasing the price of labor. Now I do not learn from him any facts showing that labor rose, greatly, in price, after the tariff of 1828. If it kept up to what it had been, I incline to think that was all. The object, and, I think, the effect, of the tariff of of 1828 was not so much to raise prices high, as it was to keep the market steady, to give some check to the extravagant amount of foreign importations, and some security that labor should receive a reasonable reward. That is all that was asked. But the great abundance of capital abroad, the low rate of interest, and the great sacrifices which were willingly made for the purpose of prostrating our establishments, called for some security and protection, or we were not likely to be able to maintain competition. And we are always to remember, that when our own manufactures shall be prostrated by the extremely low prices of imported goods, then we shall be immediately obliged to pay extremely high prices for those same imported goods. The fact undoubtedly is, that under the process of protection, the common price of cost of goods has become less. No one can deny that. Every body known that goods are better and cheaper. A man's labor will buy more for him than it would. This is the effect of competition. If we take out of the market the products of our own labor, who does not see that prices would rise enormously? Let this be tried on any article. Take away, for instance, all American made hats and shoes; would not the article be immediately doubled in price? Reasonable protection does not so much raise the price of labor, although it should raise it in some degree, as it diverges its uses, and multiplies its employments. It prevents any particular channel from being filled and choked up. One of the secrets of prosperity is, that there shall be a considerable variety in the pursuits and labors of men. I fear our Southern friends do not feel the full influence of this important truth. For my part, as a well-wisher to the South, I should be glad to know that there were manufactures, such as were suited to their wants, the value of their labor, and their general condition, in every county, from this place to the Gulf of Mexico.

There is still another point of view in which I wish to present the question to the consideration of the honorable gentleman. Suppose the Southern States to produce, every year, the same quantity of cotton. If more be manufactured at home, less will be exported. Now the honorable member seems to me to reason as if the whole true object or interest of the South was to export. But certainly this cannot be so. The object and interest of the cotton-growing States is to sell, not to export.

If they find a customer at home who pays a good price, their object is answered. The true question, therefore, in this respect is, not whether they export as much, but whether they sell as much, and at as good prices; and unless all the rules of trade are false, the fact of there being two markets for the sale of a commodity, instead of one, tends strongly to keep up and to keep steady the price of the article to be sold.

III. There is a third general idea of the honorable gentleman, upon which I would make a few observations.

It is, that the South and West are the great consumers of the products of the manufacturers of the North and East; that the capacity of the South to consume depends on her great staples; and that the sale of these depends mainly on a foreign market.

Now, I have already said that if the South can sell her cotton, or part of it, to New England, for the same prices, it is as well for her as to sell it all to Old England. Her income depends on the price, not on the place of sale. If an export of sixty millions is reduced to an export of forty millions, in consequence of there having been found a market at home for twenty millions, it is not only no worse for the South, but is in truth much better. This is perfectly plain; and I must confess it has always appeared to me to be the strangest thing in the world that our Southern friends should look with jealousy and ill will on a market, rising up in the North and East, for their own great staple—thus not only giving them the general advantage of another large market, which advantage is itself always great, but giving them the additional advantage of a nearer market, and a more certain and steady market, because not so liable to be disturbed either by the political events or the commercial contingencies of Europe. I have inquired much into this subject, and I find that intelligent merchants in New Orleans and Mobile regard the home market as of very great importance to the cotton planter. The Eastern demand, they say, comes in early, takes away the first part of the crop, and helps, therefore, to fix the price, and to fix it high. Some have estimated this advantage as equivalent to two cents on the pound of cotton. All must see, I think, that it is a clear and great advantage, and I wish the subject might be calmly considered and weighed by the honorable member from South Carolina and his friends.

But, at any rate, the fact that some portion of her annual product, instead of being exported, is sold at home, cannot possibly diminish the capacity of the South to buy and consume the manufactured articles of the East, or any other articles. The cotton planter sends his crop to New York; it is there sold, and all at the same price. How does it affect his income, or his ability to purchase what he wants, whether all his cotton so sold be sent to Europe, or part of it carried to be manufactured in Massachusetts?

But, now, look to the other side. Of what consequence is it to the North and East that the South is able to buy their productions, if overwhelming importations from abroad render them unable to sustain competition? If the cheaper labor of Europe underbids them in every thing—if these frequent inundations of foreign commodities break up their establishments, how are they benefited by the ability of the South to buy and consume? So that, turn it as we will, it all comes back to the steady price and security of labor. And all the theories lately started, and pressed with so much earnestness, go directly and necessarily to one point, and that is, the reduction of the price of labor. On this I might say much, but, at present, will confine myself to one or two remarks.

In the first place, when labor is employed, labor can consume; when it is not employed, it cannot consumer. Who buys the pork and the lard of the Northwestern States? Who takes the corn of North Carolina and Virginia, and the flour of the latter State? Is it not the North and the East? Virginia and Carolina have no better customer than Massachusetts. To say nothing of the amount of naval stores received from North Carolina, and used by the navigating interest of the East, let me only refer to breadstuffs. Two millions of bushels of corn and four hundred thousand barrels of flour have been imported into the single city of Boston in one year. Most of this corn is from North Carolina and Virginia, and much of the floor from Virginia. I find it has been estimated that upward of six millions of dollars have been paid by Massachusetts for breadstuffs imported in a single year. All this is consumed and paid for by employed labor. Take away employment from our labor, or drive it from its accustomed pursuits, and its power of consumption is at an end.

But not only does the protection of labor in the North and East enable it to buy the products of the South, but all protection of labor increases general consumption. Hence we find that the manufacture of many useful articles at home does not diminish the aggregate amount of importations. This is a very important truth, and all our history confirms it. I have looked at the tables of exports and imports, from the very first origin of this Government, and I do not find any thing to countenance the idea that imports, in the aggregate, fall off in consequence of protecting labor at home. There were quite as great fluctuations, forty or forty-five years ago, as there have been since the tariff of 1824. A well employed and prosperous community can buy and consume. An ill employed community cannot buy and consume. This is the solution of the whole matter, and the whole science of political economy has not one truth of half so much importance as this.

One word more. The experiment of low wages has been often tried. We see it going on now in Asia and many parts of Europe. My colleague has recently given us a list of the prices of labor in various countries. We know what those countries are, and the condition of the people is.

On the other hand, we have tried the experiment of high wages, and have we not made the best condition of society, for the general happiness of all classes, that has ever existed upon the face of the earth?

IV. A fourth sentiment of the honorable member is, that the removal of all duties increases the exportation of articles manufactured at home. I cannot conceive how this can be true. If foreigners can beat us in our own market, they can beat us elsewhere. The exports of domestic articles, in the years stated in the tables which the honorable gentleman has read, are not at all referable, I think, to any such cause as he supposes; that is to say, some natural cause, necessarily producing such a result. The truth is, that prices fell at that time, in consequence of excessive importations from Europe, and the holders of our own manufactured goods were obliged to get rid of them by exportation or otherwise, in the best manner they could. It is known that our exports of manufactured articles have been very variable and irregular. When importations have been great, and prices become reduced, then exportation has taken place. Our manufacturers have, in many instances, shown much skill in the fabrication or articles suited to foreign markets. For a while, they have been successful, in some degree; but the English have always been ready to imitate them, and profit by their example. If a particular article, manufactured in the United States, has been found capable of being sold to a profit in the Mediterranean, in South America, in India, or in China, the English manufacturer has immediately set himself to work to produce a similar article, and to drive the American article out of the market, by a like article afforded at a lower price, because the result of cheaper labor. These English articles have often been sold as American products. The stamp of "Lowell" and "Tremont Mills," or "Lawrence Mills," has been found in Asia and South America, on articles manufactured at Manchester.

V. Finally, the honorable member is of opinion that the whole system of protection was prostrated, and is prostrated, cut up root and branch, and exterminated forever, by the State interposition of South Carolina. He has often expressed this opinion before. I only take notice of it now, as he has expressed it very strongly, and, as it leads me to fear that I have been wrong in the expectation that I have been willing to cherish, that he himself would see both the justice and the political wisdom of giving moderate and reasonable protection, and of continuing it, so long as necessary, to some of the great, leading, and important branches of domestic industry.

I have only to add that I wish men, of all parties, who entertain the opinion that duties on imports fall heavily and unequally on the South, would calmly reconsider that opinion. Look to the great article of woollen cloths—where are they most consumed, because most necessary? Our laborers cannot, and must not, be left shivering under a Northern sky with the slight clothing which may be sufficient to protect the laborer of the South. They must have woollens, and they pay the price for them, and pay the price enhanced, if enhanced by the duties; and pay it willingly, for the sake of being secured in the hopes of a reasonable reward for their labor. This heavy article, one of those which pays most revenue, is consumed in the North, out of all proportion, more than in the South. Look to iron, another important article. The remarks applicable to woollens are applicable to this also; and the more so, as the manufacturing districts themselves are great consumers of iron. The same may be said of lead, and many other articles.

Sir, it is not my object to show that the South does not pay her part of the public contributions. I admit, most cheerfully, that she does pay her part; but my purpose has been to show, if I could, that she does not bear so unequal and unjust a portion of the public burdens as the gentleman has supposed. I am quite sure that a calm and dispassionate consideration of this whole subject by intelligent and enlightened men, on either side of the Potomac, would result in the conviction that there is really no such wide difference, in regard to what the interests of the different parts of the country require, as ought either to endanger the security of the Union or create ill-will. For myself, I fully and conscientiously believe that, in regard to this whole question, the interest of the North and East is entirely reconcileable to the real, solid, and permanent interest of the South and West.

REMARKS OF MR. CALHOUN,

IN REPLY.

It affords me pleasure to say, that the Senator has discussed the questions on which he has touched in a calm and liberal manner, worthy of their magnitude, and honorable to himself; and I sincerely hope that when the general revision of the tariff, which must come up at the next session, shall be under consideration, that the discussion shall partake of the same temperate character. I, for one, pledge myself to meet the question with the utmost candor and fairness, having a single eye to the common interest of the whole, as far as may be consistent with justice to the parts.

The first point which the Senator has made the subject of his remarks—that duties on exports and imports were virtually the same, as far as the staple States are concerned—was not advanced by me as an argument bearing on the portion of my speech relating to the protective system, to which he has confined his reply. It was connected with another and dissimilar topic, and advanced rather as the settled opinion of the South, than as argument; but it is proper to say, since it has been questioned on this occasion, that my conviction of its truth is deep, and that I shall be prepared to make it good whenever a suitable occasion offers. I do not regard the present as such, because its truth or error can have little bearing on the points now in discussion between us.

The next point which he made the subject of remark, is the position that, in the present state of our country, the effect of a protective tariff is to expand the currency in the manufacturing portion of the Union, till the increased expense of production, in consequence of the expansion, becomes equal to the protection, when protection ceases against foreign importation, and new duties are required.* I am willing to leave the argument on this important position where it now stands between the Senator and myself, and shall confine what I have to say to one or two points incidentally connected with it.

* 'It is Mr. WEBSTER's second head in the report of his remarks. I have given the position, which he questioned, in my own language, as that in which he has couched it does not truly express the principle which I maintained.

I, then, entirely concur with the Senator, that the imports and exports of a country, taking a series of years, and allowing for the profit and loss of trade, must be equal; but there is another position, the counter part of that which, though not less true, is not so generally seen or admitted: that the amount of the exports must, in the long run, be limited by that of the imports. None will deny that if we are not permitted to import, we cannot long continue to export; unless, indeed, we should be willing to give away the product of our labor.

So again, if we are not permitted to import more than a given amount in value, annually, say forty millions, our exports, on the same principle, in the end, will sink to the same point. Again, if the great and leading articles of consumption are prohibited, or admitted only on the payment of extravagant duties, so as to diminish the amount of the imports, it must have a corresponding effect on that of the exports. Now, I ask, what must be the effect of this principle applied to a protective tariff, in the present state of our export trade? Our export of home productions is about one million annually. Suppose an act should be passed prohibiting all imports except gold and silver. Such an act would not prevent the shipment of our great staples, cotton, tobacco, and rice. We make more than can be consumed at home, and the surplus must be sent abroad, however great would be the fall of price and the sacrifice, in consequence of such an act. Put down the full amount at one half, there would still be an importation of forty or fifty millions in specie; and what, I would ask, would be the effect of so large a supply, but a corresponding expansion of the currency and rise of prices. But suppose, instead of such an act, one should be passed prohibiting a greater amount of imports than one half of the usual quantity; would not a proportional expansion and rise of prices follow? And must not the effect be the same, if, instead of prohibition, high duties were laid, amounting almost to prohibition on most of the leading articles of consumption, equaling in value one half of the usual importation? And, finally, would not the specie, imported in consequence of such an act, centre in that portion of the country where such articles were manufactured, and be followed there by a corresponding rise of prices?

The argument, it seems to me, is irresistible, and, of itself, establishes the position which the Senator controverts. If, to this, the fact be added that the table of exports and imports, and the history of the protective system, corresponds in every particular with the operation I have deduced from it, as a necessary consequence, it appears to be conclusive. These tables will show, just as duties were imposed or repealed, the exports decreased or increased; so much so, that after the great reduction in 1833, the exports of the great staples nearly doubled in four years, and that of domestic manufactures rose sixty-six per cent. in six. In speaking of the exports of our great staples, although I referred to the exports to foreign countries, I might have shown that the increase was not at the expense of the home market; so far otherwise, if I am not greatly deceived, their exports North increased at the same time, but not in the same proportion.

The Senator seemed to doubt whether the tariff of 1828 increased wages. I had no means of ascertaining the fact from documentary evidence, but think it impossible that the vast increase of the currency which the tables shows, took place in the manufacturing portion of the Union, after that tariff could fail to raise prices generally there, including wages. I well remember that a former Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILKINS,] who resided in Pittsburg, informed me, in a conversation, that blacksmiths' wages were doubled there, in consequence of that measure.

I cheerfully admit, with the Senator, that the home market is preferable to the foreign. It has many advantages; and among them I would prefer it on the ground that whatever might be gained by converting our raw materials into goods, would accrue to our own brethren of the North, than to strangers, provided it be not done by sacrificing our interest. But how is this to be effected? Our great staples are too abundant to be consumed at home. Take, for instance, cotton. If every yard of cotton goods consumed in the United States was the product of our own manufactures, it would not take more than four hundred thousand bales to supply the home demand, that is, but one-fifth of the amount produced; while the amount produced cannot be less than two million bales, including what is consumed at home. What is to be done with the other four-fifths? We must cease to produce it, or it must be consumed abroad. The effect of a high tariff is to curtail the production; but that only tends to diminish our capacity to consume, by impoverishing us, and thus causing a conflict between our interest and the manufacturing portion of the Union. How is this to be avoided, and the interests of all parts reconciled? That is the great problem. I see but one way, and that is, for our manufactures to command the foreign market; when our cotton would be shipped in the shape of yarn and goods, instead of the raw state. This we would greatly prefer. But how is this to be accomplished, except by a sound, stable and uniform currency, and low duties, as I explained when I addressed the Senate when first up on this question? Such are my views, formed after much reflection. If I am in error, I am honestly so. Truth, and truth only, is my object, accompanied by an anxious desire to see the interests of this great country harmonized on just, fair, and liberal principles. It is impossible they can be on any other.

I agree with the Senator that currency is liable to be disturbed by many and various, and powerful cause, some more, and others less permanent. I do not think that it has yet recovered from the effects of the long and exhausting wars, which terminated in the overthrow of the late Emperor of France. At its termination, the currency of Christendom was in an unsound and unnatural state, particularly this country and Great Britain, in both of which paper had superseded gold and silver. We were the first to resume specie payments, which gave the precious metals a direction to this country. Great Britain resumed some years after, when it took an opposite direction; and hence the heavy exports of specie in '21, '22, and '23. The tariff of '24 checked that for a time, and that of '28 gave the currency a direction hitherward again; which was followed by the operation of other and powerful causes, down to the late suspension, as I have shown in my remarks when I first spoke on the subject; but I feel assured that the expansion which followed the tariff of '28 is truly to be attributed to it, not only because there was no other cause at the time to which it could be attributed, but because it was of itself adequate to produce the effect, and because its duration and modification, in every particular, were such as might be expected from it.

I agree with the Senator as to the great importance of uniformity of prices, but am firmly of the opinion that nothing short of the restoration of the currency contemplated by the Constitution, and a surrender of the protective system, can insure the uniformity which he so justly appreciates.

Passing over the other remarks of the Senator, which I am willing to leave, as it now stands between him and myself, I shall conclude by making a few observations on the objection he makes to the position that low duties are favorable to the exportation of articles manufactured at home. He thinks that the increase of the exports of such articles, after the reduction of the duties in '33, is not to be attributed to the reduction, but to the excessive previous importations from Europe, which compelled our manufacturers to get rid of their stock by seeking a foreign market. Without admitting or denying the fact of such excess of importation of the foreign articles, at this time, a decisive answer to the objection may be found in the explanationa afforded by the tables themselves. In the first place, the increase of the exports, as will appear by reference to the tables, was steadily progressive; each succeeding year being higher than the preceding, just as the duties went off, and the last year of which we have these returns, '38, the highest of all. In the next place, the falling off, under the tariffs of '24 and '28, followed almost as steadily the same law throughout the long period of eight years, making, for the two periods taken together, fourteen years, which clearly shows that the cause is not to be found in any accidental state of the market. But there is a third and conclusive reason, that the great staples of the country followed the same law through both periods, and to which the cause assigned by the Senator cannot apply. To this, if further proof be necessary, may be added the general argument already stated, that any limitation on the imports, whether by prohibition or high duties, must act as a limitation on the exports, and, which is equally applicable, to the staples, and the home manufacturers.

Let me now say, Mr. President, in conclusion, that I believe that we have reached the point of time, when the interest of every section of our wide spread country, North, East, South, and West, may be reconciled, and the industry of the whole be placed on the firmest and most durable basis. What we want is calm and deliberate discussion, with a spirit to seek the truth, and to do equal justice to all. I shall come to the question in that spirit myself, and if the discussion shall take a different character, the blame shall not lie at my door.

SPEECH OF MR. FULTON,

OF ARKANSAS,

In Senate, Tuesday, March 3, 1840—On the report of the Select Committee on the assumption of the debts of the States by the General Government.

Mr FULTON addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: Through the kindness of my friend from Tennessee, an opportunity has been afforded me, to occupy a small portion of your time to-day. But, sir, I do not rise to go over the wide field of discussion, which has been indulged in by Senators, in the course of this debate. I have a few words to say upon the subject of State debts, and the application of the national revenue, whether derived from customs or lands, to their payment, and I intend to confine myself strictly to an explanation of my views and opinions upon subjects which I consider to be deeply interesting to my constituents. An imperious sense of duty to myself and to the State I have the honor in part to represent, will, I trust, excuse this trespass upon your already exhausted patience, and I hope that the Senate will indulge me, although it may not be in my power to present much that can be regarded as either new or original, upon the subject under consideration. It is said, sir, that the passage of these resolutions will affect injuriously the character and credit of the States. It therefore becomes peculiarly our duty, as Senators, to consider well our conduct before we take a step which may be calculated, in the slightest degree, to do such mischief as some Senators seem to think will result from adopting the resolutions and sanctioning this report. I have listened attentively, sir, to what has been said on both sides of this chamber; and I have heard nothing which has at all alarmed me, as to the effect these proceedings are calculated to produce upon State stocks and State credit, or which has induced me for a moment to doubt the propriety of voting for the original resolutions, or for those which have been reported to the Senate.

What, sir, is the object and purpose of this report and these resolutions? They are merely declarations that the Federal Government is incapable of assuming the payment of the bonds issued by the several States; and that such assumption, as also the appropriation of the proceeds of the public domain for that purpose, would be not only unjust and highly inexpedient, but would also be dangerous to the union of the States—unauthorized by, and in violation of, the Constitution of the United States, and utterly repugnant to all the objects and purposes for which the Federal Union was formed. Now, sir, I would ask how can such resolutions affect the character or credit of the States? It is admitted on all hands that the States have sold their bonds to an amount of between one and two hundred millions of dollars, and that the bankers of Europe are now the principal holders of these bonds: that these bonds were purchased upon the faith and credit of the States; and it is to be presumed that the purchasers knew the full indebtedness of each of the States, at the time those purchases were made, and what were their resources and means of payment? If this is the true state of the case, how, I would ask, can the adoption of these resolutions affect the credit of the States?

The credit of the States would be small, indeed, if a mere statement of the amount of their indebtedness was calculated to injure them.

The Senator from Missouri, in bringing forward this subject, has shown his usual devotion to the best interests of the States; to the preservation of the independent action of the Federal and State Governments; and to the prevention of false hopes and expectations on the part of those who are ignorant of the peculiar construction of all the Governments of this confederated Republic. The special committee, too, to whom the subject was referred, through their distinguished chairman, the Senator from Tennessee, have ably done their duty, and have presented the subject in so clear a point of light as cannot fail to carry conviction to the mind of every reader who examines their report. Indeed, sir, no higher compliment could be paid to this report than has fallen from Senators who are opposed to these resolutions. They have found the first three propositions presented to be so ably and clearly demonstrated, that they have been led to call them self-evident truths, and to admit that it would be the height of folly to attempt to oppose them. To those who have attentively studied the structure of our Government, this may be true; but, I would ask, how many are there, both at home and abroad, who needed the light which this report has afforded, in order to the formation of a correct opinion upon the question? We owe, also, much to these resolutions for the able discussion which they have led to; and we are greatly indebted to many Senators here for the powerful and masterly efforts they have made in their support, as also for the talented exertions they have brought forth in opposition. It is the flood of light which this discussion has shed upon this subject, which I consider as invaluable to the country.

The first objection made is, that this proceeding has exposed the indebtedness of the States to an alarming amount. This objection is founded on a supposition of the ignorance of the purchasers of the State bonds as to the extent of State indebtedness, which, it is impossible to imagine, can have existed. Is it to be supposed that those who have dealt in hundreds of millions of State stocks—that those bankers, who may be said almost to command the wealth of the world, and whose operations in stocks can hardly be calculated—have been making their purchases of American securities without a thorough knowledge of the business? Such a supposition is totally irreconcileable with all our ideas of the thorough knowledge and perfect familiarity with all the monetary affairs of the world, which is possessed by the bankers and capitalists, who are alone able to loan upon interest. Or are we to suppose, sir, that the foreign purchasers have been tempting the States to sell their bonds to an amount beyond what they considered them as able to pay, under the belief that the Federal Government would assume the payment, or that they could force the United States to assume them? No, sir: all the bonds which have been sold, be it either one or two hundred millions, have been purchased fairly from the States who issued them. Their separate wealth was relied upon solely, both for the payment of the interest and principal; and no pledge, either of the public lands or of the national resources, was, or ought to have been, calculated upon as the inducement to the purchase. The purchasers, in every instance, had a full knowledge of the liabilities of each of the States, and of her prospects of reimbursement from the application of the funds realized from such sales. Would it not be in the highest degree wrong for one of the States of this Union to attempt to deceive a purchaser who is about to buy her bonds? The most public promulgation, therefore, of the whole indebtedness of all the States, cannot, and ought not, to be objected to by the best friends of the debtor States; and all that is said in this report, on that point, has been known—fully known—to all the traders in State stocks, both in Europe and America, for years past; and, no doubt, with the utmost exactness, as each successive sale has been effected.

When the bonds of the State of Arkansas came into the market, the purchasers not only required to know the whole indebtness of the State, but they required also to be fully satisfied as to her wealth and resources, and every thing calculated to inform them as to her ability to pay the whole amount of her existing and contemplated liabilities. And now sir, I ask, how are these bonds to be discharged? Those of the State of Arkansas, Louisiana, and a great many others, are employed most profitably; they are used for banking capital; and so far as the States themselves are interested, they will relieve the people from State taxation, and become a profitable stock, the dividend of which will make them always eagerly sought after by capitalists. Those which have been invested in internal improvements, which are completed, are also highly profitable; and the only unproductive portion are those which are vested in unfinished works. And, sir, in relation to these, what is the prospect which an anticipation of even twenty years presents? Why, sir, the millions which are yet to people the great valley of the Mississippi, even in that short time, and the rich productions, which the exuberant soil of that region must yield to the industry and labor of such a vast population; and the facilities of transportation, which the works for which these State debts have been contracted must afford for sending their large surpluses to market, cannot but make the stocks created for the construction of all their important works as valuable at least as those of the State of New York now are. Some of the States may have some difficulties to encounter before this great result is fully realized, but that such a result will be realised, notwithstanding the present suspension of some of these important works, I cannot permit myself to doubt.

It is a mistake to say that our declaration against the assumption will affect injuriously the sale of bonds yet unsold. Is it not known to all the world that the sale of State bonds has been for some time suspended, and that none are now selling? The foreign bankers have ample knowledge of the amount of bonds already sold; and therefore it is the further purchase has been stopped. Why have the foreign bankers ceased to purchase? Is it not because they have a perfect knowledge of the amount already sold? It is now their business to see that the debtor States are prepared to meet all their indebtedness. The foreign creditors are certainly too much interested, to permit the credit of the debtor States to be destroyed. Say the amount is two hundred millions; and is it not palpable how much it must be to the interest of the holders of the stocks to keep them from depreciation? No, sir; the scheme now is to force this Government to add greatly to the value of these bonds, by involving the United States as security. They know that the depreciation of the bonds already sold cannot injure the debtor States. Those States will not have any more interest to pay upon their bonds, nor will in any manner, increase their indebtedness. The State of Arkansas has found no difficulty in paying the interest upon her bonds with the utmost punctuality, and nothing should produce a depreciation of their value, but the necessities of the holders or the scarcity of money resulting in forced sales. It is true, sir, a depreciation will prevent the sale of new bonds, unless at a sacrifice. But, if the depreciation of the value of the bonds of some of the States, really proceeds from the fact that those States have created debts that are considered very large, is it not better for them to stop, than to run the risk of involving the people in greater liabilities? Some of the works of the States may be for a time suspended; but with so much enterprise, and such products as those States are annually sending to market, the utmost prosperity will soon be restored, and the ability of the States to finish, and the importance and necessity of the works, will soon became such as fully to justify, and lead to their completion, and to the consummation of all the advantages which these works were designed to accomplish. The friends of these resolutions have been unjustly accused of having assailed the credit of the States. The utmost indignation has been expressed at an imaginary charge of bankruptcy against some of the States. I know of no such charge as that having been made; and if it were made, it would be totally disregarded. It would be universally condemned as slanderous and unjust Why, sir, most of the States of this Union are better able to pay any amount of debt which they may choose to contract, than are most of the Governments of Europe, whose annual expenditures are nearly a hundred fold greater, and whose national debts have reached the most startling amounts. Some of the States may have anticipated their resources, and may find even the interest of their State debt somewhat onerous at present. This will, and must be, but temporary. All their leading improvements must, in time, become valuable By their important works, the brightest prospects have been revived in the older States, and the tide of prosperity has been turned again towards them; and the new States, advancing as they are with astonishing rapidity, to wealth and greatness, and acquiring an industrious population, which must lead to still more wonderful developments, we cannot now calculate the value to them of their great works of improvement.

But, sir, even if the charge of bankruptcy had been made against the States, what effect, I would ask, would such a charge have on their credit? It is known that the States are sovereign, and that they can so tax their citizens as to enable them to raise whatever amount of revenue they may require; and that, therefore, they will always be able to meet the payment of the interest on their debts, and to redeem the principal at the appointed time. Such a charge could have no effect upon the credit of the States. A similar charge has been often made against the United States; and even at the present session, the national bankruptcy has been, apparently with some exultation, proclaimed to the Senate and to the world; and it has been charged as the consequence of Democratic misrule, and extravagant expenditure. And yet, sir, what effect has this charge ever had upon the credit of the nation? And have we any reason to fear the effects it will hereafter have? No, sir, none! Our national resources are known to the world; and no matter who may say the United States is bankrupt, and that she has not a dollar in her chest, and no matter how widespread this charge may become, still will the credit of this Republic remain uninjured, and her debts be at all times regarded as more than equivalent to gold and silver. Are we not all American citizens, as well as citizens of our respective States? Why, then, sir, all this sensitiveness as to State credit, and by those, too, who appear so willing to proclaim that which might destroy the credit of the nation?

It is said that these resolutions are uncalled for, as we have no proposition before the Senate, either for the assumption of State debts, or for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, for the payment of those debts. Now, sir, what are the facts? From 1820, at which time the States had created no debts of any amount worth mentioning, to 1830, the States had contracted debts to the amount of only twenty-five millions of dollars; in five years thereafter, from 1830 to 1835, they had increased their debts to forty millions more; so that, in fifteen years, their debts were increased to upwards of sixty-five millions, principally for internal improvements and for banks. The State of New York had finished her great canal, and had opened a mine of wealth to her citizens, of the most inexhaustible and richest description, and the other States soon followed her example. Now, sir, let us look at what took place during the next three years, from 1835 to 1837, when the rage, not only for improvements, but for banks, also had spread all over the Union, and when the country was deluded by an artificial prosperity, produced by the wide-spread operations of the Bank of the United States, in her powerful attempt to control the moneyed affairs of the whole Union, and when speculations of all kinds had grown up to such an alarming height. Why, sir, in that short time, the States created debts to the amount of one hundred and eight millions. Thus the States have become indebted, in eighteen years, for roads, canals, and for banking, to the amount of one hundred and seventy millions. And what, Mr. President, has been the result? Why, sir, a sudden stop has been put to the sale of State bonds. The bankers of Europe refuse to loan the States any more money; and some of these States, with their valuable and costly works unfinished, are refused the means of completing them, unless the United States will give her pledge for the redemption of all the State debts. This was the situation in which we found ourselves at the opening of the present session of Congress.

It is true, sir, the assumption of the State debts by this Government was not a mandate emanating from the crowned heads of Europe; nor was it intimated, that in case of refusal, that it would be a just cause of war. But, sir, the bankers of Europe, who are said to control the cabinets of Kings, through their great organs in London—the associates, if not the directors of British councils—have told us, in language not to be misunderstood, "that the States must pause in the execution of their works of improvement! unless a more comprehensive guarantee than that of the individual States" is given, and unless "a national pledge" is made to see that the State debts are punctually paid. And, sir, what was the effect produced when this authoritative mandate came across the waters? Was it treated with indignation, as an injurious imputation on the debtor States? Was it regarded, as it ought to have been, as an attempt to coerce them to make new terms with their creditors, and to force them to apply to the National Government for assistance? Was it regarded as an outrageous breach of that faith which was tacitly pledged to the States, by inducing them to borrow more than one hundred millions of dollars in three short years, upon their own credit alone, and for works and purposes which they must have considered as capable of yielding a fair profit?

No, sir, such was not the effect which the circular of the Barings and Co. produced in the United States. On the contrary, the proposition even met with favor in America; and immediately it was currently circulated that the public lands might be made available to meet this insolent demand, and insulting imputations cast upon the debtor States, by these foreign bankers. It will not do to say that this is the mere act of the brokers. Do we not already see and feel the effect it has produced? It was under these circumstances that this subject was brought before the Senate. It was in order that Senators who are the representatives here of sovreign States, might say to those foreign Governments whose subjects and bankers have loaned their millions to the States, that neither those Governments nor their subjects shall be permitted to exact new terms of payment, or other security than they have voluntarily taken from the States themselves; and to inform them that this Government has not the constitutional power to pay those debts. Under such circumstances, was it not, I would ask, our duty to ourselves, to the States, to the United States, as also to the people and Governments of Europe, that this subject should be fairly, fully, and ably brought forward, and decided upon? Should we sit quietly here, and see the credit of the States of this Union trifled with in this manner, by the great bankers of Europe, simply because they can, by their tremendous money power, sway and control the decisions of foreign Governments? No, sir: I trust the time will never come when the Senate of the United States shall fear to do its duty, lest it may give offence to the great money autocrats of Europe.

It is true, sir, it has been significantly asked, if, in case of a war with a foreign power, we would refuse to assume the debts of the States, if that were the sole condition upon which peace could be obtained? Why, sir, the very asking of such a question makes it incumbent upon us to place ourselves upon the true constitutional ground, in relation to this subject. These resolutions, sir, like Mr. Madison's resolutions in the Virginia Legislature, declare certain conclusions, and maintain certain great principles, essential to the preservation of national rights, the faith, sovereignty and dignity of the States, and the best interests of the American people; and, I think, ought to meet with the approving sanction of every Senator.

Let us look, Mr. President, at the tempting prize which these bankers have before them. They have induced the States of this Union to borrow of them between one and two hundred millions of dollars, at a high rate of interest. Now suppose, sir, that they should succeed in forcing the Federal Government to pay, or to assume the payment of, these debts. What would be the result? Why, sir, immediately would the value of these stocks become so much enhanced, as to place many millions in the pockets of these bankers. Now suppose that these bankers, under the false assertion of the insecurity of these State debts, should force the British Government to make the assumption, by the United States, of the State debts, a cause of war, and that this nation should, in this way, become involved in all the calamities of war on this account; would it, or could it, be justified, that the American Senate had tamely looked on whilst this great work of national money-making was deliberately planned and consummated, without ever thinking of placing the question in its true light before the world, or interposing its declaration of the want of power in the Federal Government to make the whole people of the United States liable for so large a national debt?

It will not do to permit the money power of Europe to continue to control the destinies of the United States. Look, sir, at the wide extended ruin which the money king in Europe, and his agent in America, have repeatedly spread through our land. We hear of the removal of deposites, of the specie circular, of the distribution of the surplus revenue, as the causes of the distresses which have afflicted the people of this Union for some years past. These measures, operating at the most only on a small amount of our accruing revenue, would not, and could not, have been felt, if the great money power had not decreed that he would make them the groundwork of the sufferings of the American people. Who can look back at the alternations of prosperity and adversity—of extravagance and suffering—the expansions and contractions in the money market—the high and low prices of property and commodities, and of labor—the plenty and scarcity of money—in a word, the distresses with which our people have been cursed, for a few years past, and not be willing now candidly to admit, that it was all the work of the great money powers in Europe and America.

But, we are told sir, that all this suffering has been the result of a war, waged by this Government against credit and money corporations. Now, sir, I would ask, who has waged this war on credit? Was it not the late Bank of the United States? Did she not, from the moment that Gen. Jackson, in his first message, intimated his doubts as to the propriety of granting her a recharter, commence a reckless system of electioneering? A wide-spread and ruinous enlargement of her accommodations, and an alarming amount of issue of paper money, (to say nothing of her lavish expenditures,) for the purpose of producing a powerful influence in her favor? In her efforts to gain popularity, was she not guilty of abuses, which her warmest friends have not been able to justify? Are there not, sir, thousands of individuals, who have heretofore supported a National Bank, but who have been forced to abandon the idea of creating another National Bank, after having witnessed the dangerous results produced by such a great moneyed institution becoming a partisan in our electioneering contests for political power? Yey, sir, it was the United States Bank who commenced this war on credit. She loaned out her millions, until she supposed she had got the country ripe for a recharter. Then, with all her plans well matured, several years before her charter was to expire, and just before a Presidential election, she asked Congress to renew her charter. The work had been done—the bill passed both Houses of Congress—and the late President must either disgrace himself, by approving the bill, or sacrifice his popularity by refusing it his sanction. Gen. Jackson met the crisis with that intrepidity which has always characterized him. He preferred to lose his election rather than his honor. He gave the Bank her quietus; he vetoed the bill which was thus prematurely passed; and his countrymen have sanctioned the act. Then it was, sir, that the Bank commenced her war upon the State banks, and upon credit. She first attempted to break down the State banks. She forced them to rapid settlements, and drew from them all the specie she could command; and this induced the late President gradually to withdraw the public deposites. This precautionary measure prevented her from accomplishing her first purpose; but she was not in this way to be foiled. It only afforded her an excuse to commence a war upon her debtors; and, sir, the ruin and suffering which she then spread over our land I will not now attempt to describe. She made a tremendous effort to destroy the late President himself; but the eyes of the people had been opened; and, as the incessant torrent of inflammatory speeches poured out in Congress, and throughout the country, produced no effect upon the public mind, the popularity of the President remained unshaken; and, as a last resort, the Bank obtained a charter from Pennsylvania. In a few short months after afflicting the country with so much misery, and without a dollar of public money to justify it, she again run up her line of discounts to a greater amount than she had ever before loaned to the community. She sold her branches, and bought State banks; expanded her issues to the utmost bounds, and for a time deluded the people with the idea of having produced the highest state of prosperity in the country. The State banks followed the lead—money became so plenty it was impossible to invest it. In two short years, near forty millions were expended in the purchase of public lands. The price of property and labor was nearly doubled. No transaction was considered worthy of being mentioned, unless millions were involved. Our importations of foreign merchandise were almost twice as large as a healthy state of trade would justify, and the spirit of speculation and extravagance was carried to a most alarming height. But a reaction had to follow; and it came upon us with all its terrors, and with consequences of the most calamitous character. Our merchants were protested in Europe to an amount stated at hundreds of millions; and the failures which took place in our commercial cities alone, were almost incredible. The banks suspended from one end of the Union to the other, with the Government funds in their hands; and thus were the friends of the Administration forced to conclude that all banks were unsafe depositories of the public moneys. The President, at the called session of Congress, recommended that the public deposites should no longer be used for banking purposes; and that the money ought to be kept from the time of its collection, until it is placed in the hands of disbursing officers, or otherwise expended under the regular appropriations, by persons employed by the Government for that purpose; and in safe places, belonging to the Government itself. This recommendation constitutes the height and front of the President's offending, and is the foundation of the charge of the war upon the credit of the country we have so often heard complained of. My own idea is, that its adoption, instead of injuring, will give stability to credit. For my own part, sir, I cannot see how individual credit has been or can be affected by this measure, if it shall become a law; and, besides the certain command, which it will afford the Government, of its means whenever they are required, I can only see in it, in prospect, that it will produce a wholesome restraint upon the issues of the State banks. I am one of those who wish to see the State banks well regulated by State legislation; and would rejoice if they could be restrained from issuing small notes, to the exclusion of gold and silver from circulation. But I am not one of those—and indeed I do not know that there are any such—who are at this time in favor of an exclusive metallic currency. The power to give banking privileges to corporations belongs exclusively to the States. It has been exercised by them, and they cannot now be deprived of this power. The price of property should never be permitted to fall, if it can be avoided, below a fair and proper standard of value; and the wages of labor ought always to be proportioned to the price of the articles the laborer consumes. But, sir, all regulations on this subject belong to the States; and I think we will best consult the public good, by leaving to the States to determine what is best for the interest of their people.

But we are told by those who oppose these resolutions, that no one contends that the United States can assume the payment of the State debts, but that they do contend that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands may be distributed among the States, to be applied by them to the payment of their debts, if they think fit to do so. They admit the injustice of involving the States which do not owe any thing, for the purpose of paying the debts of those who are in debt. And yet there is no difference in reality between assuming in the one case, and paying in the other, excepting that, by paying the land revenue to the States, you divert so much of the public revenue, not only to make payments for the debtor States, but, also, for purpose of making proportional donations to all the other States. Every dollar thus draw from the Treasury, creates the necessity of raising a like amount off of the people, to meet the public expenditures. It is, in fact, taking the money of all the people to pay the debts of certain States, and also to give the people's money away to other States, who do not want it.

But, say they, the proceeds of the public lands belong to the States; and since the national debt is discharged, they have a legal right to claim all the land revenue as their own. Let us examine the correctness and the validity of this claim, which has been so pertenaciously set up for the States The public lands included within the bounds of the Union, established by the treaty of peace, made at the close of the Revolution, with Great Britain, became the property of the United States; first, by the States claiming the right of pre-emption, surrendering that right to the United States; and then by the subsequent extinguishment of the Indian title by the United States. And upon what terms, sir, did the States surrender this right of pre-emption? They stipulated for the complete payment of all their debts; and then provided that the proceeds of the sales of the lands should be applied to no other purpose whatever, except to the support of the National Government. It is said, that after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, that as the States no longer contributed, as States, to the support of the Government, but as its support is now drawn from the whole people, that therefore, the proceeds of the public lands have again become the property of the States. This ground cannot be maintained, when we take into view the objects and purposes, for which the surrenders were made. All the States claimed that the contributions of each should be proportionably lessened by the amount of the revenue derived from the sale of these lands; and it was in order that the tax upon the people of all the States might be thus proportionably lessened, that the States insisted that the title to the public lands should be vested in the United States. This was the compromise made by the confederated States. The express stipulation in their deeds of cession, that the proceeds were to be applied to the public expenditure, and to no other purpose whatsoever, absolutely forbids the idea that such proceeds can be lawfully returned to the States. Suppose that Congress should think fit to raise the revenue from direct taxation, and not from customs, and that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands were distributed to the States, would not the people of the non-debtor States have to be higher taxed than those of the debtor States, to raise the additional revenue which this distribution would necessarily give rise to? The money would be drawn from the pockets of the people to support the National Government, whilst the land revenue would be taken from them and given to the States? The objects for which the public lands were surrendered by the States which claimed them, remained precisely the same after, as before, the adoption of the Federal Constitution; and the change in the mode of raising the additional amount of revenue necessary for the support of the Government, did not, in the slightest degree, alter the provision that the sales of the lands should be applied to the public expenditure, and to no other purpose whatsoever. This land revenue belongs to the people of the United States, in their national character, and cannot be lawfully taken from them and given to the States. The Indian title has been extinguished by the money of the people of the United States, precisely as their money has been applied to the payment of the purchases of Louisiana and Florida. There is no difference whatever in the title of the people of the United States to the lands surrendered by the States, and to that purchased from France and Spain, except that the States imposed, in their case, the condition upon the Government, which the Constitution imposed in the other cases. Who can contend that the States are entitled to the proceeds of the sales of the lands purchased from France and Spain? As well might they contend for the proceeds of the sales of our national ships, or of the public buildings and grounds within this District. That portion, too, of the public lands not sold, within the limits of the country relinquished by the States, is now so inconsiderable that it is only when added to the undisputed land revenue that it becomes an object, or would yield an amount worth distributing; and as there is no prospect of a surplus revenue for several years to come, but, on the contrary, as there exists an absolute necessity for several millions of money to pay the annual national expenditures, more than will be yielded both from the customs and the lands, all the moneys derived from the lands relinquished by the States, will almost inevitably be applied to their legitimate purpose, before it can be hoped that such a state of things will exist as would justify even those who think the States are entitled to the proceeds of those lands, seriously to press the question of distribution. The Senator from Kentucky acknowledged that, partly on this account, he had declined to bring forward his distribution bill at this session. I believe, sir, that the States have no right to the land revenue, other than they have to the money derived from other sources. The new States have been forced to surrender their right to tax the lands of the United States within their limits, in order to gain admission into the Union. This surrender of State sovereignty places them upon an unequal footing with the other States. The old States have not only a right to all the public lands within their limits, but have also the undisputed right to tax, for their support, every foot of appropriated land. This, sir, is a most grievous inequality; and the only wonder with me is, that the new States were ever induced to submit to it. If they had the right to tax the public lands, as they have to tax those of their own citizens, and non-residents, the ownership of the Government over so much of their soil would not be as oppressive as it now is. The Federal Government contributes nothing to the support of their State Governments—nothing to the making of their roads and highways—nothing to their improvements, unless it be under contract, or as a voluntary donation—and nothing towards the opening and clearing of lands, and rearing up of magnificent towns and cities, and beautiful villages. And yet, sir, by all these means, and the labors and moneys of the citizens of the new States, are the public lands vastly enhanced in value, and made to be a great source of national wealth. It is true, sir, that, to lessen this great inequality, some lands have been given for school purposes, and in one or two instances for State improvements, when regarded as of national importance: but, sir, it is in spite of the oppressive ownership which the Federal Government exercises over the public lands within the limits of the new States, that they have grown up, and have now become the most flourishing members of the American Confederacy. Nothing could be more fatal to the interests of the new States, than the adoption of the principle of distributing the proceeds of the public lands. It brings the interests of the States, as communities, in direct conflict with the interests of the citizens of the new States. Those who are, or who desire to become, citizens of the new States, wish to get the lands they need for cultivation upon the cheapest terms possible. The easier the lands can be acquired, the larger will be the emigration, and the greater the population of the new States. Make it the interest of a majority of the States to keep up or to raise the price of the public lands, and you forbid forever all hope of the citizens of the new States to obtain pre-emption or graduation acts; and you cut them off from an increase of population, and from the hope of rendering all the lands available in the support of their State Governments.

For my own part, sir, I can see no difference between the land revenue and the impost revenue; and I consider the appopriation of either to the payment of the debts of the States, would be equally unconstitutional, dangerous, unjust, and inexpedient, and I have, therefore, felt myself called upon, by the highest considerations of duty, as well as from a sense of justice to the States, to the United States, and to foreign Governments, to submit these considerations to the Senate. I conclude, sir, by expressing a fervent hope that our free institutions may be always able to withstand the dangerous and insidious encroachments of that worst of despotisms, an aristocracy of wealth.

SPEECH OF MR. PICKENS,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, December 10, 1839—

On the subject of the New Jersey disputed election.

Mr. PICKENS presented the following resolution, which was read, and which, he said, he offered as an amendment to the resolution of his colleague, [Mr. THOMPSON:]

"Resolved, That the committee to be raised on the New Jersey election, be confined to the question who is entitled to the 'returns' of election for the Twenty-sixth Congress."

Mr. PICKENS said he desired to state very simply the position he occupied. If the House, in its wisdom, chose to raise a select committee on this New Jersey election, he desired that it should be confined to some definite mode of action, and to a distinct question submitted by this House. He desired it should be confined to the question, who are entitled to the returns of election as members from the State of New Jersey to the Twenty-sixth Congress? He concurred in the remarks which had been made by his colleague [Mr. W. THOMPSON] in regard to the difficult position in which the House was now placed. He (Mr. PICKENS) had understood that the House would be thus involved, and therefore he had voted against the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.] He had voted against the resolution of his colleague, [Mr. RHETT,] which was adopted as the order of this House. He (Mr. P.) foresaw, or thought he foresaw, the very difficulty with which they were now about to contend; and he would here take occasion to say, that he had voted against the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, because he [Mr. P.] desired a different mode of action. If he had been called upon to vote on that resolution on the first, second, or third day of the session, he would have voted in the affirmative. He did think, when he came here, that the certificate of the Governor ought to entitle the members holding it to be called, so as to be enrolled for organization. He thought so before this discussion had progressed. He desired that course of proceeding, simply that efficiency might be given to the organization of this House. The House, however, chose to pursue a different course. This was his open sentiment, and he had never disguised it. He thought it was due to the country—that it was due to order, that the House should have pursued that course. He thought it was due to the country that that triumphant party, denominated the Republican party, flushed as it was with victory, should have taken that course. He repeated this was his sentiment, and he had never changed it. But the House thought proper to take a different course; and it had been involved, day after day, in scenes which, to say the least, were of very little credit to the American Congress. It was to avoid these scenes that he desired the course he had spoken of should be taken. But the House thought proper to allow testimony to be brought forward. True, it was testimony not exactly formal, but such as entitled him, being a judge under the Constitution, to decide the simple question who were entitled to the returns. This was a question made under the Constitution itself, and he contended that this House had a right to decide that question, and could have decided it the very first day, if they had thought proper to do so.

Mr. P. here read the following clause from the Constitution of the United States:

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members."

It will thus be seen (continued Mr. P.) that the Constitution itself makes three distinct subjects upin which this House can judge and decide, namely, the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members. I contend that these are, in their nature, distinct question. You may decide that a member, returned by the majority of votes, is entitled to the returns, and yet you may decide that he is totally unqualified under the Constitution. Suppose, for instance, that a majority of voters should return here a man under twenty-five years of age, or an alien. This goes to the qualification of the member; and I contend that if he held a majority of votes at the polls, he would be entitled to be returned, but that he would not be qualified to take his seat. And this illustrates the whole matter, that the questions are in their whole nature distinct and separate. So it was, he said, a man may have a majority at the polls, and yet may not be elected; and so the House might decide that a man was a member, and yet that he was not entitled to the returns. They are all separate questions.

Here, in the development and progress of this case, we have seen one notorious fact admitted by the papers, admitted by the gentleman from New Jersry, when questioned upon this point; that is to say, that the majority of the voters of New Jersey gave their votes to other members than those to whom the certificate of the Governor has been given. The gentleman [Mr. RANDOLPH] has admitted that there were a majority of votes on the other side, but says they were not legal? Now who has decided that they were not legal? Was it the local authorities of New Jersey? The Governer, the Clerk, or the judges of election? I lay down this broad proposition, and I challenge gentlemen to the argument; that there is no authority in any State officer to judge and decide upon the legality of votes after they have been deposited in the ballot box, or received at the polls. You may challenge a voter at the polls, and if challenged for good cause, his vote cannot be received. But if you go beyond this power, it would inevitably lead to confusion and fraud, and transfer the judicial power of this House to the local officers of States.

Mr. P. proceeded. The proposition I maintained is, that under the clause of the Constitution of the United States, which I have read, we are created sole and exclusive judges of the returns. I use the language of the Constitution, and I say that no State authority can interpose to purge the polls after the ballot has been deposited, or after the votes have been received, (viva voce, if you choose,) unless it be to carry out the local policy of the States as to qualifications. There is another clause of the Constitution, which shows that the voters for this House are intended to be of the same class of voters as those who are entitled to vote for members of Legislature. But upon the power to judge of returns and elections, there can be no concurrent jurisdiction connected with these questions, on the part of any State authority, without a palpable violation of the Constitution. Admit that, and what is the result? And here I will observe that, in reflecting upon this issue, I have been forcibly struck with the wisdom and philosophy of this noble instrument, (holding up the Constitution of the United States.) But suppose the contrary doctrine to be true; this House would be at the mercy of conflicting judgments in the States, as one party or another might, from time to time, be in the ascendency. It is in accordance with the very genius of the Government that this branch of it should be independent; and, in order to maintain its independence, it must be the exclusive judge of the returns. You cannot get over that plain and palpable provision of the Constitution. It is not pretended here that any local authority is given to the officers of New Jersey to purge the polls after the votes have been deposited. I did not understand that question to have been raised; but, I repeat, it is admitted that a majority of the votes were on the other side. That being so, I contend that it is for us to say who are entitled to the returns, and that that single question does not involve other questions in regard to the election.

I am not disposed to treat with disrespect the certificate of the Governor. This House has no right to pass censure upon him. He acted as a State officer, and, if he did not probably act with wisdom, still I do not doubt that he acted under a conscientious belief that he was a mere ministerial officer of the law. That may be. He may have supposed that he was doing his duty. He gave the certificate upon the returns made by the clerks, and announced that he could not look behind them. He looked upon himself as the mere ministerial register, and supposed that his certificate was to be viewed in that light, and in that light only. But other gentlemen may be entitled to returns, notwithstanding his certificate. And my proposition is this: that there is no authority in the State of New Jersey to judge of the legality of votes; and that, after the votes have been deposited, those who received the majority are entitled to the returns; and that we are made the sole and exclusive judges of the legality. I contend that there was vast wisdom in this provision of the Constitution, and that the framers intended us to be a co-ordinate branch of this Government, entirely independent, and that this House alone should decide upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members Without that provision, what comes of all our independence? I contend that the question is now before us in a tangible shape.

Some gentlemen say that the House is not constitutionally organized. I think there is some confusion of ideas here. The Constitution says:

"Congress shall assemble at least once in every year; and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall, by law, appoint a different day."

That (continued Mr. P.) is the day appointed by the Constitution for Congress to assemble.

What is Congress? Analyze the idea. It is composed of members elected by the people of the States, who are chosen every other year under this constitutional provision, and who are entitled to assemble here as the Constitution directs. The Constitution then goes on to define what shall constitute the House of Representatives. "It declares the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States." It does not say of members and a Speaker, but of members chosen by the people. This constitutes a House of Representatives, in the definition of the Constitution. The same instrument declares "that the House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers." This presupposes the existence of a House competent, at least, to decide upon its own organization. Can the constitutional existence of the House be more clearly defined and demonstrated? It is chopping logic upon words to deny our legal existence. Now, gentlemen suppose we must take an oath before we can act, judge, or decide. Let us read that provision. And it is to be observed that it is a mere general provision.

"The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States, and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation, to support the Constitution." Now, (continued Mr. P.) I will ask, does the Constitution prescribe the time when this oath shall be taken? Does it say that it shall be on the first, second, or last day of the session? The law of seventeen hundred and eighty-nine prescribes and authorizes the oldest member on this floor to administer an oath to the Speaker, and then prescribes the mode in which the Speaker shall administer it to the members. But Mr. P. contended that the Constitution itself having fixed the day of meeting, the House of Representatives are a body on the first Monday of December, competent to decide on questions of returns; and, if we think proper, to go into the whole question of election. That, however, would be vastly inexpedient. But on a question of mere qualifications and returns—if an issue be raised, and it is objected that one class of members be falsely returned, we are then competent to decide that question, and we must, from necessity, do so. It is inherent in the power and the right to organize.

Now, let us disentangle ourselves from this confusion of ideas. The legal apportionment of Representatives gives this House two hundred and forty-two members, and the Constitution has, in expressed terms, made them exclusive judges on questions of "elections, returns, and qualifications." Suppose, instead of that constitutional provision, that it had been declared that A or B were to be exclusive judges on those questions, would there be any difficulty in deciding upon the point? The whole confusion arises from the idea of having two hundred and forty-two judges instead of only one. If only one judge had been created by the Constitution, there would be no difficulty in in deciding the whole question on the first day. Yet, as far as right and legal principle are involved, it is the same thing.

Viewing the subject in this light, and foreseeing the difficulties that must inevitably arise, I was disposed to confine the whole question to a question of returns, and I contend that we are the competent judges of that question whenever we think proper to take it. It is not only sound sense, but sound policy, to keep the question separate. If you decide that the mere returns of officers must, in all cases, conclude the judgment of this House as to who are entitled to their seats and to the returns, then you hold out the greatest temptations to bitter and contending parties to perpetrate fraud and injustice by false returns. The consequence will be, that when this House may be considered as equally balanced, and power and empire are at stake, the elective franchise will be at the mercy of obscure and irresponsible officers, and this House will be made anything and every thing that their profligacy and party bitterness may choose. It is of the very essence of our system that we should be the exclusive guardians and judges of our own creation and formation. Whether right or wrong, our judgment over returns, qualifications, and elections, must be exclusive and untrammeled. Any other doctrine must introduce imbecility and impotency into this, the very centre of vitality in our system.

In presenting these views to the House, I have acted entirely on my own judgment, and I have introduced a resolution to meet the precise issue, according to my conscientious conviction of the truth of the case. I believe that we are the judges—I believe, according to the developments which have been made on this floor, the gentlemen who have the certificate of the Governor are not entitled to the returns; and, so believing, I am prepared to meet the question. I was prepared to do so several days ago. I desire to decide it now, frankly, fairly, and boldly, before the world, without the trammels and the collateral issues that have been thrown around it by the technicalities of county court special pleading. I act here on my own responsibility.

I do not propose any thing which is the result of concert, of caucus, or of understanding entered into out of this House. I act alone upon my conviction of what I belive to be true, and right, and just.

Sir, we have seen too much party organization and party drill. If there is one evil of the present day, greater than another, it is that miserable party spirit, on both sides, which seems disposed to draw every member into humble subserviency to the dictates of a few leaders.

There is another sentiment which I entertain, and which I will here avow. It is this: that during the last Administration there has been two strong executive action in this Government; and it is time that the Representatives of the people should assert their independence, and trample on the ties of party—looking only to the good of the country, to the sanctity of the Constitution, and to the preservation of their own honor and independence. If there be one object more dear to me than another, it is, that I may see this House redeemed and regenerated—that I may see it break loose from its subserviency to that monster god of party, which is reared up on every side, and which claims from its victims a base, devoted, and blind idolatry.

Sir, I have proposed a resolution which I believe will meet the truth of the case. I believe that we are the exclusive judges of the whole subject-matter, made so by the Constitution itself, in language too plain to be misunderstood. The time and manner of deciding is a mere matter of expediency. I maintain, also, that there can be no concurrent jurisdiction upon this question by any State authority; and in maintaining this, I maintain the independence of this House, which I believe to be essential to the preservation of American liberty.

The propositions, then, which I desire to be decided, are, first; that this House is the supreme and sole judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members. And secondly, that no State officer has a right to judge of the legality of votes, after they have been received; and that those who have received a majority of the votes polled are, by right, entitled to the returns. Upon that principle, I voted yesterday in the case of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NAYLOR.] It is precisely the case at issue. There you have different returns; one member is admitted to have a majority, but another gentleman assumes that they are illegal votes, and the judges assume to themselves the right to throw out the whole Northern Liberties. I maintain that they had no such right under the Constitution. Their acts were void, and the matter must be left to this tribunal only. It is this which shall govern my vote. When I come as a judge to decide on the merits of the election, then it may be different as to final judgment. It will depend upon the fact, whether enough, from those who received the majority of votes, shall be proved to be illegal, to violate the election. All votes deposited and received by the proper officers into the ballot box, must be presumed to be legal, until otherwise shown. This is sound sense as well as law. Upon these questions, I assert the power of the House to judge fully, but I deny the authority of the officers of the State of Pennsylvania, under the laws, to reject votes, after those votes have been deposited in the ballot box.

Standing upon this principle, I am ready to give my vote in the New Jersey case, and I am disposed at once to meet the question, (which may be as well decided now, as a month hence,) who are entitled to the returns. As far as ulterior objects are concerned, I know the supposed delicacy of my position at present; but I scorn to suppress my sentiments.

I would not wear the proudest diadem that ever glittered upon a monarch's brow, if I could not wear it unshackled and free. I would not turn to the right or left for political favor. I hold no sentiments in my closet which I will not avow to the world. In my opinion, it is due to the dignity of the House to meet this question calmly and decidedly. I am ready to vote. If you let the whole subject-matter go to a committee, you will involve us in questions which will not be decided this session. If you choose to confine them to the question of returns, you can do so, and we can have prompt action; but any other course will lead to confusion and delay.

SMALL BANK NOTES.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 26, 1840.

The following resolution, submitted on Monday by Mr. BUCHANAN, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the expediency of proposing to the States such an amendment to the Federal Constitution as will secure a larger specie basis for the circulation of the country, by prohibiting the issue and circulation of bank notes and other paper currency of denominations so low as to prevent the circulation of gold and silver in the ordinary transactions of business and in payment of the wages of labor.

Mr. WEBSTER said that he wished to treat the motion of the honorable member from Pennsylvania with perfect courtesy and respect, and felt reluctant to oppose it, as it proposed only a committee for inquiring into the expediency of a measure. Yet, with the opinion which he held on the subject to which it referred, he could not let it pass under circumstances from which his concurrence in it, in any degree, might be inferred. We had recently had experience of the evil consequences of dissenting, at the beginning, from things which must be opposed in the end.

His objections to the resolution were, first, that Congress already possessed full and adequate powers over the currency. What was wanted was the exercise of those powers. We had full power to regulate commerce, and currency, whether metallic or paper, as the great instrument of commerce; but had ceased to exercise this power. If we proposed to amend the Constitution, in order to get new powers, it would imply that we thought our present powers not ample. Now, he thought them ample. If we would only exercise them as they had been exercised successfully for forty years, we could accomplish, probably, all we desired. At any rate, we did not exercise them at all.

His next objection was, that there was not the least reason to suppose that any such proposed amendment would prevail. The States derived revenue from their banks. They were in favor of the circulation of small notes, and would not be at all likely to consent to the suppression of them; at least not so many of the States as would be required. Nor, indeed, did he see any reason to think that the constitutional majority of the two Houses of Congress could be obtained in favor of the proposition.

If, indeed, nothing else was to be proposed; if we were to do nothing, nor have any thing done, till the Constitution could be amended, as was now proposed, and until we found relief in the effect of such amendments, the condition of things, he confessed, was even more deplorable than he had yet been quite willing to regard it.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that, on this preliminary question, he should detain the Senate with but a very brief exposition of his views in presenting the resolution. Indeed, he had not anticipated any debate upon the subject, supposing that Senators would have waited until the report of the committee should be made.

In the first place, (said Mr. B.) no gentleman will deny the truth of the proposition, that it is desirable to infuse into the general circulation of the country a much larger proportion of gold and silver than exists at present. Every thing which we see, and hear, and feel around us, must convince us all that this is an object of the first importance. On this point, therefore, I shall offer no argument upon the present occasion.

What, then, is the only possible mode of accomplishing this purpose? It is a law of currency almost as universal in its operation as any law of nature, that paper and specie of the same denominations cannot circulate together. We all recollect the celebrated message sent by Mr. Burke to Mr. Pitt, in the year 1797 or 1798, that, if he consented to the issue of one pound notes, he would never see a guinea again. The subsequent experience of England had proved the sagacity of the statesman; and guineas and sovereigns were almost as completely banished from general circulation in that kingdom as if they did not exist. After a persevering struggle of many years, led by their most distinguished statesmen of both the great political parties, the five pound note policy, originally advocated by the celebrated Adam Smith, finally prevailed. One pound notes were excluded from circulation, and, in the course of a very few years, it was estimated that one-half of the currency of that country consisted of the precious metals. Their lowest bank note is now of the denomination of about twenty-four dollars. They have now about half and half of paper and specie.

What is the condition of our own country in this respect? Can our half eagles circulate together with five dollar notes? That they do not, must be admitted by all. Will eagles ever circulate generally in a country where there are ten dollar notes issued in abundance to take their place? In those States where one dollar notes are in general circulation, it is almost as rare a thing to see a silver dollar as it is in other States, where five dollar notes circulate, to find a half eagle.

If there ever was a question upon which there had appeared to be a unanimous, or an almost unanimous, opinion among our public men of all parties, it was in regard to the necessity of excluding from circulation all bank notes and other paper currency of a less denomination than twenty dollars. This, all admit, ought to be effected gradually, and in such a manner as to give no shock to the business of the country; but all agree in the ultimate object. It was a favorite principle with General JACKSON, and had found equal favor with the present President of the United States. My friend from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] had presented this question to the Senate some years ago, and, on his motion, we had adopted an amendment, with unexampled unanimity, prohibiting the officers of the Government from receiving or disbursing bank notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars.

The same principle had been adopted in the celebrated currency bill; and, under its provisions, after a certain period, the notes of no bank which issued notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars were to be received in the payment of the dues to the Government. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] had, on that occasion, made the ablest speech he had ever heard him deliver on this floor, in favor of the principle of excluding from circulation notes under twenty dollars

Now, sir, can human ingenuity devise any mode of accomplishing this object so much desired by all, but by an amendment of the Constitution? If it can, I should adopt that course. I hold the Constitution in such reverence, that I would not offer to amend it without absolute necessity. I would apply the rule of epic poetry to its provisions—I forgot the Latin quotation—and say that the power of a divinity ought never to be invoked without absolute necessity. To use the phrase of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] I can see no mode under God's heavens of accomplishing the object but by amending the Constitution. If one State undertakes to make this reform, what is the consequence? Other States will not adopt it; and their five and ten dollar notes fill up the vacuum. Hence, in self-defence, those States which desire a reform are obliged to submit to the evils of the small note currency. There is no mode of reaching it but by proposing to all the States an amendment to the Constitution which will be alike binding on all.

If I concurred in opinion with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] that Congress already possess the power of regulating the currency of the States, I certainly should not propose such an amendment. His sentiments are peculiar upon the subject, and I should be glad that he would point out the particular manner in which this can be accomplished. It is certainly not by the agency of a Bank of the United States; because, if such an institution should ever be re-established, and I trust it never may, you could only provide by its charter that it should not issue notes under twenty dollars. No man will contend that this would prevent the issue and circulation, under the authority of the States, of notes of smaller denominations.

Who doubts the utility of such a regulation to the banks themselves? At present, when there is a demand for gold and silver for exportation, and their vaults become exhausted, they have no mode of replenishing them. The specie necessary for this purpose is not in circulation in the country. Adopt this amendmint, and the difficulty will at once vanish. As the specie is withdrawn from them, the void will be supplied by their drawing upon the circulation of the country for the necessary amount. Let there be a general circulation of half specie and half paper; and the danger of suspensions of specie payments will be comparatively at an end.

But I promised that I should not detain the Senate long, and I shall not be drawn into a general discussion of the merits of the proposition at this stage, unless compelled to do so by the course of other gentlemen.

Mr. WEBSTER said that if there was any gentleman in the Senate who had, earlier than himself, suggested and urged the necessity of keeping steadily a considerable quantity of specie in the country by the disuse of small notes, he did not know who that gentleman was. But things had taken a different turn. States which had not allowed the issue of small notes, had found it necessary to relax, and he therefore saw no reason to expect their concurrence.

He had before said that Congress possessed already possessed plenary power. And if Congress would proceed to exercise its powers, if it would begin with approved methods, if it would act judiciously, according to circumstances, adopting gentle, natural, and yet promising measures, if it should hereafter be found that any thing done under State laws was repugnant to the laws of Congress, why, then, it was clear by the Constitution that such State laws must be modified, or give way to the laws of Congress.

Mr. STRANGE said he would not object to the reference, if he entertained any doubt upon the question of expediency presented in the resolution. But he entertained none. He felt the clearest convictions that the agitation of this question at this time, was altogether unfortunate, looking to its immediate effects, either upon the political party to which he belonged, or its ultimate operation upon the welfare of the country. In a party sense he thought it highly impolitic, in the midst of a great political battle, to assume a new position. The ground we now occupy is an advantageous one, and the current of events is setting in our favor. The issue heretofore submitted to the people, after much misrepresentation, is now coming to be fully understood; we are clearly right in it, and we are certain of being sustained. In proposing something new at this juncture, even if our views upon it should, in the end, prove correct, we must expect to go through the same misty cloud of misrepresentation, through which we have already passed in reference to the Independent Treasury, and it is by no means certain that our explanations would reach the public mind in time for the approaching crisis. In the present organization of parties, and upon existing issues, there is no doubt of our triumph; but in dissolving the present elements of party and forming new combinations, which would probably be the effect of presenting new issues, he could not be answerable for the result. Whether the proposed amendment to the Constitution would be adopted, he thought exceedingly doubtful; but, if at all, it would be after a very long struggle, and the effects of that struggle were as uncertain as its result.

But if adopted, he thought its ultimate effect upon the welfare of the country highly pernicious. It would engraft expressly upon the Federal Constitution the present banking system. At present, happily, it had no place there except by construction; and he was altogether averse to giving it a solemn recognition in the body of that sacred instrument. He agreed with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] that a broader specie basis for the issues of the banks was desirable; but he was unwilling to obtain it at such a price. While the connection existed by law between bank and State, he thought it wise to avail ourselves of that connection to compel the banks to widen their specie basis. But that connection by law was now dissolved, and he was not disposed to form it again by constitutional provisions. He believed the evils in the banking system are in a fair way to correct themselves. Public opinion is pushing them onwards in that direction.

He believed, as he stated among his first remarks upon the Independent Treasury, that public opinion was hastening to that point when our late banking system would be looked back upon with as much amazement at the folly of its dupes, as we do now upon the delusions of the cotemporaries of John Law. This resolution, instead of conducing to bank reform, as seems to be anticipated by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] will revive the old abuses. They will put forth with renewed vigor; and should the amendment to the Constitution be made as proposed, to what use that amendment may be applied, no one can conceive. Aided by the principle of construction, so much admired on the other side, a Consitution, or a clause of it, like a piece of India rubber, may be stretched to an indefinite extent; nay, like beaten gold, a grain may be made to cover acres. Let the Opposition once get a constitutional connection established between the banks and the Government, and what they make out of it no man can foresee. So far from agreeing with the Senator from Massachusetts that we had already the constitutional power to act directly upon the paper currency of the country, he did not believe the framers of the Constitution contemplated its existence; he was confident they did not mean to give to Congress the power of regulating it further than the exercise of their power in relation to the coin might incidentally do so. And he was decidedly of opinion that it was not expedient that any such direct power should be possessed by Congress. For these reasons, he was not inclined to vote for the resolution.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] had now made a distinct avowal of the mode by which he would restrain the issue and circulation of bank notes of the smaller denominations. He thought that Congress possessed the power of accomplishing this purpose by direct legislation upon the banks of the States. He would not, upon the present occasion, argue this broad question with the Senator; but should content himself by declaring that he was entirely opposed to any such construction of the Constitution. At the proper time, he should be ready to compare notes with him upon this branch of the subject.

The Senator had stated that it would be a vain effort to apply to the States for such an amendment to the Constitution; and in proof of this assertion had observed that several of those States which had prohibited the issue of bank notes under five dollars had fallen back, and now authorized the circulation of notes under that denomination. But what was the chief cause of this retrograde movement? It is not that these States believed it was vain singly to attempt the reform, when the only effect of their individual action was to substitute the small notes of other States instead of their own? For the want of such an amendment to the Constitution as is now intended to be proposed, several of the States opposed to the circulation of small notes, have felt themselves compelled, I think unwisely, to abandon the policy on which they had embarked.

If the proposed amendment be right in itself, it will eventually prevail. He had such an abiding confidence in the intelligence and patriotism of the people of the country, that he was convinced that, if the public interest demanded the measure, it would be finally adopted. So far as he was acquainted with the indications of public opinion in his own State, they were decidedly favorable. He was determined to bring the question fully and fairly before the people, so far as an humble individual could; and whatever might be the result of his present attempt, to pursue the subject with energy and perseverance, until success should crown his efforts, or he should discover that success was not attainable.

He would say a few words in reply to the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. STRANGE] Mr. B. was a plain, practical man, and was content to consider human affairs as they were, not as gentlemen might think they ought to be, or would be, at some remote period of time. On this question, he feared there was a radical difference between the Senator and himself. There were twenty-six States of this Union, who had all, from their origin, exercised the power of creating banks. This power had been in uninterrupted operation for half a century. It was now too late to question its existence. No man now living would ever see the day when this power would be abandoned by the States. There it was, and there it would remain, in spite of all the Senator could do to destroy it. He acknowledged that the proposed amendment rested upon the assumption that these banks would continue to exist under State authority, in some form or other, and would issue a paper currency.

He had been no little surprised, therefore, to learn from the Senator that one ground of his opposition to the amendment was, that it would arrest the progress of public opinion, and enable the banks to ride out the present storm. His own fears differed very widely from those of the Senator. He was afraid, not that the banks would perish in the gale, but that the State Legislatures might act as they had done on a former occasion, and not impose upon them those wholesome restrictions necessary to guard the public against the evils of future suspensions. The Senator (said Mr. B.) mistakes my purpose in supposing that it is the same with his own, and that I desire to aim a death blow at the banks. It is in this respect that I fear he and I radically differ. Whatever might be my opinion of the question, were it now for the first time to be decided whether we should establish banks or not, I find them now in existence, and so interwoven with the habits and interests and feelings of the people that they cannot be destroyed. For good or for evil, they will continue to exist long after he and I shall have been gathered to our fathers. It is, therefore, my purpose, not to destroy, but radically to reform them; to deprive them of the power of doing evil, and to restrict them in such a manner as to make them useful agents of the public, instead of instruments ruinous to the prosperity of the people. Lord Liverpool had once said of the banking system of England, that "it was the most insecure, the most rotten, and the very worst of which it was possible to conceive." He would not apply such strong epithets to our banking system; though he would say that it was difficult for him to conceive how it could be much worse. The expansions and contractions and suspensions of specie payments to which, from the very law of its nature, it was subject, were ruinous to the best interests of the country. He believed that the States would eventually reform it, and, if that were found impracticable, would destroy it, and substitute another system in its stead. Still State banks, in some form or other, whether by special charter, or under free banking laws, or in some other manner, would continue to exist and to issue paper currency. Now, what was the greatest reform which could be made to any system of State banking which the human mind could devise? Was it not to increase the specie basis of the paper currency—was it not to secure the circulation of gold and silver in the ordinary transactions of life and in the payment of the wages of labor? This restriction alone would be the greatest practical bank reform and the greatest security against future suspensions which could possibly be devised; and it could never be accomplished without an amendment of the Federal Constitution. I can easily perceive why the Senator, with his views, is opposed to the amendment. Those who calculate upon the destruction of all the banks of the country, and indulge in the visionary hope that we are about to return to a pure metallic currency in all the business transactions of all the people of the United States, may consistently oppose every great reform in the banking system. They may hope that the more evils it inflicts upon the people, the shorter will be its duration. For myself, I indulge in no such expectations, and I desire to reform that which I know I could not, if I would, destroy.

In these remarks, I have studiously avoided all party allusions. This is a question which ought to be placed above party, because it is deeply interesting to every individual citizen of the country, whatever may be his political attachments, and I confess that mine are very strong.

Mr. STRANGE, in reply to Mr. BUCHANAN, said he was sorry to differ with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN;] for when he did so, he always feared he was wrong. The Senator did himself great injustice in calling himself a plain plodding man, if his language was to be literally construed. But he believed he did the Senator no wrong in interpreting his language as he understood it. The Senator meant that he was himself a practical man, while he [Mr. STRANGE] was a visionary. Perhaps this was true; but of one thing he was very certain, that he had a perfectly clear vision of the tendencies of this resolution. He was sorry to hear the Senator adopt the cant so frequently used by the Opposition—that he was above the influence of party considerations. No public man commended himself to his confidence by saying that he was above party considerations. Parties consist, or should consist, of those who agree in political principles, and upon every question which admits of two opinions, parties are inevitable. He was attached to his party because he believed it acted upon sound principles, upon principles essential to the well-being of the country; and whenever he ceased to believe so, he should cease to be of that party. The stability of the institutions of his country, he firmly believed to be identified with the success of those principles which his party advocated; and in warring for his party he was warring for his country. And he repeated, that he was opposed to making up a new issue, when the one already made up ensured the safety of both his party and his country. He was opposed to changing front in the face of the enemy, which might render doubtful the result of a battle, in which victory was otherwise sure. He thought there was no equivalent for the hazard. Public opinion is fast producing without it, all that you hope to accomplish by your resolution. Nay, you will, by its adoption, delay the attainment of the end in view. It will act as a breakwater, and curb the onward flow of the waves.

If we endorse the present banking system by making a constitutional declaration that it is highly useful, praiseworthy and necessary, and needs nothing but the certain restrictions in such amendments set forth, to render it altogether fair, safe, and useful, real reform will not accrue within the period probably allotted for existence either to the Senator from Pennsylvania or myself. He agreed with the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Legislatures of the respective States would not agree to relinquish their power of chartering banks. And for the same reason they will resist your claims for putting restrictions upon it. This proves my position, that this resolution is out of time. As a general rule, the Legislatures of the several States reflect pretty fairly the will of the people of those States; and if those Legislatures refuse to relinquish the power of chartering banks or the imposition of restrictions upon that power, you may safely conclude the people of those States are not prepared to make the surrender. And before the people of the States have reached the point to make such constitutional surrender or accept such constitutional restriction, they will have attained the more desirable point of forcing their Legislatures to exercise their present powers so that they will prove injurious to no one.

The resolution was then laid on the table for the purpose of taking up the special order.

THURSDAY, February 27.—The subject again coming up for consideration:—

Mr. CALHOUN said, that he rose simply to state the grounds upon which he was compelled to vote against this resolution. The amendment contemplated by the resolution would, if it should ever be adopted, engraft on the Constitution the banking system. To this I cannot give my assent, nor can I do any act that might imply it. According to my conception, long entertained, and openly expressed for the last six years, on all suitable occasions, it would be one of the greatest calamities that could befal the country.

Thus thinking, I cannot vote for the resolution; and yet I regret that I find myself placed in a situation to vote against a resolution of inquiry, which, by the courtesy of the body, is usually granted as a matter of course. But, as the resolution stands, it is impossible, with my conception, to extend it to the present case. If, however, the mover would enlarge it, so as to make it embrace a general inquiry into the expediency of so amending the Constitution as to place the currency on a solid and stable basis, it would remove my objection, and I should vote for it with pleasure. Unless the Senator did so, he must vote as he had indicated he was compelled to do.

Mr. PRESTON said this resolution contemplated to vest in the Government a specific power over the currency. He differed with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] as to any power over the currency being already vested in this Government. The resolution contemplated an inquiry into the expediency of giving to Government the power of restraining the circulation of bank notes under a specified denomination, and this effected, there would be an end to its operation, and it could not counteract the various schemes that would be attempted to evade the law. In Virginia there are positive laws against the emission of notes of a less denomination than five dollars, and yet its object is defeated by circulating six, seven, eight, and nine dollar notes, which prevents the specie circulation from being much increased. This power not having been granted to the Federal Government, was, of course, reserved by the States, and any legislation on the subject is extra-constitutional.

If it were an original question, whether the power of regulating the currency should be given to the State Governments or to the Federal Government, he would have some hesitation in deciding, though he would have a strong disinclination to commit it to this Government while it was under the control of the present party in power.

Mr. HENDERSON said he should vote for this resolution. If he understood it, it proposed to inquire if it was not expedient to ask the States to yield a power over the currency which is now possessed by them. In the exercise of this power, the States have authorized the emission of bank paper of denominations of five dollars, and even under it, thus filling up all the channels or circulation, and substituting paper for coin in the wages of labor. That the bank paper in circulation is too redundant for the specie upon which it is based, was generally admitted. He did not believe that Congress had power to regulate the currency by its direct action. Though he believed, as he had lately stated in some remarks which he had delivered in this body, that Congress had the power to create a National Bank—he did not believe it had that power for the mere regulation of the currency. It had the same power to establish a National Bank as it had to form a Sub-Treasury or any other fiscal system. As a national system, he preferred a National Bank to any other, as it not only gave us as great facilities in collection and disbursement of the revenue as the Sub-Treasury, but in its incidental regulation of the currency, to some extent, was superior to it.

Mr. GRUNDY said, that from the moment the Senator from Pennsylvania had introduced this proposition, he considered it one of the wisest and most judicious that had been presented to Congress for a long period. What was the evil, which it was desirable should be remedied? Why, that, by the redundant issue of bank notes, the channels of circulation are filled with paper, and when a pressure comes in the money market, the banks who have the least means have to endure the greatest pressure. What is intended by Senators in their declarations that the Government have already the power over the currency. If it is intended by this to claim the power to control the State banks, it was the greatest stretch of Federal power that has ever been assumed. But the States are as thoroughly convinced as Congress of the evils of the present system, and may feel disposed to attempt a remedy, by conferring this power upon the General Government. By a general exercise of this power, the tendency of the banking system to excessive issues may be to a great extent repressed, and the evasions alluded to by the Senator from South Carolina, of 6, 7, 8 and 9 dollar notes, might be guarded against. I am not, said Mr. G. an advocate of an exclusively metallic currency. This I believe to be impracticable. I am in favor of a mixed currency, composed of coin and convertible bank paper. I am of opinion that such a currency —coin for the wages of labor, and convertible paper for mercantile operations—would best promote the interests and convenience of the community. I believe that banks should not be destroyed, but regulated. I am no destroyer, but would, if I could, be a reformer. I am for making banks specie-paying institutions; and if this cannot be effected, I am willing to permit them to go down.

Mr. CALHOUN said, if the Senator from Tennessee alluded to him, he was entirely mistaken. He had declared no war against the banks. They needed not his opposition, nor any other, to put them down. They were going down but too rapidly, and were destined to fall by self slaughter. Nor had he said one word about a metallic currency. That was a question not now before us.

Mr. BUCHANAN would not enter on a discussion of the merits of the measure then; but, as the Senator from South Carolina had spoken of courtesy, he would say a single word. He would acknowledge most cheerfully that the Senate had always treated him with uniform courtesy and kindness; so much so, as sometimes made him flatter himself into the opinion that he was a general favorite. If ever he had treated any Senator in any other mode, he was not aware of the fact. The subject of which the resolution treated, had attracted the attention of the whole country, and all classes of the community were more or less deeply interested in it. It was a matter of inquiry only, and had not assumed shape or form. The same rule would apply as well to courtesy as to morals, viz: of doing as we would be done by. When the Senator from South Carolina introduced his bill to cede the public lands to the States in which they lie, although he [Mr. B.] was as much opposed as any man could be to the provisions of that bill, yet he had never thought of opposing its introduction. Now all he desired was to present his views, after consulting an able committee on the subject. His opinions on this matter had not been taken up hastily; he had been seriously deliberating on it for years. If the Senate thought proper to indulge him, he should be gratified; but if they rejected it, why then he should take an opportunity of making a speech, instead of a report.

Mr. CALHOUN said he was much surprised that the charge of discourtesy should have been brought against him on this occasion. If there was any person who had a right to complain of a want of courtesy, it was himself. He had proposed to the Senator from Pennsylvania to enlarge the terms of his resolution, so as to avoid the insuperable objection he entertained against it, and the Senator had not thought proper to accede to his request. He found no fault with him for this. He, it was probable, had good reasons for his course; and so have I. I know where we tread, and I think I know where this resolution will carry us, and the momentous results that will follow. I would much sooner see a United States Bank again incorporated, than to engraft the present banking system on the Constitution. Holding these opinions, why am I particularly selected as betraying a want of courtesy? The Senator from North Carolina, the Senator from Massachusetts, and the Senator from South Carolina, all expressed their intention of voting against this resolution, and yet there is nothing said of their want of courtesy. But the Senator has alluded to his vote when I introduced the bill on the subject of the public lands. Now, I hold there would have been no discourtesy in opposing the bill at its introduction, and that would have been a very proper time to oppose it, with the opinion which the Senator entertains of that measure. But I make no opposition to the resolution; I simply state why I cannot vote for it myself. I have no objection to its passing with the votes of others, who think differently. I desire not to change the opinions of others in relation to it; and would have no sort of objection to standing alone in my vote against it; and there is no reason why there should be any feeling on the part of the Senator in regard to my course.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama expressed a wish that the Senator from Pennsylvania would adhere to the original phraseology, and not allow the subject to embrace a wider range than he originally contemplated. He was surprised that any idea should have gone forth that there was any thing like grafting a system on the Constitution by the adoption of a mere negative proposition.

Mr. STRANGE rose to relieve himself from imputation of discourtesy towards the Senator from Pennsylvania. None whatever was intended. The Senator has always been a favorite with me, and I hope he will not consider that he has ceased to be so.

Mr. DAVIS would say one word. It was well known that he had, on former occasions, expressed his opinions as to the necessity of a larger specie circulation; but, of late, some strange changes had grown up in relation to this matter from quarters where they were not anticipated. Some were now for a mixed currency, that formerly expressed very different opinions. He had heard much in that body about the banks being mischievous in their character, and dangerous in their tendency.

Holding the same opinions on this subject as those just expressed by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] he was glad to hear such remarks from that quarter of the Senate.

Mr. GRUNDY said he would thank the Senator to point out the time or the place in which he had ever expressed sentiments at variance with those he just made.

Mr. DAVIS. Far be it from me to say that the Senator ever had done so. I was only expressing my gratification to learn that there was not to be this general sweeping prostration which seemed to threaten us. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] had his hearty concurrence in the matter before them. Let the inquiry go to the public from his learned pen, and give the public all the benefit of his able reasoning on the subject—he would cheerfully give his vote for it; but in giving that vote, he hid not mean to be understood asat all commiting himself on that or any other proposed amendment.

Mr. PRESTON rose to relieve himself of any charge of discourtesy towards the Senator from Pennsylvania, in opposing the resolution, and he would show himself in earnest by voting for the proposed inquiry.

The question was then taken, and the resolution adopted.

Mr. BUCHANAN then moved that the select committee consist of seven, and that it be appointed by the Chair, which having been agreed to, the following Senators were named: Messrs. BUCHANAN, GRUNDY, CRITTENDEN, WRIGHT, DAVIS, CLAY of Alabama, and HENDERSON.

SPEECH OF MR. THOMPSON,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, Monday, December 30, 1839—The House having under consideration a motion to reconsider the vote by which 20,000 copies of the President's Message were ordered to be printed—

Mr. THOMPSON addressed the House as follows:

I am not willing to allow this message to go forth to the country without commentary or discussion. The annual message of the President is always a document possessing great interest, as the chart of the annual progress of the Government. This claims more than ordinary attention, from the importance, the vital importance of the topics which its discusses, and from the unquestionable ability with which they are discussed. Some of these topics involve the most thorough and deeply interesting changes which have occurred in our country, if not in modern times—changes amounting to a commercial and social revolution. They are discussed with more than usual ability. The message presents an argument upon the great financial measure, which it vindicates beyond all measure—the most able, artful, and seductive of any heretofore made upon that side. In saying this, I shall not be suspected of any disposition to conciliate. No, sir, my position will, in all human probability, continue, as it has been, in opposition, whatever may be the result of the present contest for power. I am opposed to the general political tenets and opinions on the one side, and still more opposed to the universal practices of the other—to its extravagance and profligacy, and faithlessness to all its professions.

But, sir, if I were disposed to go over, every one knows that no atonement, not even a repentance for past sins, however flagant—for past vituperation, however scornful or severe, is required. It is a most easy service—no sacrifices whatever are required except of one's conscience; and one of the rules I understand to be, that no questions are to be asked of applicants for admission.

The message, on its face and in its general statements of political doctines, is fair enough. It is State rights throughout—as much so, sir, as if it had been written by you, who were brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, and are of the straitest sect. Whilst reading it, I was forcibly reminded of that noble paper, General Jackson's message of 1832—that most masterly compendium of the State rights doctrines. I had, but a few days before the appearance of that paper, been appointed an elector of President—a position by no means a desirable one. The moral malaria of Jacksonism was then prevading the land in its wildest fury; not only the strongest safeguards of the Constitution, but the virtue and courage of the country, were destroyed in its progress. The charm of a great name was not then broken, nor attempted to be broken, in South Carolina. I gave the vote, and a very few days brought us the message. I felt that I was done up for life—that no man could stand in opposition to so good a State rights President as that. But, sir, it was only nine days, nine little days, when the Proclamation followed—a most consistent commentary upon the text of the message; just such commentaries as we have always had from the same quarter upon like professions of such principles; just such as I again anticipate. I most sincerely pray that it may not be so. I shall be gratified if the necessities of their position shall drive the Administration upon our principles—State rights principles—the principles of the Constitution; but I have not even a hope that it will be so. I want confidence, and I doubt the language of indignant scorn heretofore used by a distinguished gentleman in remarking upon similar professions from the same quarter: "I can but admire the audacity of the authors of the Proclamation and Force Bill claiming to be the guardians of State rights."

The currency question is of course the engrossing subject of the message. But, sir, there is another which is first touched, and which is not less important—more important, as it should be regarded by every Southern man; yes, sir, by every man who has the heart of an American beating in his bosom. I allude to the savage and in every way disgraceful war now raging in Florida. Is that war to rage forever? Is it further prosecution abandoned? Have the Seminoles reconquered their country? If so, acknowledge it—yield it to them by treaty, and give them the honor and the fruits of their victory. Do not keep up a miserable show of force there, lulling the people of the Territory into a false reliance upon a power perfectly impotent to afford any real protection, and exposing, for no possible good, a few of the most gallant men of your army to all the dangers of the climate and of savage war, and, what to such men is infinitely worse, to the certainty of constant failures and defeats.

I arraign this Administration for its worse than imbecile and impotent management of the Florida war. If there was no other cause for opposition for those in power, this itself is all-sufficient. Cannot the Administration, with all the resources of this great country, conquer this miserable band of savages? If so, let them surrender their powers to those who can. If they cannot, why have they not done it? Every drop of blood that has been shed, cries to Heaven against them. Individual atrocities and massacres, horrible as they are, I lose sight of altogether, when I look at the pressing importance of dislodging so dangerous an enemy from their fastnesses in the vicinity of the West Indies, and in the very centre of the South. Are gentleman aware that the Maine boundary question is far, very far from yet being even in a train of adjustment, and that the utmost discretion will be required on the part of both Governments to avoid a war at the end of that question? With even a possibility of that, is there any man who can look without indignation at so formidable an enemy being embodied in the very heart of the South, or at the miserable farce of a treaty which stipulated to yield to them a portion of the Territory? Sir, it is not the land that we want; we have too much of that already. It is the removal of the Indians, and that only, which will satisfy us. And what has been done to this end by this President of ours? This Northern man with Southern principles, and his Secretary of War, a Southern man with —(I am at a loss to say what principles, except John Randolph's celebrated "seven.") Why, sir, we have seen the larger part of the army withdrawn from the only point where they were really required, and engaged in an empty pageant at Trenton—an empty pageant made still more ridiculous by a review and inspection of the discipline and tactics by the President and his Secretary. Yes, sir, the army which should have been in Florida was encamped a thousand miles from the point where they were hourly required, when every morning's reveille was the news of the massacre of their fellow-soldiers, and of the women and children of Florida. Was it to remove them from the pestilential miasma of the swamps of Florida? That climate was deemed good enough for the gallant Taylor and Harney. Why was it not so far all? I am sure that there was none amongst the officers who would not have preferred to remain at the post of duty and of honor. Has such a thing ever before occurred? Generally we have seen troops concentrated upon the point of danger and of war—but here we see them removed from it, and the country left wholly exposed.

When I saw that the President referred us approvingly to the plan of the Secretary of War, which he was pleased to characterize as calculated "to bring that war to a successful issue," although I believed that "nothing good could come out of Nazareth," I eagerly turned to it to see what that plan was; and what, sir, is this notable plan "to bring this war to a successful issue?" Why, sir, it is this: 1. Depriving the Seminoles of all sympathy. I had not known before that there was any such sympathy. I knew of no one who has given any evidence of such a feeling, except the honorable Secretary. He certainly has been most tenderly and compassionately regardful of their lives. His second suggestion is the passage of Col. Benton's bill for the settlement of Florida, which I understand to be a proposition to give a certain quantity of land to every man who will settle there, and to furnish him rations and military protection into the bargain; the entering wedge (and I beg that the prediction may be remembered) to a system of grants for settlement, by which the whole of the Western lands are to be got from us. The third suggestion of the honorable Secretary is to raise a new regiment, and, of course, to let him appoint the officers. What has yet been accomplished by the 2d Dragoons, a regiment raised specially for this service? Nothing that I ever heard of. I would not object to raising one or more regiments if I knew who were to command them; if I could have any assurance that the command would be given to Gen. Floyd, of Georgia, or some other such man. I, however, know none such. But it will be given to no such man, but to some palace pet or noisy politician. These appointments have been, and will be, made not with a view to military, but political battles; not with a view to obtaining victories over the Indians, but votes at elections. When that regiment of dragoons was raised, many gentlemen in Congress interested themselves to procure an appointment for as gallant an officer as any in the army, who had been more or less engaged in Indian wars for the last twenty years, and who was then bleeding from more than one wound from the Indian rifles. He had no chance whatever. The appointment was given to one who, then or since, has never set a squadron in the field, and whose claims were not those of military talents, but political party services. No increase of your standing army is necessary; you cannot increase your army to a force adequate to this service, and, besides, regular troops are not the troops to fight Indians, and such has been our uniform experience. The only way to end that war is to establish abundant depots of supplies, and to throw into Florida fifteen or twenty thousand men. Let them act simultaneously and in concert, and the war will be ended in six weeks. I can tell the President that the present plan, or any other that ever will be suggested by his Secretary of War, never will bring that war to a successful issue, and that to rely or any such will be a criminal paltering with the lives of our people, and the character of the country.

The first passage of the message on the currency subject, which strikes me, is the following:

"The nineteen millions of Treasury notes authorized by the act of Congress of 1837, and the modifications thereof, with a view to the indulgence of merchants on their duty bonds, and of the deposite banks in the payment of public moneys held by them, have been so punctually redeemed, as to leave less than the original ten millions outstanding at any one time, and the whole amount unredeemed now falls short of three millions. Of these, the chief portion is not due till next year; and the whole would have been already extinguished could the Treasury have realized the payments due to it from the banks. If those due from them during the next year shall be punctually made, and if Congress shall keep the appropriations within the estimates, there is every reason to believe that all the outstanding Treasury notes can be redeemed, and the ordinary expenses defrayed, without imposing on the people any additional burden, either of loans or increased taxes."

Now, sir, I must be allowed, without the sightest intentional personal disrespect to the President, to say, that not a single statement contained in the above extract is true. I do not insinuate, because I do not believe the President capable of an intentional misstatement, but I do say that these statements are incorrect, and that he might have and ought to have known better. First: were these Treasury notes issued with a view to enable the Government to indulge the banks and merchants? The debt from both these sources was less than six millions at the period of the last issue of ten millions of these Treasury notes. How, then, can a debt of six millions be the reason and the excuse for issuing ten millions of notes? Although not so expressly stated, there are other passages of the message as well as of the Treasury report, which imply, and are no doubt intended to imply, that indulgence to the banks was the sole reason for this issue of an unconstitutional currency. How gross a misrepresentation this is, will be seen from the fact that, at the period of the last issue often millions, the banks owed less than two millions. I would here take occasion to say, in passing, that these deposite banks, which have been habitually denounced for their failures and frauds, have given evidence of a power to fulfil their engagements and a noble fidelity in doing so absolutely unprecedented, and beyond the hopes of the most sanguine, and which thoughout Europe is regarded with wonder and admiration. They have fullfilled, to a miracle, all their engagements, and besides that, have sustained the country under circumstances of difficulty and distress, where the boldest might have despaired. I know, sir, that these are unfashionable opinions and truths, unwholesome to brawling politicians—that despicable and pernicious class, whose only ambition is to rise from that obscurity to which a want of all talent and all virtue has destined them, by joining every popular clamor even against the best and most sacred institutions of society. I am not one of those "whose thoughts ever keep the road-way." I cannnot lend myself to injustice of any sort. What, sir, are the facts in relation to our connection with the deposite banks? The year before the suspension they held, on account of the Government, more than sixty millions of money. It was contemplated by the distribution bill to withdraw this sum in eighteen months. That itself was regarded by most men who were best informed, as a trial which the banks could not stand; but they did. Yes, sir, and more. The Secretary of the Treasury, instead of allowing eighteen months for this tremendous operation, actually executed it in six months. I will not say, as some of his present friends have said, that it was done to defeat the salutary effects of the measure. But he did it, and, to the astonishment of every one, the banks sustained themselves under this terrible trial, and paid over at once about forty millions. No man would, a priori, have said that it was possible. This is not all. At the period of the suspension, of 1837, the banks held on account of the Government twenty-three millions. Congress granted them indulgence for eighteen months. They paid all but about two millions in less than six months—refusing to avail themselves of your indulgence—and have secured, as the Secretary tells us, all the balance. If this be faithlessness and fraud, commend me to faithlessness and fraud for the balance of my life. I have shown that indulgence to the banks and the merchants was not the cause of the issue of these Treasury notes—an issue of a Government currency which, I have heretofore shown in an argument which no one has attempted to answer, was a gross and dangerous violation of the Constitution. The second statement is equally untrue—that the whole of the Treasury notes would have been extinguished if the Treasury could have realized the sums due from banks. The amount due from banks is less than two millions; the amount of Treasury notes outstanding is two millions and three-fourths, besides interest. The last instalment from the United States Bank is not due until next September. The third and last, and much the most important, is, that the resources of the Government for the next year will be adequate to its wants, without any increased burdens of loans or taxes. We were told the same thing in the last annual message, almost in the same words. I said then that it was not true. What was the result? Why, sir, a new issue of Treasury notes. So it will be now.

The President may not have known that this statement was incorrect, but I am very sure that no man on this floor who regards his character will venture to endorse this opinion. Why, sir, every body knows that it is not true. The Secretary of the Treasury very well knows it. Although he does not directly ask for a law to authorize the issue of ten millions more of Treasury notes, a whole column, and a separate subdivision of his report, is devoted to proving the necessity of providing some fund to meet a contingent deficiency. What fund does he mean? Why, Treasury notes and nothing else; the expedient of the spendthrift who has wasted his patrimony—to give his note. The President tell us that the resources of the Government will be adequate to its wants. I tell you they will not. The President has much better oppportunities of judging then I have, and is under the same obligations to disclose the truth to the country. Now, sir, mark the result, and see who is right. Before six months we shall be asked to issue ten millions at least of Treasury notes, or to make a loan in some other form. Why is the truth not now told us? For no other reason than the shame of the avowal, on the part of the President, that, coming into power in a time of profound peace and general prosperity, with a Treasury overflowing, he has in three years expended thirty millions over and above the accruing revenue, and caused an almost universal ruin and insolvency in the land. There was, when the President entered on the duties of his office, nine millions which was to be deposited with the States; five millions of surplus besides, and upwards of five millions due and which has been paid by the Bank of the United States, and there is now near three millions of Treasury notes outstanding, making twenty-three millions, to which add at least ten millions for the present year, and we have in; the three years of this economical Jeffersonian Administration an excess of expenditure over income of thirty-three millions. As to the futdre, I look to it with absolute dismay; no eye can penetrate the gloom of that future. We must pay to England alone next year, for excess or imports over exports, and interest on State debts, not less than sixty millions. The same produce cannot pay this debt and also pay for goods from which revenue is to be derived; and when our produce fails, the debt can only be paid in specie, and the specie will be exported by laws of commerce, as fixed and certain as destiny itself. So certain, sir, am I of these results, that all other feelings are forgotton in a sympathy with the sufferings of the country; and if I had an enemy among the authors of this measure, I would desire for him no other punishment than that which awaits him in the wrath and indignation of an abused and deceived people. That day is coming, and is not far distant, and I shall have no other, if I desire no other, consolation than to be able to say to those who have confided their interests to me, that I have done all that I could to avert these calamities.

I see no human power now to avert the impending distress. This debt must be paid either with our productions—and then we cannot make our usual importations, and, of consequence, the demand for our cotton is cut off, and the article not only falls still lower in price, but cannot be sold at all—or else this debt must be paid in specie, and that, in the present condition of the country, will be ruin at once; not to the banks, but to the people. Not, I repeat, to the banks, but to the people. If the banks are forced to pay, the people, their debtors, must pay them. The banks owe the people one hundred and fifty millions, the people owe them five hundred millions. On whom will the bolt fall most heavily? It will be a golden harvest for shavers and usurers—they will fatten and grow rich upon the suffering and distress of the community. They, and they only, will be benefited. And, if I am not mistaken, it is this class, together with those who either owe no money, or, if they do, are beyond the reach of the law, and have no sympathy with those who do owe, who are the loudest advocates of this most vital and dangerous revolution in the monetary affairs of the country; men who have a most philosophical and praiseworthy indifference to the sufferings of every one else but themselves. No Government has the right to make such an experiment upon the happiness of its people—to carry out any theory, however plausible.

The debts of the country were contracted upon the faith of and with referencee to an existing state of things which no Government has the moral right to subvert all at once, upon the authority of any argument a priori.

One word more as to the nine millions yet to be deposited with the States. I like sometimes to look back as well as forward. It is often profitable to do so. We were told two years ago that the act was not repealed. Oh no! The payment was only postponed. And it was vaunted in my own State as a great achievement, to postpone the payment instead of repealing the law. When are we to get it, sir? Not, sir, until the day of judgment. Or, what is the same thing, until your present Secretary shall put an end to the Florida war. No, sir, I will freely forgive the balance of that debt, if the Government can only be kept along. I repeat, sir, no intelligent man will say that the resources for the next and succeeding years will meet our wants. These resources are greatly exaggerated, whilst the demands on the Treasury are underrated. From the excessive importation of the last year, and the universal pressure in the money market, added to our immense foreign debt, the revenue from imports for the ensuing year must be very small—less, I venture to say, than any one anticipates. very much less than the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury. From the public lands I look hereafter for little revenue: First, because so much of the public domain has gone into the hands of private speculators, who will supersede the Government in the market, because they own the best lands, and can sell on credit and for paper money; and secondly because these lands are like to be used by political speculators, as the corn in the public granaries was used in the days of the decline of the Roman empire. No, sir, instead of reduced taxes, we shall be forced to raise the taxes, and, I believe, up to the extreme point fixed by the compromise of 1832.

By-the-by, sir, as to this tariff question: I was told by more than one who, I think, enjoy the the President's confidence, that the message would be up to the hub with the South on the tariff—that it would even be ultra. I was glad to hear it. I was glad to know that we were to get aid from so influential a quarter, from whatever motive; as I owe no such allegiance—party or personal—anywhere, and never will, as to prevent me from rallying to the support of those who rally to the support of just principles. I looked for the passage, but I looked in vain. I saw exactly the place for it, but it was not there. No, sir, it was not there; but in its place I found all those ad captandum arguments about rendering ourselves independent of the currency and commerce of England, which have heretofore been, and may be again, used in support of a protective tariff, more appropriately than they are used in the message for another purpose. Sir, it is degrading to the intelligence of our age and country to talk in this way. We had as well talk of rendering ourselves independent of the tides or the winds of Heaven. Why, let me ask, is this anti-tariff ground not taken in the message? I will tell you, sir. I have been given to understand that it is because a very important political event is to take place next autumn, and that the thoroughly tariff States, Pennsylvania and Ohio—States now doubtful, to say the least—will have an important influence upon that event, and that it may not be very discreet, at this particular time, to take ground against the tariff; and although he doubtless possesses all the other parts of valor, no one has ever denied to the President that better part of it, "discretion." Especially need he not do so when nothing is to be gained by it. The South is clearly his already, by deed and covenant duly executed; and it would be mere wantonness thus unnecessarily to risk Pennsylvania and Ohio. I have been told, however, to wait, and that in due time this ground will be assumed. In other words, I am to aid in cheating the tariff States out of their votes. What security have we that we shall not be deceived ourselves, as we have been already once on this very same subject, and by the very same person? No, sir: no great end was ever yet accomplished by such means. If no power is left me to resist the odious and dishonest operation of the tariff policy but fraud and trick, I have no confidence in them, and should not resort to them if I had.

It is due to the country that the opinions of the President should have been known upon a great and exciting question which must very soon come up. It is especially so, as he has set up the dangerous pretension of being (as repeated usurpations, not the Constitution, have really made him) "a component part of the legislative power." If he has one-half of the confidence in the judgment and patriotism of the people which he habitually professes, he need not fear to disclose his true opinions. Let him take one side or the other. He has no right to take both. I do not wish to cheat others, nor to be again cheated myself.

I have a word or two to say upon the great subject of the message—the currency question. Our worthy President seems to have a regular intermittent upon this subject. At the extra session the hard money fever was upon him, but at the last session there was a clear intermission of this fever; even, sir, a chill had supervened. He then said: "Like other State establishments, they [banks] may be used or not, in conducting the affairs of the Government." "When the Government can accomplish a financial operation better with the aid of the banks than without it, it should be at liberty to seek that aid," &c. The dangerous tendency of the connection of the Government with banks was then to be arrested, by giving to the Executive the undivided power and uncontrolled discretion to employ them or not. It was dangerous, in other words, to trust this power to the Executive and Congress, but perfectly safe to confide it altogether to the Executive

It is a melancholy truth that, whilst there is a party in this country who watch every encroachment of the Federal Government upon the rights of the States, we all seem to shut our eyes to the not less dangerous usurpations of the Executive upon the other and co-ordinate departments of the Federal Government. A more daring encroachment of that sort has never been made than in this—that it is dangerous to the public liberty to trust this connection with the banks to Congress—the immediate agents and Representative of the people; but that the discretionary power to use banks or not shall be given to the President. Brought up, sir, in the creed of the Republican party—the old, the true, the once respectable Republican party—one of my earliest and most fixed political opinions has been to look to the Executive department as the point of real danger, and to resist the smallest beginnings of Executive encroachment.

We were also told in the last message, of the beneficial results from receiving the notes of specie-paying banks, and the bill introduced as the Government measure did not contain the specie feature. I had some hopes that it was abandoned. I regret to see that it not only has not been, but that the mask is now thrown off, and the purpose distinctly avowed, not only to require Government dues in specie, but to do this with the view of driving out of circulation bank paper altogether, and to reduce the banks exclusively to offices of discount and deposite. Is the country prepared for this? I rejoice that the true purpose is at last avowed. I have known from the beginning that such was the purpose. I have been accused of of disingenuousness for saying so. I have, therefore, a personal satisfaction that I now stand vindicated; still more do I rejoice that this monstrous proposition is now exhibited in its naked deformity.

If any thing, in these times, was to be wondered at, it would be that State rights politicians should advocate this measure, not for its direct financial effects as to the Federal Government, but for its indirect influence upon State institutions—the banks. All admit the right of the States to charter banks; none will assert the right of the Federal Government to destroy or even control these corporations by direct legislation; but the power to do so is claimed, and by State rights men, under the indirect use of a power given for a wholly different purpose. If the revenue power may thus be perverted from its legitimate purpose, why may not the same revenue power be used for the indirect purpose of protecting manufactures? If you may use a granted power to effect, and with the view to effect a purpose for which it was not and never would have been granted, what is there to prevent the power of taxation from being used to effect abolition, by a tax say of fifty dollars for every person held in bondage? If you can control or destroy one State institution—the banks—why may you not do the same with another—domestic slavery? I defy any may to suggest the shadow of a reason for the one which does not apply with equal force to the other.

We are told that banks, in some form, will always exist in this country, and are urged to place these banks on the footing on which they exist in some other countries—that is, banks of deposite and discount, not of issue. "Credit currency and credit commerce" are denounced as the sources of all our troubles. Now, what does he mean by credit currency? Nothing. He can mean nothing but bank notes over and above the specie in hand, "dollar for dollar, and guilder for guilder." Here, sir, is a distinct avowal of a purpose to bring the country to an exclusively metallic currency. No one will say that there is any practical difference between a metallic currency and a paper currency representing gold and silver, dollar for dollar. If there is, in other words, fifty millions of specie in the country, we are to have only fifty millions of paper issued, and that not to be added to the specie but the specie to be withdrawn and locked up, and the paper only to circulate. So that, as to the amount of currency, no one will pretend that we shall have any more than if that currency were in gold and silver only. Is the currency prepared for that?

But, sir, is bank paper beyond the specie in the vaults any more a credit currency than that where there is specie, dollar for dollar? Not a whit; and none but very shallow thinkers, or those who know better, have said so. Is there no basis of credit but gold and silver? Is nothing else of any real value? is there no other property in the land? Is not the note of, John Jacob Astor for a thousand dollars good, and so regarded although it may be known that he has not fifty in specie? It is time that this absurd slang about specie should be exposed. Specie is not only not the sole foundation of the credit of bank paper—it is not even the principle foundation but the property of the debtors of the banks, and the stock itself is the chief foundation of that credit. Is it not so as to the credit of individuals? Is credit given because of a known amount of specie held by the debtor? Clearly not; for in that case he would need no credit, but would use his specie. No, sir; I repeat, it is property to which credit is given—that property of which gold and silver is the mere yard stick.

Is this not true? After the banks had suspended, and it was known that they had no specie, have we not only seen their notes passing, but passing at par for every thing else but specie? And as to that, it is not the fall in the value of the note, but the rise in the market value of the specie. Yes, sir, when in that condition, every one is willing to exchange the very best individual notes, drawing interest, for those bank notes drawing none. Why is this, if specie is the sole basis of their credit? I do not intend to be misunderstood. I am no indiscriminate advocate of the banking system, still less of its excesses and vices. I go further; I know that reforms, vital and radical, are required, and I believe that, if these reforms are not made, the system will be run down. I am no apologist for bank suspensions. I think the last one without excuse. Specie is necessary; it is the only measure by which we are to know when bank issues are excessive; but to bring the country, in its present condition, and with the paper system now prevailing almost throughout the world, to a metallic currency, is a project absurd and impossible. I have no apprehensions whatever of that; my fears are of a different character. I do not doubt that, by the swing of the pendulum, as natural in the moral as in the physical world, the reaction will be to reinstate the paper system in its utmost excesses, and most probably to establish a Government bank—an institution which I do not hesitate to say the public liberty will not long survive. No such tremendous revolution in the personal circumstances of men as that proposed ever can be effected but by the iron hand of despotism. It never will be done where the people have the power it their own hands. It is in the nature of man to disregard ultimate results in seeking present relief from pressing calamities, and there is no such calamity as a rapidly diminishing currency. My life on it, the people will not bear it.

Infinite as have been the losses, the sufferings, and the misery which have already resulted from this fatal experiment, we have not yet seen the worst. There has been a general forbearance; it cannot be always The advocates of this hard money policy well know it. There is no single state in the Union that would not instantly crush the experiment and the experimenters, if they were called on to pay direct taxes in specie. Is this denied? If it is to act beneficially on the banks by creating a practical drain for specie, that is a reason equally strong for demanding State taxes in specie. Why has no one ever had the boldness to propose this in any State Legislature? Why, sir, because those taxes are collected directly, and the people would not bear it; and yet we see anti tariff men, by the secret and unseen operation of that law, doing what they would not dare openly to propose.

The state which I in part represent is regarded as almost unanimous in favor of this specie policy. Its Legislature may be said to be so. I have for the intelligence and purity and patriotism of that people a respect and deference which I cannot here express, and I allude to these things for no unworthy or disrespectful purpose, but it is a fair illustration of what will be the result of this humbug every where.

A portion of our banks have suspended specie payments, some of them with twice as much specie on hand as they have bills out. A proposition was made to the last Legislature to coerce a resumption by these banks of specie payments. And what do you think was the result? It was rejected by a large majority. This was not all: we have a State bank, owned by the State exclusively. It was proposed at a preceding session to receive nothing for taxes but specie or the bills of this State bank—a very reasonable proposition surely. Did it pass the Legislature?—this sub-Treasury hard money Legislature. Oh! no, sir, but the tax collectors were ordered to receive the bills of all the banks—non-specie-paying bank rags and all. They did more; whilst inveighing against banks and the credit system, they doubled the chartered bank capital of the State, and have created a larger debt for the State than was done by all former Legislatures from the beginning of the Government.

A case still more striking is furnished by the recent action of the Administration party, a hard-money sub-Treasury Legislature, with the sanction of the hard-money Governor of the enlightened and patriotic State of Georgia. The Legislature of that State, which has just adjourned, has established a bank more thoroughly a paper bank than any that ever has existed in any country—a bank, sir, which would amaze John Law himself, if he could be allowed to see what is now going on. He, sir, would be shocked at this wild excess of the paper system. The Central Bank of Georgia, whose affairs at the last report stood thus—specie, $46,000; circulation, $86,000, and bonds and notes amounting to about $3,000,000—is ordered (not authorized, but ordered) to issue six millions of notes—double the currency of the State—and to loan the money in the respective counties according to population, on bonds due in twelve months. They issue six millions of paper on forty-six thousand of specie, and promise to pay specie on demand, when the debts to the bank are not due for a year. They cannot even pay bank notes for a year, and yet they promise to pay in specie on demand; and this, too, sir, when a draft of the State for three hundred thousand dollars has been recently protested, without any provision whatever being made to meet; but, on the contrary, stock which was hypothecated for its payment is ordered to be sold for other purposes. This law was signed on Friday, and the banks suspended the next Monday. These, sir, are characteristic signs of what will be the general feeling and the general results, in the end, of this most disastrous experiment upon the happiness, and fortunes, and business of the people. I rejoice, therefore, that the purposes of the Administration are at length avowed. If these objects are sanctioned any where, I shall be disappointed. If there is one man in South Carolina who is in favor of abolishing bank paper as a currency, I have never seen him.

We were told, when this measure was first brought forward, that it would especially benefit the South. That it was our staples which would be exchanged for specie, and that additional value would be given to those staples. Has this been so? Has indeed the amount of specie in the country increased for the last two years? It has not. Why not? We were told to drive out paper, and specie would take its place. One-half of the bank notes have been driven out—has their place been filled? No, sir; that place is literally "an aching void." I thought at first, and was confined in that opinion by the authority of such men as Dallas and Crawford, than whom this country has produced none abler or better, and they spoke not from abstract and delusive speculation, but from actual experience, that it would enrich New York, the great centre of commerce—the place at which, not from which, payments were to be made at the expense of all the rest of the country. Has it not so turned out? Gold and silver abound even to excess in that city, whilst every where else there is, amongst business men, dismay and despair. Benefit the South! Why, sir, it has been, and will be, a protective tariff in its worst form. Reduce, ours to a hard money country, and reduce prices accordingly and who does not see that the manufactures of the rest of the world where the paper system prevails cannot be sold here? and an absolute monopoly is given to the American manufacturer, at prices nominally cheaper, but actually and relatively higher—destroying our great market for Southern staples at a time when the supply of those staples must be enormously increased from suspension of works of internal improvement, and an immense amount of labor is about to be thrown again upon agriculture, to say nothing of other causes? In all sincerity I say, sir, I tremble when I look to the future, especially in the South.

The President attaches much importance to the fact which he states, that there is never any large amount at any one time in the hands of collectors, &c Who did not know that? Who did not know that the profligate waste of the public money by this spendthrift Administration, at the same time that our revenues were greatly diminished, had forced the Government literally to live from hand to mouth? Nay, more, sir, to resort to the most despicable shifts to "raise the wind?"—no other phrase will so well express the idea. To do that which would irretrievably disgrace a private man—to draw for money when they knew they had none on which to draw? But, sir, this state of things, it is to hoped, is not to last always. If we should ever again have a full Treasury, the currency will be disastrously contracted, and, what is more, your sub-Treasurers, with large amounts of gold and silver on hand, may ruin at will every bank in the country. Will not this give a political power over those institutions which may well be dreaded?

I was very much surprised to see that so able and adroit a writer as the President should have been guilty of so gross an inconsistency as I find in the message. The great argument of the message in favor of the measure is not that it will give a good currency, gold and silver, for the use of the Government, but the effect that it is to have on the banks. To this end it is said that it will be all-powerful. How can it be so but by causing the banks, by reason of this constant drain of specie, greatly to restrict their issues? And yet we are immediately afterwards told that the sum required for the uses of the Government will be so very small that it will really hardly affect the banks at all—a very Hercules at one moment—as powerless as a sleeping infant the next.

I must apologize for detaining the House so long, but I felt it to be my duty to call the public attention to some of the points of this message, especially to the startling proposition to abolish, in effect, bank paper, and thus to operate on State institutions by the indirect use of a power granted for other and different purposes—a power which never would have been granted for the purpose for which it is now proposed to be used.

SPEECH OF MR. GRUNDY,

OF TENNESSEE.

Senate, March 4 and 5, 1840—In favor of the report of the Select Committee, against the assumption, by the General Government, of the States' debts, contracted for local internal improvements, and other State purposes.

Mr. PRESIDENT: The duty which lies before me is laborious, but, in my judgment, it is not difficult. So soon as I discovered the manner in which the report was treated by Senators on the other side when it was first presented, I resolved in my own mind that I would take some suitable occasion to answer all the arguments which should be urged against it. By pursuing this course, I am aware that much which I may say will be a dull, cold repetition of what has been better said by others; but the Senate will bear with me. I owe a duty to my country, to the committee whose honored organ I was, and to myself. My present purpose is to discharge all the obligations and duties which rest upon me most faithfully. This I will endeavor to do in a manner and in a temper becoming a Senator, who is not unmindful of what is due to that enlightened and elevated body of which he is a member. It is not, however, my intention to re-argue in a regular way the subjects introduced and discussed in the report. That document is now before the people of the United States, and whatever may be said for or against it here, will not materially affect the estimate which the public have already placed, or will hereafter place upon it. Whenever the people read a public document upon an interesting subject, they can and will form opinions for themselves, and those opinions they will carry out by their acts. Without intending it, our political opponents have secured for the report a very general perusal. Their opposition to its being printed, their effort to suppress it, and prevent its circulation, have excited public curiosity, and produced a desire to see it; and I doubt not that it will now be read by hundreds and thousands, whose attention might never have been turned to it, had it been treated in the ordinary way.

Mr. President, I have seen, as you know, much of public life. At times, circumstances have made me a more prominent actor in political scenes than I could have wished. I have been, and my sentiments have been, too often denounced for denunciation to carry any alarm or terror to me. The denunciation of my friends I should fear; but whenever I cease to receive the disapprobation and denunciations of my political enemies, I shall begin to doubt whether I have not lost my efficiency, and whether the best service I could render to my country, would not be my retirement to private life. Political opponents condemn and censure those who are most in their way, and interpose the most formidable obstacles to the attainment of their favorite objects. Therefore, in general, it is a safe rule to say that men and things most condemned by them, are best deserving the approbation of that portion of the public who are opposed to their views and schemes. I did not come into this honorable body, nor was I sent here, for the purpose of conciliating the favorable opinion of the Opposition. On the contrary, those who bestowed on me the high honor of a seat in this body, intended and expected that I would firmly pursue the same course which I had hitherto taken; that I would support the same principles I had heretofore uniformly maintained. Nor shall they be disappointed. Let denunciations come as they may, I shall not deviate in my principles or my course. I recollect that, in the other end of the Capitol, more than a quarter of a century ago, when our country was bleeding at every pore; when our armies were suffering for supplies which we had no money to purchase; when our ranks could not be filled because men of influence used all their power to prevent loans to the Government, and the enlistment of soldiers, I, in public debate, advanced the sentiment, that American citizens who thus acted and used their influence to prevent loans or enlistments, were guilty of moral treason. Then, sir, you remember how this sentiment was denounced in Congress, and by the whole Federal press. Nay, I did not even escape animadversion from the sacred desk. I then believed I was right; and I maintained my opinion with what little ability I possessed. And now how is it? Does any one now doubt the correctness of what I then said? If any one does so, he will scarcely venture at this day to avow a contrary sentiment. So I verily believe it will be with this report. The great principles it discusses will stand the test of the strictest examination; and even now, gentlemen who condemned the first and greater portion of it, will not controvert the soundness of its principles. If they disapprove it, why do they not do this; why do they not candidly and manfully discuss its principles? Instead of so doing, they pronounce it to be unnecessary—to be uncalled for, and calculated to produce no good. They seem afraid to meet the questions involved upon their merits. Every sort of evasion is resorted to. They demur; they plead in abatement; they resort to all the devices which skilful pleaders employ to get rid of a trial upon the merits of their cause. Such a trial is what they dread, and dare not meet. Pursuing this course of opposition, they assert that no such proposal as the assumption by the General Government of the debts of the States has been made here or elsewhere. We, on this side of the House, believe that such a proposition has not only been made, but made in the most formidable and imposing shape. This I will now proceed to prove. For this purpose, I shall use the extracts from the public papers which were read by my honorable friend from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] a few days since, when he addressed the Senate upon this subject. The New York Herald and the Courier and Enquirer are known to be papers of high Whig authority; they are situated in the great commercial emporium of the country, in the city where Wall street is, and where the agents of the British capitalists and the principal brokers of this country reside, and where more of these State bonds have been bought and sold than in all the rest of the Union. If these papers have advocated the assumption of the State debts by the General Government, it may fairly be inferred that a very serious intention exists to carry this scheme into effect. The New York Herald, in November last, introduced this subject into its columns, and used the following language: "This plan is so far matured by the leaders of the Whig party, as to be officially promulgated in the Courier and Enquirer of yesterday morning. The following extract conveys, in petto, the skeleton of the scheme." Here is the declaration of a leading Whig paper, published in the city of New York, announcing the fact that the "PLAN IS SO FAR MATURED BY THE LEADERS OF THE WHIG PARTY AS TO BE OFFICIALLY PROMULGATED IN THE COURIER AND ENQUIRER." Has this announciation ever been denied in the city of New York by any other Whig paper? Never, that I have learned. It is declared not only to be a Whig measure, but to have been matured by the leaders of that party. Now for the "plan" which the Herald says was "matured by the leaders of the Whig party." This is given in the Courier and Enquirer:

Let the Government of the United States—which means the people's immediate Representatives in both Houses of Congress—create three hundred millions of stock, bearing an interest of four per cent. per annum, and let this be apportioned among the States on the principle of Mr. Clay's land bill, that is, pro rata, according to the number of their Senators and Representatives in Congress; and let the proceeds of the sales of the public lands be set aside and sacredly pledged as a sinking fund for the redemption of this stock. Let the Secretary of the Treasury, or some other suitable person, be appointed to exchange so much of this stock as may be the portion of any State for the stock of such State now issued, and after a certain period—say six months—pay over the balance to the respective States. Most probably the holders of some State stocks would not be willing to make such exchanges, and, if so, the State would receive its entire portion; and from the interest annually received on the United States stock, and sales of it from time to time, as their necessities required, be in a situation to progress at once with all its public works, whether commenced or only in embryo. United States stock would then immediately fill the space at present occupied by about two hundred millions of State stock: the remaining one hundred millions would be deposited in the State treasuries, and would only be offered for sale as their public works or other necessities required, and which the capitalists of Europe and America would gladly purchase at a premium.

This is the scheme; this is the plan which the Herald says was matured by the "LEADERS of the WHIG PARTY!" and the editor puts down the State debts at about two hundred millions of dollars; and yet the committee has been rebuked, severely rebuked, for saying that they were estimated at about that sum. I wish the Senate to notice the nature of this proposition. It is not to divide the proceeds of the public lands among the States, but it is to create a national debt; to make United States stock to the amount of three hundred millions of dollars, which is to be exchanged for the State stocks, and the proceeds of the sales of the public lands are to be set aside and sacredly pledged as a sinking fund for the redemption of this stock. This proposition would not only embrace the revenue arising from the whole public lands; but, in case of a deficiency, it would have to be made up from other sources. Listen, further, to the language of the Herald; it says:

In illustration of this great scheme, the Courier goes at length into its popularity, economy, and means of escape from direct taxation, which the several States must submit to if the present system continue. With every view taken on these points, we cordially concur. It is the only and efficient system for the financial troubles of the age. A new National Bank is as frail as a fair one of the third tier. We have seen the coup de grace given to the rotten fair one in Philadelphia. Free banks are equally worthless and numerous. Safety fund can hardly cover their nakedness. There is no plan, no scheme, nothing short of a miracle from Heaven, can save the great credit system, except it be the plan now proposed.

Nor have these views been confined to the city of New York. The Cincinnati Gazette, the ablest Whig paper in Ohio, has taken and sustained the same ground. Am I not safe, then, in affirming that the leading organs of the Whig party, or at least many of them, have made the proposition spoken of in the report of the committee, and strongly urged upon the public mind the propriety of its adoption? But I stop not here. The bankers of England, Baring, Brothers and Co., who have traded more in these State stocks, and, perhaps, own more of them than all other individuals put together, in their circular, issued last fall, distinctly make the proposition, and declare:

But if the old scheme of internal improvements in the Union is to be carried into effect on the vast scale, and with the rapidity lately projected, and by the means of foreign capital, a more comprehensive guarantee than that of individual States will be required, to raise so large an amount in a short time.

A national would undoubtedly collect capital together from all parts of Europe; but the forced sales of loans, made separately by all the individual States in reckless competition through a number of channels, render the terms more and more onerous for all, lower the reputation of American credit, and (as reliance is almost exclusively placed upon the London market) produce temporary mischief here, by absorbing the floating capital, diverting money from regular business, deranging banking operations, and producing an unnatural balance of trade against this country.

It would seem, therefore, as if most of the States must either pause in the execution of their works of improvement, or some general system of combination must be adopted.

From this extract it is evident that an assumption of the State debts, or a guarantee of their payment, was not only proposed, but anxiously desired, by these vast traders in American stocks. In addition to all this, a member of the other House from my own State, [Mr. GENTRY,] gave notice that he would introduce a bill to assume certain State debts, and appropriate the public lands for the purpose. That bill has not been introduced, and after what has passed in this body, it may not be; but it is evident, from the title of the bill, that an assumption was contemplated, though to what extent I do not know; and unless the bill be introduced, I probably never shall. The Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] who, I regret has been detained from his seat longer than I had expected, has said that he had seen no evidence of a design to offer such a proposition as an assumption of the State debts. All the answer I can make to this, is, that it seems to me he has not looked into this subject with his usual diligence and accuracy, and the evidence must have escaped his notice; for, to my mind, it is ample and conclusive. He says that he is against an assumption. No one will doubt this after the declaration he has made; but how far short of this is the measure he proposes? He will not assume; but does he not contend for a distribution of the revenue arising from the public lands among the States, to be applied by them to any purpose whatsoever? Now this, I admit, is not an assumption, nor the creation of a national debt; but it is furnishing the means of payment, so far as they may go, to the States. It is not an assumption of the States debts, but an actual payment of them, to the extent of the proceeds of the public lands. The same honorable Senator has remarked, that I am wrong in attempting to give warning to the public from this place upon this subject. If, sir, I err in this, this body sins every day in the same way. Why do we order extra numbers of reports and other documents to be printed? Why do the mail coaches daily groan under the weight of speeches delivered in this honorable body? I have always understood that these things were done and intended for the purpose of diffusing information among the people, and enlightening the public mind. Scarcely a day passes but we hear it declared on this floor that no expectation is entertained by the speaker of influencing the votes of Senators; but the public may be affected by what he is about to say; and he proceeds to deliver his sentiments. I think this remark of the honorable Senator has no force whatever in it.

We are asked emphatically, what right have we to notice the proceedings of the Legislatures of the States? My answer is, that the right to speak of their proceedings exists at all times; it should be exercised rarely, only upon great and important occasions. In this instance, as little has been said in the report as possible, consistently with the duty which had been assigned to the committee. But I entertain views upon the subject differing radically from those which have been expressed by some gentlemen. I do not consider the State Legislatures in any degree superior to the Congress of the United States. We are co-agents for the same people in the respective States The State Legislatures are supreme in all things not prohibited by their State Constitutions, and which have not been delegated to this Government: and this Government is supreme in all matters confided to it by the Constitution of the United States; but it must be recollected, that both are acting for the same people, and are the guardians of their interests. Hence the propriety, that the Governments, State and National, and their members, should give warnings to the people whenever a great sacrifice of their interests shall be attempted by either. In conformity with this view, the Governors of States, in their messages to their Legislatures, and the Legislatures themselves, upon occasions which they judge proper, are in the constant habit of treating of, and expressing their opinions upon, subjects which are intrusted by the Constitution to Federal legislation and action. I think this is all proper, nor do I even take exception to the proceedings of the Legislature of New Jersey, however much I may differ from them in opinion, in denouncing and condemning the proceedings of the other House of Congress in organizing itself without admitting either of the party claimants to their seats; and in calling upon the Legislatures of other States to unite in this condemnation. In my opinion, the right to speak and remonstrate exists, although I should not concur in the propriety of exercising it but upon important and interesting occasions.

I wish gentlemen would assign some reason why this right is not reciprocal. I believe it to be so, and, therefore, whenever a case occurs, which, in my judgment, demands it, I shall not hesitate to speak out and give warning to my countrymen of impending danger, let that danger arise from what quarter it may.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. SMITH] insists that all proceedings, or expressions of opinion, upon subjects not immediately connected with legislation, are wrong; that the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions, passed upon the subject of the alien and sedition laws, have produced much mischief growing out of the different constructions placed upon them. That honorable Senator was too young to understand the matter of which he spoke. You and I, Mr. President, both know that these, and Mr. Madison's report upon the Virginia resolutions, were the great lever which elevated Mr. Jefferson to the Presidential chair, and expelled from power the Federal party, which at that time rule and governed this country. This I have always considered a great and beneficial result, growing out of the resolutions which he condems. If he thinks the effects produced were not advantageous to the country, then we may well differ, and shall continue to do so, because there is a radical difference of opinion between us.

The same Senator has made a practical commentary upon our right to speak of the State authorities in debate here, very different from the doctrines held by his party upon this occasion. In the course of his remarks the other day, he told us that the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania was now acting patriotically, but that there were a number of destructives in the Legislature of the State, who were determined to destroy him. Was not this speaking of high State dignitaries, of the legislative authority of a sovereign State, with a freedom not claimed, or attempted to be practised, by any friend of this report and its principles.

Having thus disposed, as I think, successfully, of these general objections to the course pursued by the committee, I shall proceed to show the correctness of the positions laid down and sustained in the report; and, with this view, I shall ask the attention of the Senate to the terms of the cession by Virginia of her public lands. Before doing so, however, I beg to advert to the langnage of the resolution of the old Congress, in pursuance of which this cession, and that of the other States, were made.

It was passed on the 10th of October, 1780, as follows:

Resolved, That the unappropriated lands which may be ceded or relinquished to the United States by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress, of the 6th day of December last, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct Republican States, which shall become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States.

From this resolu ion, it is apparent that Congress asked for the cessions of the vacant and unappropriated lands, not for the purpose of benefiting the States separately, but collectively, and the cession made by Virginia on the 1st of March, 1784, clearly conveys the same idea. The language is "That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved or appropriated to any of the before mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation, or federal alliance of said States, Virginia inclusive, according to the usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

It should here be remarked, that this cession, and the deed made by Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Monroe, and others, in pursuance of it, reserve nothing, and contain no expression conveying the idea that a reversion, remainder, or limitation of uses, other than those expressed in the cession, was in the contemplation of the parties. The absolute fee was granted. It was known to the States, and to Congress, that a Federal Government then existed, which had to be supported by taxes upon the people of the States; and, also, that the expenses of the Revolutionary war had to be paid. No one at that day could have believed that the revenue arising from the ceded lands could support the Government and discharge the Revolutionary debt; and experience has proved it to be insufficient for either purpose. Therefore, it never entered into the minds of the grantors or grantee, that the revenue arising from the public lands was to be drawn from the general Treasury of the United States, and placed in the treasuries of the different States.

It is further objected to the report, that it states that the rule of contribution is changed under the present Federal Government, and yet the report alleges that the disposition now made of the proceeds of the public lands, is according to the letter and spirit of the cessions. Such, to my mind, is precisely the fact. If lands were sold under the Confederation, the proceeds were placed in the public Treasury, and drawn from it to defray the expenditures of the Confederacy—not one dollar went into the treasury of any State. Such also is the case at present. I think it therefore clear, that both the letter and spirit of the cessions are complied with in the present mode of appropriating the revenue arising from the public lands.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] takes a further exception to the report, because, in a single sentence, or point, there is a coincidence in thought, and some similarity of language between it and a report once made by himself. I see nothing in this to which exception should be taken. It only proves that, in my judgment, he has thought correctly upon a single point in relation to this whole subject. But he says, although we agree on one point, we immediately separate and part again. Yes, sir, this is true. We habitually differ on political subjects, and have done so for nearly forty years, except for a few sessions, when we were in the other House of Congress. That Senator, sir, has referred on a former occasion, to the first subject of difference between us, which was respecting the first bank that was chartered in the State of Kentucky. I was a member of the Legislature of that State at the time this corporation was established. A bill was presented with the imposing title "to incorporate an insurance company," not a word was said in it respecting a bank; there was, however, a provision in it, that the company might issue notes payable to A B, or bearer; the bill passed without opposition, and I have never heard it said by any member of that General Assembly, that he suspected the incorporation of a bank was intended. It was, as the honorable Senator has stated, a fraud upon the Legislature. When I returned to the Legislature, I attempted to repeal it. The honorable Senator had then become a member, I believe, for the first time. I introduced a bill to effect my object. I relied in argument upon the fact that a fraud had been committed, and that the Legislature possessed the power to repeal it. The Senator, on the other hand, relied upon the sacredness of the charter, and the vested rights acquired under it. The repealing bill passed the House, of which we were members: it also passed the Senate; but the Governor exercised his veto power. It again passed the House of Representatives by the constitutional majority, but failed in the Senate by two or three votes. The bank went on, and I heard little more of it, having ceased to be a citizen of the State, until the year 1820, when I was sent by the Legislature of Tennessee as a commissioner to the Legislature of Kentucky, to aid in settling the disputed boundary between the two States. I then learned that a citizen of one of the Eastern States, perhaps Massachusetts, had arrived in Kentucky, and, by some means, had acquired a control over the institution, and had run off, taking the bank with him, without leaving funds to discharge its outstanding debts. Thus began and ended the first bank in the Western States. It came into the world by fraud, and went out of it by stealth.

The same honorable Senator said, when I made the report now under discussion, I did not even stand the first fire. I have served in this body with that honorable Senator about ten years, and, according to my recollection, he has never before drawn upon the military science for any comparison, or figure of speech. This may have been owing to his dislike to "military chieftains;" but now that he has enlisted under the banner of a "military chieftain," he has added to his powers of rhetoric all the tropes and figures that can be gathered from that science. It seems to me, however, that I stood the first fire pretty well, under the circumstances. In the first place, I had no suspicion of an ambuscade; I considered myself in the Senate of the United States, where nothing was practised, but fair, open, manly warfare. It so happened in this case, that, upon the presentation of the report, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] commenced his fire upon me. I defended myself as well as I could. Then the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] opened his batteries upon me. Next in order came the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SOUTHARD.] Last, though not least, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] came into the battle. The odds against me, in point of numbers, were certainly considerable; but, having truth and justice on my side, I did not feel that inferiority, which, under different circumstances, I might have experienced. At last my gallant friend from North Carolina [Mr. BROWN] came to my assistance, and, so heavy a fire did he open upon the enemy, that I then felt able to maintain the contest without yielding a single inch of ground. Late in the evening, when it was almost dark, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. KING] always judicious, retired us from the field, and the enemy took from us no spoils of victory. We carried with us the subject-matter of the war, and, on the following morning, we renewed the fight; and here we have been, day after day, ready at all times to do battle, and have even waited until the sick and wounded should recover, and the absent return and fill up the ranks of our adversaries. Sir, I delight to contend with Senators; there is something high and noble in it. If I am worsted one day, perhaps on the next, victory may perch on my standard; and if not, then it may at some future period; and if it should never come at all, the country may sustain no detriment, nor should I experience mortification or chagrin. But, sir, there is another species of attack about which I entertain very different sentiments and feelings. There is another class of men who have assailed this report in no measured terms. I mean those letter writers who are sent to this place by distant editors. These men I consider the basest and meanest of mankind: they misrepresent and falsify every thing that is done here; misrepresentation and falsehood are their vocation and livelihood, and I am told that some of them are so degraded as to write letters for both sides—that is, the same writer, in describing the same transaction, will say in a letter to a Federal paper, that "Mr. A, to-day, made a most splendid effort in the Senate of the United States. His eloquence was so powerful, that the whole of the Democratic Senators looked aghast, and were unable to open their mouths in opposition to his eloquent effusions," &c. So soon as he has sealed up this letter and directed it, he writes a letter to a Democratic paper, in which he announces, that "this was a proud day for the Democracy of the country. Mr. B, to-day, did himself immortal honor; he literally demolished the whole Federal phalanx of the Senate," &c. &c. As to this class of individuals, Mr. President, I have but a word to say. With them I will hold no controversy, and to them I say, Procul, O! procul este profani! Yes, sir, the farther off the better, for we can hold no communion together.

I come now to the discussion of a subject upon which, of all others, the Republican party has been most misunderstood and most misrepresented. We are charged with being in favor of an exclusive metallic currency. This is not so, so far as I understand the sentiments of the party. The President of the United States, in his letter to the Honorable Sherrod Williams, distinctly negatives this idea, so far as relates to his own opinions. In his late message to Congress nothing of the kind is intimated. So far from it, he declares that, in a country so commercial at this, banks will always exist. Reform, and not destruction, is the policy in regard to banks, which he recommends I know, full well, what course has been pursued upon this subject throughout the country. It is to charge us with holding sentiments which we do not entertain, and gravely urging on the people the danger of such opinions. I will now state what my own opinions are, and what I believe to be the sentiments of the party of which I am a member I am not in favor of an exclusive metallic courrency; I do not believe that a sufficient amount of gold and silver can be procured and retained in the country to supply an adequate circulating medium for the commerce, the wants, and enterprise, of the community; but I am anxious to see the circulation of small notes suppressed by those who possess the power to do so. We possess no such power; that belongs alone to the States. If small notes were banished from circulation, gold and silver would fill up the vacuum thus produced, and in this way specie would be introduced and used in ordinary daily transactions; while bank notes or other paper would be used in larger dealings. It is difficult to say how far this reformation should go, or how far it should be extended. I can only lay down the principle upon which I am willing to act, and leave to others, more skilled in the monetary and financial affairs, to furnish the details. If a sufficient amount of gold and silver can be procured to furnish a circulation for all sums under ten dollars, I am willing that all bank notes under that denomination should be banished from common use; I am willing even to go farther. If the amount of gold and silver be sufficient to furnish an adequate circulation under twenty dollars, I am willing to go to that amount. Were this done, the benefits arising from it would at once be apparent; all the laboring classes of the community would receive gold and silver for their labor; nor would they be liable to the frauds and impositions incident to bank paper. If gold and silver were in circulation, and a pressure made upon the banks, this circulation would be called to their relief, to a certain extent. The utility of a mixed currency, such as that of which I speak, is proved in England by the fact that, when five pound notes are the lowest that are issued, there is no want of specie for the common business transactions of the community. Further, I wish to see banks regulated through the agency of the State Legislatures, so as to compel them to be honest. In other words, I would place them under the empire of the laws, and whenever they ceased to answer the purposes for which they were created, they should cease to exist.

What I have said, relates to the general business of the country, not to the fiscal operations of the Government—what we desire is to see safe banking; that is, that the banks shall be so conducted and managed that the holder of a bank note shall be sure of his money when he wants or demands it. Neither is the Republican party against the credit system. We only wish a sound credit system. We do not wish to see the banks issuing fifteen or twenty dollars in paper for one which they may have in their vaults in specie; nor do we wish to see men subscribe for bank stock, and pay it in, and then take it all out on their stock notes, as has been frequently done; nor should banks, in our view, be engaged in cotton or mercantile speculations of any kind; all such adventures endanger their note holders, and render their creditors insecure. If they would confine themselves to their legitimate business, that is, loaning money or their notes, and purchasing and selling bills of exchange, their profits would be ample, although their discounts should be confined within proper and safe limits. Men skilled in banking say that, generally, a bank may safely loan two or three dollars for one of specie in its vaults. Is not this profit enough? For every hundred dollars specie in bank, twelve or eighteen per cent. may be received by the circulation of its bills; that is, if I loan a hundred dollars to my neighbor, six per cent. is all that I can receive according to the laws of most of the States, but if, instead of this, I vest it in bank stock, I will receive, so far as specie gives circulation, twelve, fifteen, or eighteen per cent. When such privileges are granted, surely honesty and punctuality should be enforced.

The measure now proposed is to give the revenue arising from the public lands to be used for improvements among the States; and unless some other means be resorted to, you must raise the tariff to make up the deficiency in the revenue. Now, I ask, is there a man in this country who is not for other reasons in favor of a high tariff, that will assent to this. The effect will be, as has been clearly proven by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HUBBARD,] that the people of the United States, in the States, will receive from this Government from three to three and a half millions of dollars, and then pay back the same amount, with the increase of the cost and hazard of collection; that is to say: for every dollar thus distributed, a dollar and twelve and a half, or twenty-five cents, will have to be returned. It is said, however, that we can make up the deficiency in various ways. The first which has been proposed is a duty on imported silks; this duty would be right, and I regret that the other House, which can alone originate a bill upon this subject, has not sent one to that effect to this body; for I am anxious to see this duty imposed; but my opinion is, that all that accrues from this additional source of revenue will be needed on account of the rapid reduction of the revenue from customs under the compromise act.

It is urged, in the next place, that a portion of the army, a part of the mounted men, which now consist of two regiments, might be discharged. This is not a time to reduce the military force of the country. The war in Florida is still going on, and if any portion of the troops should be withdrawn, the inhabitants of that Territory, the men, women, and children, will be more exposed to the rifle, the tomahawk, and the scalping-knife, than they now are. Besides, we have a very serious controversy with Great Britain respecting our Northeastern boundary; and the negotiations, so far as they have been made public, do not promise a very speedy and amicable adjustment of that difficulty. Further, we have on our western frontier, adjoining the States of Missouri and Arkansas, many powerful tribes of Indians, and we should be more savage than the savages themselves were we to fail in furnishing an adequate military force to repel and instantly put down any hostile movement which they might make upon that exposed frontier. This Government, in carrying out what I have always considered a wise policy, has concentrated upon the borders of these two States the Indian tribes that were scattered throughout the country. We have created this exposure to danger in that quarter, and are therefore bound, by every obligation, constitutional and moral, to protect the inhabitants against the danger produced by our own acts. So strongly do I feel the duty which rests upon the Government on this subject, that I am not only unwilling to disband the mounted men which were raised for their protection, but, whenever a reasonable ground for the apprehension of danger shall be shown, I am prepared to vote for any amount of force which may be deemed necessary to repel or remove all apprehension of danger. It is the duty of this Government to protect every portion of the country, but this frontier in a more especial manner.

It is further said that our diplomatic corps at foreign courts should be reduced. Our foreign relations have been so ably and so successfully managed, during the last ten years, that I should be unwilling to see any change, unless some agent were designated and shown to be unnecessary.

An argument is drawn in favor of the distribution of the revenue arising from the sales of the public lands, from the fact that a bill is upon the table in the Senate, giving to the new States the disposition of the lands within their limits, and surrendering to them one-half of the proceeds for their expense in making the sales, and for transacting such an agency. It is true that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] has introduced such a bill, and it is also true that it is free from the constitutional objection which attaches to the project of distribution; but whether it will meet with favor or not is yet to be ascertained. For myself, I am inclined to think that it will not. My present impression is, that the system now in operation should be continued, with the variations which I will now mention—and I will observe that the opinions I am about to express are not of recent date, but those I have entertained ever since I have arrived at manhood, and that I urged them during the first session at which I took my seat in the Senate. I am an advocate for pre-emptioners and pre-emption rights By changing day-laborers and tenants into free holders, an operation is effected which makes each individual more of a man, and more attached to his country; it elevates him from a necessitous situation to a more exalted and independent station; he enjoys the benefits of the whole proceeds of his labor, and there is no division of his earnings between himself and a landlord or a task-master. What he makes is his own, and he can rear up his family in a free air, and with an independent spirit. So thoroughly am I persuaded of this, that I would be willing to hold out inducements to those who now reside in the old States, and are unable to acquire a freehold, to go to the far West, and obtain an independence at a moderate price. I should be inclined to say to all such as may settle on the public lands, and show by a continued residence a determination to be permanent settlers, that they should have the lands at fifty cents per acre, or even less. And I ask, why should we not be liberal to those who go to the far West to better their fortunes? They are bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh; and if any of the citizens of Tennessee wish to go, I repeat the language which I used upon a former occasion: "Go and be happy, and may the God of all mercies protect and prosper you." I would graduate the price of the public lands; I would not continue the absurd practice of requiring as high a sum for poor as for rich lands. But let this plan of distribution prevail, and no settled need expect a pre-emption right, nor will the graduation of price ever be effected. In short, I consider this project of distribution as the deadliest blow that could be struck to the prosperity and advancement of the new States; therefore, if there were no other reason, I should oppose it.

Mr. President, I am not mistaken in my views upon this subject. I am a Western man; I was reared from my infancy among that description of men whose cause I advocate; I know their bravery in war, and honesty in peace. When our country needs soldiers, they are the men safest to be looked to; and, when money is needed, they will contribute what they have with a free good will.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] asks, "What father would not give a portion of his property to save a member of his family from ruin?" I answer, none. But, in such case, the father gives his own property, which he has a right to dispose of at his pleasure; but we are asked to give property and money which we hold in trust for other purposes, and have no constitutional right to dispose of according to our will and pleasure.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr PHELPS] says that this report is confused and indistinct, introducing different subjects, and blending them together. Not so; the fault is not in the report, but in those who thus read it. The first part of the report has exclusive reference to the assumption of the State debts by the General Government; it has nothing to do with the public lands, or the revenue arising from them; and so it is with the resolutions: the first three relate exclusively to the assumption of the State debts, and the fourth to the public lands and the revenue arising therefrom. He asks, what is meant by the terms "direct" and "indirect" in the first resolution? My answer is, that a direct assumption is an absolute promise to pay; indirect, is a guarantee or a conditional promise, or any other form or mode of assumption, by which the United States might become ultimately responsible. He further says he cannot vote for or against the resolutions without subjecting himself to misrepresentation. All I can say is, that this misrepresentation will not grow out of the report or resolutions—they are plain, distinct, and easily understood; and I can tell the honorable Senator that, if he expects to escape misrepresentation, he will be more fortunate than most members of this honorable body. He, and the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. HENDERSON,] both say that, if I will prove that this Government had the constitutional right to purchase and pay for Louisiana and the Floridas out of the proceeds of the public lands, they will then show that Congress can dispose of the public money according to their will and pleasure. These honorable Senators must excuse me for not attempting to show the power and the right to purchase Louisiana and the Floridas; I respectfully decline all argument on that subject. I will not attempt to prove that three sovereign and independent States are constitutionally among us; I will not offend the people of these States by an argument to prove that they are properly a part and portion of this Confedracy; I will not insult six honorable Senators by an effort to show that they are rightfully members of this honorable body. I feel astonished that the honorable member from Mississippi [Mr. HENDERSON] should join in this inquiry and suggestion: he and his State stand closely allied and connected with the subject of this inquiry. His State was also purchased, and so was Alabama, by the General Government. The only difference is this: that Louisiana, Arkansas, and Missouri, were purchased from a foreign Government; his State, and the State of Alabama, were purchased from Georgia, one of the States of the Union. He ought, therefore, to be careful how he raises questions of this sort, and asks for discussions upon them. For my part, I go upon the decision of the Government of my country; it has settled these questions long since, and being no agitator, I will not agitate them here.

I am at a loss to know why it is that this report has been treated with more severity than usual. It has cost the gentlemen on the other side of the Senate no labor: if any reputation is to be lost, it will fall upon its author, and the committee who approved it. It may, however, be that a favorite scheme or plan of operations is broken in upon, and defeated by it. I have lately seen in the National Intelligencer statistical tables, showing how much the States of Virginia and Maryland, and the different counties in each of these States, would receive under the distribution land bill; but, at the same time, not one word was said in that print, showing the effects that would be produced by such a distribution. Now this report fully and clearly, in my opinion, demonstrates not only the injustice, the inexpediency, and the unconstitutionality of the assumption of the State debts, but that if the cupidity of the honest, independent, and high-minded people of this country is to be appealed to (which was evidently the design of these publications,) even then the distribution of the land revenue would increase, instead of lighten, the burdens of the community.

The Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] in his commentaries on the report, asserts that we are for an exclusive metallic currency; and that we are making war upon the banks. I have already endeavored to show that in both these particulars, such accusations are unfounded. It is true we would, if we could, make banks honest; but the power to do so rests only with the States; they have created them, and they alone can regulate and control them. The same Senator asks what difference there is between borrowing money from the lords of England, and borrowing it from our own citizens? a dollar is a dollar, no matter where it comes from? To my mind the difference is very palpable. If money be borrowed from our own citizens, the annual interest remains in this country; it is still among us, and constitutes a part of the nation's wealth; but if it be borrowed in Europe, and the interest be annually sent to the foreign capitalists who loaned it, then the wealth of this country is diminished to that amount. If two hundred millions of State bonds be held by foreign capitalists, it will take ten millions of dollars annually, at five per cent. to pay the interest. And this drain is constantly made, year by year, from the productive industry of this country; in short, it is a tax upon the labor of the people of the United States, amounting to one-tenth of all their surplus productions. This I view as a very serious evil, and one that ought not to be encouraged or promoted.

Mr. President, I have learned from the newspapers, and with regret, that in another body, the subject of the Presidential election was brought into discussion. I did hope and expect that we, at least, should hear nothing of it in this honorable body; but I have been mistaken. It has been introduced here; and the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] though he disclaims the character of a prophet, has ventured to predict, that the days of the present dominant party are numbered. I have often heard the same thing said before, but the prophecy has as often failed; and I have no doubt it will fail again.

This shows how equally happiness is distributed among men in this life. The Whigs, as they call themselves, are always victorious before the battle; the Republicans are so, when the battle comes; and from this time until November, we shall hear much of carousals, marching and countermarching, with banners displayed, throughout our country. They are happy in anticipation of success; the Republicans are so in actual success. Sir, the Whigs constitute the most hoping and hopeful party that ever existed in any country. They may well appropriate to their own use the idea, if not the language, of the poet:

> "Hope springs eternal in the Whig'sh breast;
> Whigs never are, but always to be, blest.'

But the same honorable Senator tells us that he sees a light rising in the West, which inspires him with hope. Sir, my dull optics have not seen that light of which he speaks; and if the honorable Senator will look, some time hence, he will discover that he has mistaken for a substantial luminary, a small transient meteor, which has exploded and left no trace behind. But I have seen a light arise in the West; and so brilliant was it, that it dimmed and obscured all the lesser lights around it; it ascended higher and higher, until it reached the meridian; there it remained stationary for a time; so effulgent was it, that it irradiated this whole continent; its rays crossed the Atlantic, and penetrated the courts and palaces of kings, and influenced their councils; it was seen and felt wherever civilized man dwelt. But that light is fast descending in the West; it has almost reached the horizon, and will soon be beyond the sight of mortals. Mr. President, you and I shall never see its like again; we are too old. Such lights do not visit our earth but at rare and long intervals. I need not say to the Senate, or to this audience, that the individual I have described, under the figure introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, is Andrew Jackson, the pride and glory of our country. When impartial history shall have faithfully performed its office, the aged men of after times will point him out to their children as a man to be imitated, but not be equalled.

I will now proceed to answer some of the remarks made by the Senator from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE.] He says, this land was surrendered for the benefit of all the States—therefore the proceeds may be distributed to all. But this land was surrendered to the Confederacy of States, not to the States separately and individually. The right to impose duties on imports belonged to each State, within its own territory. This right was surrendered to the Federal Government; and the States could now claim, with the same propriety and reason, a distribution of the moneys arising from imposts, and the claim would be as well founded as that which is now asserted with respect to the public lands.

That gentleman says that the debt of the State of New York is over-estimated by the committee; and this he attempts to prove, by saying that the State has a fund set apart to discharge a portion of her debt, and good and sufficient security for another part of it. This is a novel mode of proving that a debt does not exist: the gentleman's statement only goes to show that means of payment are provided—not that the debt does not exist. If you, Mr. President, have my note for a thousand dollars, and I have money to the same amount locked up in my desk, with which I mean to discharge my obligation, am I not still indebted to you for a thousand dollars until I shall pay you? The Senator mistakes ability to pay for non-indebtedness.

I regret that he has made it necessary for me to reply to some other remarks in which he has indulged. When he left us and joined the Opposition, I certainly never intended to reproach him for it. My impression was, that "he went out from among us because he was not of us" I felt neither mortification nor ill-will; and why that Senator should use the language towards me which I shall presently notice, is altogether unaccountable. I cannot participate with him in his denunciations of the present Chief Magistrate. I know too well the manner in which that officer discharges his public duties; that he has talents of the first order even his enemies admit—that he faithfully and industriously employs them to promote what he believes to be the best interests of the country I know. In all his intercourse with foreign nations, I have seen him careful and vigilant in guarding the national character, interest, and honor. In administering our internal affairs, the best energies of his mind have been constantly directed to the prosperity of our whole country. That he should be entirely free from error could not be expected, but that he intends all his measures for the general welfare, I confidently believe and affirm.

The Senator commenced his remarks by saying, in application to myself, that this was all a Quixotic proceeding. This comparison and remark has been so often used by every body that it has lost all its point, and its repetition has ceased to be the evidence of talent or genius. He says I have come into the Senate with two commissions. That is true, so far as relates to my declining to accept the first commission, and obtaining a second, upon a second election. But, what is there in this to disturb the Senator from New York? It cost him neither labor nor trouble; that fell upon myself and friends. I had constitutional scruples as to the propriety of my taking a seat under the first election; I resigned, and was re-elected. Even if I were mistaken, such respect was due, I think, to my own views, as to have precluded a reference to it here; and such has been the course of every member of the Senate (although I know some of them entertain an opinion different from mine,) until the Senator from New York took his seat among us. Those who scruple at nothing may reproach those who entertain scruples; those who feel them seldom will. I will state my views a little more at large upon this subject. I place but little value on a commission, except so far as it is evidence of what had preceded it, that is, the favorable opinion of my countrymen —that I highly prize. I will tell that honorable Senator how I obtained my first commission; the second was only a matter of course. It was not by solicitation; no expression of a desire to be elected had escaped me. No, sir, I did not traverse the State and make speeches denouncing my old friends; I formed no new political alliances; it was not the effect of a new-born zeal displayed in behalf of my ancient political enemies. I am here upon the free, unsought suffrages of my old political friends and associates. I will neither deny nor disguise the high gratification I experienced on my late visit to Tennessee, where I only remained a few days. When the old grayheaded men, who had stood by me for upward of thirty years, approached me, with joy glistening in their eyes, and, taking me by both hands, congratulated me upon my restoration to this honorable body; and when the young met me, in like manner, and talked of their father's friendship and mine: Oh! sir, in this there was a luxury of feeling which I would not exchange for all the huzzas and plaudits which a renegade ever received from ten thousand tongues of his old enemies, now converted into friends.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] and myself, the other day, expressed an opinion against an exclusive metallic currency. How were we treated by the Senator from New York? But I will first remind him that I have been a long time in public life, and, in the estimation of my friends, must have "rendered the State some service," or I should not have been continued until this period; and I submit to all candid and reflecting men, whether the language used by the Senator from New York can find a justification. What is that language? He says he has no doubt that at present we entertain the opinions which we express. "But a few lashes from the coachman (the President meaning) will put us in the traces." I would inquire whether this is a quotation from Shakspeare, as the Senator, the other day, said of the expression, "Ingratitude more strong than traitor's arms," when applied to the President of the United States. I presume this is no quotation from Shakspeare. That great judge of human nature never put into the mouths of his lowest characters such language in application to the Chief Magistrate of a free people and the representatives of sovereign States But were it a quotation—can he who uses a dagger excuse himself by the pretext that he has borrowed it from another? Whether the Senator from New York speaks from experience, as to the application of the Presidential lash, I know not. For any thing I know, he may have been so severely lashed as to make him break entirely loose from the coach. In that case, the danger is that he may be so maddened with rage as to injure himself. I recollect an occurrence which took place in Virginia some five or six years ago. I was travelling in the mail coach; we had stopped in a village late at night, and set out very early in the morning, and were to travel about twenty miles to another village to breakfast. We travel on very quietly and safely until we reached the half-way house, where an exchange of coachman and horses took place. So soon as we set out from there, one of the lead horses became very restiff and fractious; the coachman applied the lash with great severity; the horse became more furious, and at last broke loose from the coach, taking with him a part of what are now called "lead bars," but which, when you and I were young, Mr. President, and more conversant with such things than we are now, were called "swingle trees;" the coach was a very fine one and remained uninjured. We sent back to the half-way house, procured another horse, and moved on very safely to the breakfast stand. But before we reached that place what do you think we saw? The horse that had broken loose from the coach had broken his neck, and was lying dead by the wayside. I lectured the coachman for exposing the lives of passengers by running such a refractory and unmanageable horse in his coach. He excused himself by declaring that he was an old stage horse, and worked as quietly and safely for several years as any horse that ever wore harness—that it was only within a few weeks past he had become restiff and unruly—that the change was altogether unaccountable—but one thing was certain, he would do no more mischief.

I think I now see, by what is said by that Senator, why it is that the present Chief Magistrate has ceased to be as great a favorite in New York as he was formerly. Views are ascribed to him which he never entertained. His opinions are proved upon him by expressions which the Senator attributes to certain people in the city of New York, whom he calls Loco Focos; and this is the kind of logic by which he establishes his facts. The Loco Focos had resolved that all banks should be put down; they afterward voted for Mr. Van Buren; therefore the conclusion drawn the by Senator is that the President is in favor of putting down all banks. Or the Senator supposes that this might have been in consequence of some private assurance given by the President. That such assurance was given is only conjecture; there is no evidence of it; whereas we have the opinions of the President explicitly declared in his public and official acts.

The Senator concluded his remarks with a shout for the hero of Tippecanoe. This we shall constantly hear until late in the coming autumn; but when November comes—that gloomy month, when Englishmen cut their throats, and Whigs lose all their anticipated triumphs—then it will be a short tale, easily told; then all their joy will be changed into disappointment and grief: nor will any poet be needed to celebrate the deeds of their hero. By a small change of names, it has already been done by one of the best British poets:

"'Charge! Crittenden, charge! on! Tallmadge, on!'
Were the last words of Harrison."

Yes, sir, thus will end the political life of the hero, recently adopted as the leader of the Opposition physically, I hope he will live long to enjoy the emoluments of the respectable and profitable office he now fills, and to occupy that splendid mansion (not a log cabin) which he now inhabits. This will suit him better than the toils and troubles of a high political station, and, for the country, it will be far better.

I have finished the remarks I intended to make. Not on my own account, but for my country, I should regret exceedingly to see any other disposition made of these resolutions than their adoption. I do not mean that I should regret a modification in any form, provided the subject and objects be retained; that is all about which I feel any solicitude. I thank the Senate for the patient and continued attention with which I have been heard in defence of the report and the resolutions which, by order of the special committee, I presented to the consideration of this honorable body.

REMARKS OF MR. CRABB, OF ALABAMA.

In the House of Representatives Friday, December 27, 1839—On motion to reconsider the vote of the House concurring in the resolution of the Senate proposing the appointment of Chaplains.

Mr. CRABB said that he could not have anticipated, when he made the motion to reconsider the resolution from the Senate proposing the appointment of Chaplains for that body and the House that it would give rise to so much discussion. He had made the motion to reconsider, not because he was opposed to the appointment of Chaplains; on the contrary, he fully approved the object of the resolution from the Senate, but he had done so at the request of his colleague, [Mr. LEWIS,] who had himself submitted the same motion for the accommodation of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. COOPER,] but, not having voted in the majority, was pronounced by the Chair incapable to submit such a motion in the present case. But, although he could not have forseen the consequences of his motion, and although it was the result, as far as he himself entertained any feeling on the subject, of that courtesy which he hoped ever to be inclined to extend to any gentleman on that floor, he could not say, with other gentlemen, that he regretted the motion had been made. No, sir, (said Mr. C.) there is much reason to be pleased that the question has come up. The resolution had passed silently through the House, and could be looked upon by the country as a mere compliance with precedent and form; there was nothing of substance in its adoption. But now it had, by the course pursued by him, given rise to a most interesting discussion—one that does high honor to both the hearts and heads of the participants in the debate; and therefore, instead of being deterred, had he foreseen what had transpired, it would have furnished him an additional motive for submitting his motion. If there was a majority in the House, or indeed, he would say, if there was a single individual, opposed to the adoption of the resolution, he, for one, desired to see an opportunity afforded for a plain manifestation of that opposition; if, on the other hand, there was, as he believed there was, a majority favorable to the resolution, that majority would record its judgment in a manner satisfactory to itself and obvious to the country. His motion, therefore, had had the effect of dispelling the mere form of the matter, and of giving solidity and substance to it, and, in addition to that, of drawing forth the opinions of honorable gentlemen in a most interesting and pleasurable discussion. He deemed it due to himself to say that, when he submitted the motion, he did not know the precise object of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. COOPER,] for whose accommodation he had acted. He knew not but that gentleman desired to submit some salutary modification of the Senate's resolution. It might have been that he desired to provide against compensation to the Chaplains to be elected, thereby to conform the aspirations of candidates for those offices more nearly to the true spirit of that religion they profess to teach, which should ever be dispensed in the manner of its glorious Founder, "without money and without price." This, [said Mr. C.] he preceived from the emotions around him, was thought by gentleman to beimpracticable; but he begged to differ in opinion, as he surely did, from gentlemen on this point. He had known it done elsewhere, and believed there were in the city of Washington pious ministers enough who would willingly take the labor on themselves, without pay or the hope of pecuniary reward from the Government.

This course Mr. C. said he would favor if he saw any disposition to sustain him in it; but if the object could not be effected in that way, he was nevertheless in favor of the appointment of chaplains to that body. The course he had suggested would doubtless obviate several objections urged to the resolution. One was the constitutional objection of the gentleman from Georgia, that this House possessed no power to appropriate money to compensate for such services as are performed by chaplains. He ventured to assert, also, that if his suggestion were acted on, it would remove one of the objections of his friend from Louisiana, [Mr. GARLAND.] In that event, there would be no party aspirants seeking for the office of chaplain for the sake of the salary, but they would have clergymen officiating there in that holy office under the impulses alone of a pure spirit of Christianity.

Mr. C. said that it was true the present time was a very appropiate period of the year for every one to retrospect his life, and to make confession of the evil deeds done in the body; and, did he deem the present place a proper one for such an exposure, he doubted not he should have as great a weight of sin to confess and ask pardon for as any other member on that floor. But, believing that that was not a fit occasion for such a purpose, he should postpone it to a more convenient place, if not, like all other sinners, to "a more convenient season."

The gentleman trom Virginia [Mr. WISE] had spoken of the good effects of prayer in that Hall at the commencement of each daily round of business. He [Mr. C.] corroborated that gentleman's experience, and added his own testimony to support the assertion. The House, it was said, had grown no better of late years, and therefore it was inferred that chaplains were of no service. The consequence attempted to be deduced is not a legitimate inference from the premises. The House may have grown worse, year after year, and day after day, but not in consequence of its having a chaplain, but rather, it might seem, in spite of its chaplain, and of all that his best appeals to Heaven could effect.

Sir, it cannot be that this House will subvert at this day the ancient and well-founded custom of electing for itself a chaplain. It is not to be believed that there is even a large portion of the members in favor or such an abrogation of the good example of all our predecessors; for, although it is, perhaps, too true as to most of the Representatives here that they are sinners, which it is acknowledged is the case with the one now speaking, yet it is equally true, in the language of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] as applied to himself, that although we feel that we are vile sinners, yet we deny that we are not Christians.

In conclusion, (said Mr. C.) as all the advantages of my motion have been enjoyed, except a'one the vote thereon, and as it is not at all probable there is a majority of the House favorable to a reconsideration, and as he was not himself in favor of the reconsideration, he would at that time ask the permission of the House to withdraw it, unless some gentleman desired to record his vote against the resolution from the Senate.

DEFERRED DEBATE.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, February 25, 1840.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York, adverse to the Independent Treasury bill, &c.

Mr. T. went at much length into an examination of the policy of the Administration, and the course of the Executive in relation to the Sub-Treasury bill. When in was first broached in the President's message, in 1837, it was the whole subject of the message, and in the success of this single measure was involved the success of all the measures of his Administration. He brought forward no other proposition, and it was soon made known that those who could not support this Sub-Treasury bill could not support his re-election. He (Mr. T.) was in a peculiar and trying situation. It was the first question of moment with which he had differed with the President and the supporters of his Administration. The issue was made, and the people of New York decided against the policy of the Administration. This was not deemed conclusive, and they had again, in 1838, and yet again, in 1839, pronounced their condemnation of it. They had thus passed three several times on the policy of the Executive, and, after all these decisions, his colleague, [Mr. WRIGHT,] who was the sole representative of that State on the floor of the Senate when the Independent Treasury bill was before them, had voted for its passage. Had he (Mr. T.) been similarly situated, he would have felt it his duty to have regarded the expressions of public sentiment, and have acted differently. That his colleague was the only representative of his State for so long a period, was not his (Mr. T's) fault. The political friends of his colleague had prevented an election at the last session of the Legislature. At the present it was known that a majority in both branches were opposed to the Sub-Treasury bill, and of course it was known that they would send a Senator here who would represent their sentiments and those of the people of State on this subject. He regretted that under these circumstances the bill should have been hurried through this body before the State of New York had an opportunity of being heard. He saw by the newspapers how it had been hurried through on the last evening, and when the Senator from Maryland, at a late hour in the afternoon, requested the Senate to adjourn, the usual courtesy on such occasions was denied him. He thought that such a refusal, under such circumstances, was unprecedented, in the annals of the Senate.

Mr. BENTON said the Senator was mistaken; there had been similar refusals, and under much less excusable circumstances. During the Bank panic, when the Opposition had the majority in that chamber, they attempted to break him down by physical exhaustion; and to prevent it he was compelled to resort to the use of expedients, and this was done in a sultry day in June.

Mr. TALLMADGE. This occured before his time, and was probably during the exciting debates on the removal of the deposites; but he repeated, that under the circumstances, he regretted that the bill was passed so precipitately. His colleague was chairman of the committee who had the bill in charge, and had he requested some delay on the bill, it would have been granted, and he would not have been thought chargeable with a seeming want of courtesy. His colleague was aware of his election, and should he not have waited for his arrival here, so that his Legislature and State should have had an opportunity of being heard on the bill? Though these resolutions might not have been passed at that period, it was perfectly well known they would pass, and this, it might have been expected, would have had some influence on his colleague's course, and if he had not waited for his (Mr. T's) arrival, he might at least have waited for the expression of the sentiment of the Legislature of his State, especially as his colleague professes to be of that school of politicians who recognise the right of instruction. These resolutions explain the objections to the Sub-Tteasury: they oppose it because its effect will be to produce two currencies in the country—one appreciated, and the other depreciated. The better currency of gold and silver coin will be for the officers of the Government, and the baser, of depreciated bank paper, will be for the people. Add to this the doctrines recently put forth by those in the confidence of the Executive—that it is the policy of this Administration to bring down the wages of labor in this country to a level with that received by the paupers of Europe—and it will be seen there is just cause of alarm to the friends of our free institutions.

Mr. WRIGHT said he should not have felt called upon to participate in this debate at all, had not the remarks of his colleague, in relation to the passage of the Independent Treasury bill in this body, been made personal in their application to himself; but as they had been so made, it was necessary that he should make a more minute statement of the facts, and of his own course, in relation to the action of the Senate upon that measure, than he had done upon a former occasion, when called out from the same quarter.

Preliminarily, however, he was bound to confess, though he did not pretend to be very well schooled in questions of courtesy, it did appear to his mind as somewhat singular that he should be arraigned for want of courtesy as a Senator, by one who was not, at the time the transaction complained of occurred, either present, or a member of the body. The Senate, as then constituted, was the tribunal to which he was properly, as he was willingly, responsible for the propriety or impropriety of his conduct upon that and all other occasions, when he acted here. Those who were then Senators, and were present, saw and heard, and could judge. Upon their judgments he was willing to rest the matter. To them, and to them only, was he amenable for his course: and he would now tell his colleague, as he had told him upon a former occasion, that he would not discuss, on this floor, with him or any other man, the propriety of his acts within these walls, touching any matter transacted here when the complainant was not a member of the Senate. This, he hoped, would end this matter between him and his colleague here. If the gentleman chose to discuss this, or any other topic, touching his course and conduct, elsewhere, he was at liberty to do so. The choice of the time, place, and manner, were open to him. Elsewhere, he might have rights in the matter, and he presumed he would know how to exercise them wisely; but here, he could have none.

As, however, his course upon the occasions alluded to had been characterized as "precipitate and wanting in courtesy," it was due to himself, and to those who constituted the Senate at that time, that he should detail somewhat minutely the facts in relation to the action of the body upon the Independent Treasury bill, during the present session, that his constituents and the country might know with how much propriety this charge had been preferred. For this purpose he would ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments.

The Senate met and was organized on the 2d day of December last. Through the kindness of the honorable Senator who then occupied the President's chair, and the indulgence of the Senate, he had been honored with the same place upon the standing committees of the body which he had occupied for several previous sessions, bestowed upon him, as the then presiding officer could testify, without solicitation from himself. This necessarily placed before the committee of which he was a member the reference of that part of the annual message of the President which related to the finances of the country, and consequently which related to the Independent Treasury bill. Thus situated, if it had been his object to escape the influence of the powerful talents of his colleague in opposition to the measure, the charge should have been that he was dilatory, and not "precipitate;" for it was not until the 6th day of January, more than a month after the meeting of the Senate, that the bill was reported from the committee. On the following day, the 7th of January, the Legislature of his State was to assemble, and he could not fail to know that among their first acts would be the election of a Senator.

By the direction of the committee, it became his duty to report the bill; and by the same direction, he gave notice that its consideration would be moved on that day week. The day arrived, the 13th of January, and passed, and on the 14th the bill was called up. Some discussion was had in reference to a postponement for two weeks to give time for absent Senators to arrive, and for vacancies to be filled, and reference was made to the vacancy existing from his own State. He informed the Senate that his action, thus far, had been under the order of the committee; that having discharged their order, he now cheerfully submitted the whole matter to the disposition of the Senate; that it would give him pleasure to have a colleague here before the bill should be finally acted upon, and that he should now be in the daily expectation of the news of an election and of the arrival of the person appointed to take his seat in the body; that he did not consider it proper for him to urge any course upon the Senate; nor should he, any farther than to give his individual vote upon the question of postponement. This course on his part called forth, at the time, expressions of approbation from a distinguished Senator of the Opposition, [Mr. CLAY of Kentucky,] not now in his seat. The bill was under the consideration of the Senate daily, from the 14th to the 17th of January, when the question upon its engrossment was taken. This was Friday of the week, and after the question was declared, he, in violation of the wishes and feelings of a large portion of his friends, moved that when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday, instead of Saturday, thus deferring the question upon the final passage of the bill to the following week. The motion prevailed. He entertained not a single doubt then that he should have a colleague present by the Monday to which the Senate stood adjourned.

The Monday came, but not his colleague. The bill was again taken up, and the discussion upon its final passage was continued from day to day, until Thursday, the 23d of January, when the question was taken, and the bill passed. On that day an effort was made to adjourn the Senate to give further time for the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] to discuss the bill; and when the question was taken upon the motion to adjourn, he purposely left his seat, and did not vote.

Now, as to his conduct towards his colleague, who had chosen to make himself the author of these charges of "precipitancy" and "want of courtesy." On the evening of Saturday, the 25th of January, two days after the bill in question had finally passed the Senate, the mail from the North brought him a letter, dated at the Astor House, in the city of New York, on the 23d, the day on which the final question upon the bill was taken here, signed by his colleague, giving the information that he was detained in New York by ill health, (that being the first information of that character which had reached Mr. W.) and requesting that the final question upon this bill might be postponed to await his arrival, which would be on the Monday after. But a few moments had elapsed, after the letter reached his hands, when he was informed that the same train of cars which brought the letter, brought also his colleague to the city.

Upon this state of facts, well known to the Senator by a former explanation here, he rises in his place and again makes the charge of "precipitancy and want of courtesy." To such a charge, under such circumstances, and coming from such a quarter, he had no reply to make.

His statement of facts had been made to justify himself to his constituents and the country; it had been made to those who were Senators when the transactions took place, and could judge of the accuracy of his account of the matter. To his colleague he owed neither explanation, nor reply, to this repetition of such a charge.

It would be seen that some time had been allowed, after the meeting of the New York Legislature, and before the final action of the Senate upon the bill in question, for the filling of that vacancy, and the arrival of the elected Senator to take his place in the body.

He would leave to his colleague the duty of informing the Senate and the country at what time his election had taken place; at what time the notice of the fact had reached him; what time was occupied by him in travelling from the place of his residence to the city of New York; what number of days ill health had confined him there; and all the other facts, which would account to their common constituents for his late arrival to take his seat in the Senate. He had not taken the pains to make inquiries into these facts, nor were they such as it became him to enlighten the Senate about. He did not doubt the ability of his colleague to give the information, which seemed to be called for before he should become an accuser of others; but it was at his option to give the information, or to withhold it. To him (Mr. W.) neither course had any importance, nor had he any desire upon the subject. The facts were within the reach of those to whom they owed a common responsibility; and they would make up no judgment upon either side, without giving them their true weight and consideration.

He had no disposition to follow his colleague into the discussion of the Independent Treasury bill upon this occasion. The subject was not new to either, and the views of both were fully known to their common constituents. He has further thought it proper to discuss again most of the subjects upon which we have differed since we became members together of this body. He (Mr. W.) would not follow him in this review. He had been, and continued to be, content with their first discussions, and would rest himself upon them.

His colleague has said, with some apparent feeling and triumph, that he, Mr. W. had, upon those occasions, proposed to refer their differences to their constituents, and not make them the subjects of debate and irritation here. He had done so; and he certainly had not regretted the reference. It was one which his duty, not less than his feelings, prompted him to make, and it was made to those who would take cognizance of them without their consent.

The Senator said their constituents had decided, thrice decided. Be it so. He had not questioned the assertion, nor was he to do so upon this occasion. He had not claimed to stand with the majority in his State, nor had he manifested any disposition, nor did he entertain any wish, to dispute the standing of his colleague in that particular. He felt no ambition to change places, or positions. He said now, as he had said before, leave our public acts to the determination of those common constituents, and not undertake to settle them here.

His colleague seemed to manifest peculiar anxiety to learn whether he would obey instructions from the Legislature of the State; a doctrine, he said, which originated in the school to which he, Mr. W. belonged. He was free to avow the doctrine of instructions as belonging to his school, but the present remarks of his colleague were the first intimation he had received that he too did not belong to that same school, upon this point at least. He was sorry to be compelled to infer that here again a difference was to grow up between them, as it seemed to threaten an entire separation in principle as well as practice.

He was aware that this answer had not exactly reached the object of his colleague, and that he desired him to speak particularly of the resolutions of their Legislature now before the Senate. This it was not his purpose to do at present, and the only relief he could give him now, was to inform him that when legislative instructions should call for it, he should be ready to act promptly and decisively.

Mr. TAPPAN said that the Senate had been repeatedly charged with precipitation and want of courtesy in relation to the passage of the Independent Treasury bill. He would not have thought these charges worthy of notice if they had only been made by those who were not members of this body when the bill passed; but as the same impression had been attempted to be made by others, he would briefly state the facts as they actually occurred. On the Thursday that the bill passed, after the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HENDERSON] had spoken in opposition to the bill, and delivered an elaborate argument in favor of a United States Bank, I observed, said Mr. T. "that the Senate seemed tired of the debate; that I had intended to speak on that subject, and had made some preparation for that purpose, but was not prepared then to address the Senate; and from the little attention paid to the labored argument of the Senator from Mississippi, I should conclude that the Senate did not desire to hear any more speaking, but would prefer to take the question that evening. I said that it was my own opinion that we had spent time enough on the bill, and that we ought then to proceed to a final vote upon it; but if the Senate thought otherwise, and the debate was to be continued, I would, on to-morrow, take occasion to submit my views; that at present I would give way to any gentleman who desired then to address the Senate." The Senator from Maryland then took the floor, and after making a few remarks, moved an adjournment, which was not agreed to. He then proceeded to make a very strong speech against the bill, and when he had spoken long enough for a reasonable sized speech, he gave way, and the member from Indiana made a motion to adjourn. This was also negatived, and the Senator from Maryland then proceeded until he had finished his remarks. After him, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] addressed the Senate with much ingenuity in opposition to the bill, and when he had concluded, no other gentleman seeming desirous to speak on the subject, the bill was passed.

As to the remark of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. MERRICK,] which was published several days since, and not disavowed by him, that he [Mr. T.] declined to address the Senate at all on the subject, he must say, without supposing it other than a mistake in the Senator, it was not true. He made no such declaration. But the Senator from New York seems to think that his State is the whole Union, and that the Senate should lay by, and not presume to transact any important business, until the State of New York was fully represented here. Now, he was as willing as any Senator to admit the claim of that great State to be treated with all proper respect; but if both her Senators were not here to participate in the transaction of the business of the nation with the Representatives of the 25 other independent States, it not the fault of this body, and he saw no reason why the business of this great Confederacy should be delayed on that account. But the Senator says "he has been in a peculiar and trying situation." Has he indeed been in a "peculiar and trying situation?" and, for that reason, could not get here sooner? What brought him into that situation? What was its peculiarity? What was its trying nature? He has not told us; on that we are left to conjecture. But the Senator's course has not been hidden from public view—it has been open to the world. Did the Senator suspect he could go through a complete transformation, and be insensible to the change? Why, sir, we are so constituted that we cannot choose but feel, and feel deeply, all great revolutions in our circumstances. If a man, with an apparent zeal and honesty, advocates any cause for a series of years, so as to make himself not only conspicuous among the advocates, of that cause, but one of the most honored, distinguished, and trusted of those advocates; if in this way he identifies himself with a great party, with the majority of his countrymen, and then, without any reason, or for reasons common sense scouts as frivolous and unmeaning, he abandons (I will not say his priciples, for such men have no principles) his party connections, all those he had professed to love and honor, joins his and their former enemies, and is the loudest and most unprincipled calumniator of his former associates, do you think he can do all this, without feeling that he has placed himself "in a peculiar and trying situation? No, sir, no; human nature is much the same in all; we are so constituted that we cannot decend from a life of honor and virtue to acts of base turpitude and wickedness, without feeling ourselves in "a peculiar and trying situation." Do you think, sir, that Benedict Arnold did not find himself in "a peculiar and trying situation," when he resolved to betray his country, to abandon his high and honorable station, as the gallant soldier of liberty, and sink into utter infamy? Undoubtedly he did; and although he burned and plundered the villages and towns of his countrymen with savage ferocity, to ingratiate himself with his new friends, if you could have heard the voice of his conscience, it would have told you that he found himself in "a peculiar and trying situation."

When, sir, a public man steers his course by the polar star of principle, he may be misunderstood; he may be misrepresented; he may lose his popularity; but he does not lose his honor, his self-possession and dignity. If public favor is withdrawn from him, he retires to private life, and enjoys the calm and peace of a mind at ease, and conscious of rectitude; he is not reaching out his "itching palm," and whining about his "peculiar and trying situation."

And if, indeed, the Senator has chosen to place himself in so very peculiar and trying a situation, it gives him no authority to misrepresent the motives or actions of those with whom he had been associated, although it may entitle him to the pity of all men of honor and integrity.

Mr. MERRICK said that the Senator from Ohio, in the course of his remarks, had said that a particular statement in his (Mr. M's) published speech "was not true." He wished to inquire of the Senator whether, by this remark, he intended to charge him with an intention to misrepresent facts.

Mr TAPPAN said that he was a plain spoken man, and would say, with Martin Luther, that "he generally called a spade a spade;" but he did not say, or suppose, that the Senator intentionally misrepresented the facts: he only spoke of them as they were.

Mr. MERRICK then gave a brief history of the events previous to the passage of the bill. Having stated that it was half after five o'clock when he moved the adjournment.

Mr. TAPPAN said the Senator was mistaken in the hour; it was about a quarter past three o'clock.

Several Senators said that was about the time.

Mr. TALLMADGE appealed to the Senate, whether he had not, in all his intercourse with members, treated them with the courtesy which gentlemen owed to each other, and to the station they occupied. He was not in the habit of using harsh words there or elsewhere. He had no complaint to make of his colleague on this score. He would say that, as far as parliamentary and individual courtesy were concernee, no man carried it further than his colleague. It was his uniform manner, and he cheerfully awarded this to him But, said Mr. T. my colleague has misapprehended me if he understood me as saying that he belonged to a school which avowed the doctrine of instruction, while I belonged to a different school. I said no such thing. But when we see Senators, who are professedly great admirers of the right of instruction, quibbling for want of a technical word, our confidence in the doctrine was a good deal shaken. He did not say his colleague would do this, but there had been instances of it in the Senate. If I received instructions, I would at once carry out the wishes of my State, or give her an opportunity of filling my place with another who would represent her truly.

He was sorry that the Senator from Ohio had thought it his duty to intermeddle in this family affair; and he would leave it to the Senate whether it was done with parliamentary or individual courtesy. The term traitor had been applied to him by political slang-whangers, but he did not expect to hear it from one who had sufficient respectability of character to obtain a seat on this floor. Traitor to what? To principle? No: a traitor to party. And for a difference in political sentiment, am I to be branded as a traitor? to be compared to Arnold? The Senator talks of what he knows nothing about, and reminds me of a certain British lord's puppy, who did not get his eyes open until he was about to be drowned. But the Senator is the very personification of Loco Focoism. He professes to be one of the Simon Pures of that school. He also professes another principle, which is a very natural one for a Loco Foco. I have seen it stated in the newspapers, that when the news of the Southampton insurrection reached Ohio, the Senator expressed his willingness to furnish powder and ball to the negroes. This feeling was only carrying out the destructive doctrines of Loco Focoism. He represents me as saying that New York is the whole Union, and that all legislation must stop until she is fully represented. I said no such thing, and pronounce it a misrepresentation—unintentional no doubt. It is likely if that Senator had his way, one Senator would be thought sufficient for New York, provided he be always right. He would not follow the example of the Senator from Ohio, and invade her territory: there is one there already who is used to repel invaders, and he will take care of the gentleman. He calls me a traitor. If I am a traitor, then are the people of New York, whose representative I am, a traitor. Let him come within her borders and say this to her sons, and they will treat him with the scorn and contempt he deserves.

Mr. HENDERSON rose to a point of order. He would inquire of the CHAIR whether he considered the course of remarks now indulged in as being within the rules of order.

The CHAIR stated that he had avoided any interference, because he trusted to the Senate to preserve its own dignity and the order of the body. He relied on the sense of honor and decorum of the Senators to treat each other with that respect and courtesy which is alike due to each other as gentlemen and the station they occupied. Since the Senator from Mississippi, however, had raised the point of order, he would say that he considered the remarks of the Senator from New York as transcending the limits of parliamentary courtesy. He regretted to be compelled to say this, but it was a duty imposed upon him by the position he held as the presiding officer of the body, and when he knew his duty he could discharge it.

Mr. TALLMADGE approved of the sentiments of the Chair, and would endeavor to observe his injunctions. All he had said was to repel the rude attack of the Senator from Ohio. Mr. T. then went into a history of his difference with the President on the Sub-Treasury bill. He said his course in relation to that bill was taken by the advice and sanction of the highest political authority in his State; but since that time, these very men who urged him to the course, had denounced him as a deserter.

Mr TAPPAN. The Senator from New York charges me with "interfering between him and his colleague;" with "invading his State," with meddling with new York politics. The Senator rose in his place and uttered a long and rambling speech, in which he censured his colleague, and in no very moderate terms charged the majority of this Senate with having passed the Independent Treasury Bill precipitately, and with the dishonest purpose of preventing him from recording his vote against it. Was I to sit here, sir, a silent listener to his foul slanders of the majority of this body, with which I had acted? Are we bound to submit to all manner of contumely and reproach? No, sir, no; the Senator shall exercise no such privilege here without the rebuke he merits. I interfered not between him and his colleague; I invaded not his State; I meddled not with New York politics: but I informed the Senator that there were other States in this Union than New York, and other Senators here whose rights were to be regarded, besides him whom his file leader pronounced fresh from the people.

But the Senator complains that I apply "odious epithets to him." I have applied no epithets: I have supposed what might have been the cause of his finding himself in so "very peculiar and trying a situation" as he confessed he had been in for some time past. I did not say that his conduct and character were paralleled by the conduct and character of Benedict Arnold. It is the Senator's own conscience which adopts this parallel: it is he that makes the hypothetical case his own The Senator says he is always courteous in debate. What are his ideas of courtesy? He has made several speeches here since he took his seat; and what were they? The most low and vulgar abuse of all his old friends and associates, a tirade of newspaper slang and pot-house vituperation, with frequent and most complacent reference to "his speech"—a speech, when and where delivered, I neither know nor wish to know; but I can tell the Senator this: I never heard of "his speech" before, and, if it is as vulgar and abusive as the speeches he delivers here, he would do well to let it pass into oblivion without awakening a recollection of it, which can do him no honor. "Courteous in debate!" I submit to no such courtesy. In my life, sir, I have never heard any man speak in public who was more abusive, more calumnious, more careless, in his assertions; he must become courteous himself before he claims to be treated with courtesy by others. The Senator calls himself a Democratic Whig, and says I am a Loco Foco. I am indifferent what he calls me; my enemies cannot change my name; near fifty years I have belonged to a party devoted to the support of sound Democratic principles. We were called Democrats by way of reproach. What was intended as a stigma, we adhered to us an honor; we cherish the name; it designates principles. We do not change our name annually as the serpent changes his skin. I am a Democrat, simply and purely; not, thank God, a Democratic Whig, nor a Whig Democrat.

But the Senator has referred to a stale slander that he has picked up in some newspaper or other. I will not descend to answer a charge made on such authority. I would scarcely notice any charge on the authority of the Senator himself—much less the stories which he picks up out of Whig newspapers. No, sir; when a charge is brought against me, it must have an endorser, and a good and substantial endorser, and then I will answer it.

The Senator has asserted that the policy of the Administration tends to the establishment of "one currency for the Government and another for the people." One currency for the Government and another for the people! Who are the people? Are you, Mr. President, and is he not one of the people? Does the mere fact of his holding a seat in this body, raise a man above the level of the people? Sir, he may have a seat on this floor, and yet be in character and standing, among his fellow men, even below the average of the people of his own State. This has been an oft-repeated charge, that the Democratic party have established one currency for the Government and another for the people: that, while we pay ourselves in gold and silver, the great mass of the community are compelled to use a depreciated currency. He would admit that the fact exists of two currencies: one the constitutional currency, the other the currency of private companies; but whose fault is it? Did the Government or the Democratic party establish the State banks? The banks of all the States, except Ohio, south of New York, have refused to redeem their paper, and they are now fighting against resumption, and endeavoring to supersede the constitutional currency with their irredeemable trash. And we find the Senator from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE,] and the party of which the Senator has become a member, associated with these banks, and giving them their countenance and support in their effort to suppress the circulation of the legal currency of the country. With a disregard of all truth and decency, the Administration are charged with causing this state of things. But I thank the Senator for his taunt, and I hope it will be remembered and profited by. The banks even in this District, where we have exclusive jurisdictions refuse to redeem their notes, and he (Mr. TAPPAN) hoped, when the subject came up for consideration, as it would shortly, that Senators would, so far as their legislation is concerned, relieve themselves from the odium of being instrumental in establishing "one currency for the Government and another for the people;" that they would sanction but one currency for the Government and the people, and that a good and substantial one. I have no more to say, sir; my object has been to repel an unjust and unprovoked attack; to let the Senator know that if he indulges himself in such attacks on me and my friends, he must expect to be answered plainly and promptly. I go no further; for, from my soul, I pity the man, who, to court the favor of new associates, finds it necessary to abuse and vilify his old ones.

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT, the resolutions were ordered to be printed, and laid on the table.

REPLY OF MR DAVIS TO MR. BUCHANAN.

On the third day of March, Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, entered into an argument, in the Senate of the United States, to prove that his views and opinions were misrepresented in a speech of Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, delivered on the 23d of January last in reply to Mr. B. on the sub-Treasury bill.

The following is the reply of Mr. DAVIS to the charge of misrepresentation:

Mr PRESIDENT: The morning following the remarks made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] upon my printed speech in reply to a speech of his, I asked permission of the Senate to re-state my observations in reply, as I had reason to believe some of them had been misapprehended, and to add some further remarks, as I had then had an opportunity to run over the speeches and should endeavor thus to place the whole matter on a footing that could not be misapprehended.

The Senate being then anxious to proceed in the unfinished business of the day, signified its wish that I should embrace another opportunity, and I now seize the earliest moment which has presented itself to discharge that duty. This, I am aware, is a subject that ought not to occupy time in this place, and my apology is that I did not introduce it, and claim only the right of vindicating myself against the extraordinary statements of the member from Pennsylvania.

In order to a full understanding of the relation which events connected with this subject have with each other, I shall recall to mind the occurrences as they happened.

A few days before I replied to the member from Pennsylvania, I made some remarks upon several topics of interest which seemed to connect themselves with the discussion, and the Senator from Mississippi (Mr WALKER) and the Senator from Pennsylvania replied. I then rejoined that I understood, from what had been said, that opinions had been advanced that it would be beneficial to the country to reduce the value of property and wages, and that I might, in the course of the debate, make known my views upon the subject, if a suitable opportunity occurred. To this no response was made. Soon after the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] delivered his speech. The Senator from Pennsylvania followed him, and was followed by the other Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. HENDERSON,) who spoke at large in reply to him upon the topic of wages. The Senator from Indiana (Mr. SMITH) next took the floor, and spoke also briefly to the same point. Mr. MERRICK, of Maryland, succeeded him, and went much into the subject of the reduction of wages, in reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania, as I understood him, reading the tables of wages, to illustrate what the laborer received where the cost of production was least. The Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CRITTENDEN,) some days after, while another topic was under discussion,) replied to the remarks of the member from Pennsylvania on the same topic. To none of these speeches, or the comments of the debaters, did I hear any objection or reply, though I thought they understood the speech to which they made answer, much as I did.

When the Senator from Maryland closed his remarks, the day was far spent, but the Senate having manifested a determination to take the final question, by refusing to adjourn, late as it was, I rose and assured the Senate that, while I felt it to be a duty I could not omit, to reply to some of the arguments in which doctrines were advanced relating to great and momentous interests among those I represented, yet I should limit myself to a reply, and a reply only. I think it was well understood to what my attention was chiefly directed, and I thus gave distinct notice to all who felt any interest in what I might say, of my specific object.

I then proceeded, in the presence of the member from Pennsylvania, who sits near where I stood, and commented upon his arguments a large portion of the time I was speaking. He best knows whether he was in his seat all the time, but I saw him there much of it, and have reason to believe he was there, or near there, the whole of it.

He did not interrupt me in the progress of my remarks to correct any statement of his arguments, nor did he suggest that I misapprehended them or his sentiments, nor did he make any reply, though he had ample opportunity to do it when I took my seat. My remarks were upon his speech as delivered here, and as I comprehend it from that delivery. I spoke of his arguments as I understood them, being aided by some rough minutes noted down as he was speaking. This occurred on the 23d of January, and, in about a fortnight, my speech was published, having been thus delayed by the sickness of the Reporter. His appeared a little earlier. The speech I delivered is the same in every essential and material particular as that in print. The words cannot, I know, be entirely the same, but all else is. The arguments throughout are identical, and, Mr. President, as you were an attentive listener, as well as many others sitting here now, I appeal to you and them, if any variation has been detected, to make it known. The member from Pennsylvania has not ventured to suggest any. These are facts about which there cannot and will not be any controversy.

And here I repeat that I spoke of the speech delevered in this place as it fell from his lips, and could speak of nothing else, for it had not been published. I spoke of it as I understood it in the delivery, gathering his sentiments and reasoning from him as he proceeded. My comprehension of his views was the only guide I could have. In my reply I spoke of it in his presence, in yours, and in that of the Senate and the public—making every statement, every argument, as clear and distinct as I was able to do. No objection was made to any thing I said. What more could I do? What more can any one do? What other assurance could I have of my correctness, or of the acquiescence of the member from Pennsylvania in it? None whatever, unless the manuscript report had been submitted to his revision and correction. I could have no reason to believe that it was possible for me, under such circumstances, to mistake or misapprehend him. I had, on the contrary, as strong reason for believing, as we ever have in debate, that I was right; for it is the custom in this body to correct debaters on the spot by explanations—a rule belonging to all deliberative bodies, and to the justice of which no one yields a more cheerful obedience than I do, for I am willing that members should expound their own views. Under these circumstances, the speech went to the public, and I shall leave that public to determine with what justice a charge of misrepresentation can be sustained, or if there can be the slightest ground for complaint.

Yet, sir, six weeks after all this, his speech and mine having in the mean time been widely circulated and read, the Senator came into the Senate, and without the slightest previous intimation, direct or indirect, to me, of his purpose or dissatisfaction, rose and declared here his astonishment at the manner in which he was represented in my reply; and this he did in terms harsh and discourteous. I thought he might have pursued a course much more suitable to correct a misunderstanding, if there was one, and that was his only view. The lapse of time and the circumstances give to this movement an extraordinary character, and mark a deficiency in that decorum which signalizes the intercourse of the members of the Senate. I see nothing in my course in the slightest degree disrespectful to the member—nothing bordering upon injustice, or from which it is possible to infer the existence of a motive to wrong him; and there was none. But, sir, he has chosen his time and place. He came here, and not to me, for redress, and here he has made his appeal. If it could be his purpose to come upon me by surprise, he succeeded; for no one could have less anticipated any complaint or cause of complaint. If it could be his purpose to conceal his griefs, and make his attack so suddenly that I might be found with the subject dismissed from my mind, with neither his nor my speech by me, nor any thing to refresh my memory, or to enable me to compare facts, he accomplished his purpose, and had the full benefit of it; for I was indebted to the voluntary kindness of a friend for the copy of his speech, handed to me at the moment, from which I read some of his remarks. Such is the course chosen by the member. Here he has made his appeal, and here and in the country let the question as to his motives be judged of, and whether I can be justly chargeable with the slightest injustice towards him.

After many comments, when called upon so to do, the Senator pointed out two paragraphs in my speech to which he took exception. His remarks were so diffuse upon wages, labor, and other topics, that I was not able to ascertain with satisfactory precision of what he did complain, nor am I able now to comprehend it so distinctly as I could wish.

I will ask him if he has any objections to that part of my reply relative to the causes of distress in the country? We seemed to be agreed that it was owing to the derangement of the currency; but, in the cause of this derangement we differed. If he has any, I wish him to state it now, as I can reply more understandingly if better informed.

[The Senator declined answering.]

I commented upon the remarks of the Senator upon banking in the United States—upon excessive issues of paper—upon the amount of circulating medium—upon credit—upon speculation—upon excessive imports, and upon the increased cost of production and the rate of wages, said to be produced by banking. I understood the Senator to dwell upon all these matters in his speech—to speak of them as evils calling for correction. If there be any thing objectionable in my remarks, I should be better pleased to have it distinctly pointed now. In the course of his observations the other day in support of his complaint, he used this expression: "All I can say is, that I used no such arguments." I regret that he declines specifying his objections, because I was then, and am now, at a loss to understand what precise arguments he alluded to in that declaration.

I understand him to speak particularly and strongly of the manufacturing interest, ascribing its embarrassment to the cost of production, or, in other words, to high wages; for labor creates production, and the cost of production depends upon that of labor. Every laborer knows that, as a general principle, the cost of production cannot be diminished, except by lowering wages, and that wages and production go up and down together. I understood him to impute our want of success to the great cost of production, and to argue that we should succeed in obtaining possession of our own markets, and be successful competitors for the markets of the world, if the currency could be so reduced as to bring down the cost of production to the standard of prices throughout the world. I understood him that this was the corrective and the remedy for the manufacturers at least. I thought this a near approach to hard money alone; and how far it is consistent with his declarations of friendship to a mixed currency, others can judge as well as I can.

As the Senator has declined to specify, and as I am left to proceed by such lights as I have, I shall now read some parts of the printed speech of the Senator, and leave others to judge how far they sustain the view I took of his arguments.

[Here Mr. D. read several passages from the speech, showing the general current of argument upon banks, banking, and excessive issues of paper; also relating to credits, speculation, &c. which it is unnecessary to repeat.]

Sir, I cannot detain the Senate by reading further, and I have drawn attention to these paragraphs to show, what I am sure the member will not question, that he treated of banking as it exists in the United States as highly objectionable, and bringing upon the public evils which demanded a remedy.

I pass to another part of the printed speech, which I deem more material, as it relates to those matters which induced me chiefly to reply to him. The Senator said:

"Sir, I solemnly believe that if we could but reduce this inflated paper bubble to any thing like reasonable dimensions, New England would become the most prosperous manufacturing country that the sun ever shone upon. Why cannot we manufacture goods, and especially cotton goods, which will go into successful competition with British manufactures in foreign markets? Have we not the necessary capital? Have we not the industry? Have we not the machinery? And, above all, are not our skill, energy, and enterprise, proverbial throughout the world? Land is also cheaper here than in any other country on the face of the earth. We possess every advantage which Providence can bestow upon us for the manufacture of cotton; but they are all counteracted by the folly of man. The raw material costs us less than it does the English, because this is an article the price of which depends upon foreign markets, and is not regulated by our own inflated currency. We, therefore, save the freight of the cotton across the Atlantic, and that of the manufactured article on its return here. What is the reason that, with all these advantages, and with the protective duties, which our laws afford to the domestic manufacturer of cotton, we cannot obtain exclusive possession of the home market, and successfully contend for the markets of the world? It is simply because we manufacture at the nominal prices of our own inflated currency, and are compelled to sell at the real prices of other nations. Reduce our nominal to the real standard of prices throughout the world, and you cover our country with blessings and benefits. I wish to Heaven I could speak in a voice loud enough to be heard throughout New England; because, if the attention of the manufacturers could once be directed to the subject, their own intelligence and native sagacity would teach them how injuriously they are affected by our bloated banking and credit system, and would enable them to apply the proper corrective.

"What is the reason that our manufactures have been able to sustain any sort of competition, even in the home market, with those of British origin? It is because England herself is, to a great extent, a paper money country, though, in this respect, not to be compared with our own.

From this very cause, prices in England are much higher than they are upon the continent. The expense of living is there double what it costs in France. Hence, all the English who desire to nurse their fortunes by living cheaply, emigrate from their own country to France, or some other portion of the continent. The comparative low prices of France and Germany have afforded such a stimulus to their manufactures that they are now rapidly extending themselves, and would obtain possession, in no small degree, even of the English home market, if it were not for their protecting duties. Whilst British manufactures are now languishing, those of the continuent are springing into a healthy and vigorous existence. It was but the other day that I saw an extract from an English paper, which stated that whilst the cutlery manufactured in Germany was equal in quality with the British, it was so reduced in price that the latter would have to abandon the manufacture altogether."

What do we gather from this? What is the obstacle to the success of the manufacturer, in the opinion of the Senator? What prevents him from obtaining exclusive possession of our market, and sharing those of the world in the sale of his productions? It is the inflated paper bubble; it is "because we manufacture at the nominal prices of our own inflated currency, and are compelled to sell at the real prices of other nations." Such, in his view, is the cause of our embarrassment and failure in success. Now, sir, what is the remedy proposed by the Senator? "Reduce (says he) our nominal to the real standard of prices throughout the world, and you cover our country with blessings and benefits." We are to take exclusive possession of our own market, and enter those of the world successfully—and by what process? By reducing the cost of our goods "to the standard of prices throughout the world;" by bringing wages down as low as those who manufacture cheapest; for by no other process can we enter the markets of the world in successful competition. The Senator shows us that England is carrying on an unsuccessful competition, in the manufacture of cutlery, with Germany, because of the paper money of England. Germany, he alleges, is a hard money country, and the costs of production or wages is lower, and she therefore manufactures cheaper. Now, sir, what is the standard of prices throughout the world? It must be a standard which will enable us to sell as low as others—to produce as low as the nation that produces lowest, or we cannot get the exclusive possession of our own market, and enter the markets of the world in successful competition. We must go down to the wages of France, Germany, and other countries that produce lower than our laborers, or those of England. If I can understand language, the paper bubble is to be reduced till this result is reached. The Senator says he is for a mixed currency, but goes for the reduction of it till it brings prices to this standard. Of what consequence is it, Mr. President, whether it shall be mixed or unmixed, hard money, or hard money and paper, if the reduction is to go on till this effect of coming down to the standard of prices throughout the world is produced? None whatever: and yet, so confident is the Senator in the soundness of his policy, that he exhorts the manufacturers to take the corrective into their own hands, and to bring this result about; and yet he complains of me as representing him as too much of a hard-money man. I supposed in all this the Senator looked really to hard money; but whether he did or not is of little consequence, as the effect on labor and business will be the same. I was led to this conclusion, for I thought he would not wish to be understood as viewing one currency as most useful to the manufacturers and another to the country. If there be confusion in the matter, I am not answerable for that, for I replied to such opinions as were advanced. It appeared to me that the evil complained of was the expansion of the currency, and the remedy proposed a reduction to this standard of prices throughout the world. I know the Senator has spoken much of his friendship for laborers; but it is his practical views of policy, his means to be employed to secure prosperity, that I examined. I did not consider the part of his speech from which he has read, and considers the foundation of unjust remark elsewhere, as an important or material portion of his reasoning. Such is the doctrine contained in the printed speech. It is before the world, and let them judge of it, and see whether I have brought the member nearer to being a friend of hard money than he brings himself.

But the Senator pointed out two paragraphs in my reply which he says do him injustice. If so, it was not my purpose. On the first page, he alleges that, in a general summary which I make, (not of his exclusive views, as the paragraph shows,) I impute to him an opinion that the Sub-Treasury will have a greater influence over banks and banking, and reduce the currency beyond what he ever thought or has contended it would do, notwithstanding I expressly state, in another place, when I speak of him alone, that he declares himself the friend of well regulated banks and a mixed currency. On this point, I shall only say it is the last on which I could have anticipated complaint, after all the reasoning of the Senator to prove the expediency of reducing the currency, because of the evils of banking. But the effect of the bill is matter that never entered my mind as of any moment. It was not the measure of influence which it would have that I discussed, or thought important, as I alluded to it only in a summary way. It was the opinions and doctrines advanced in the argument, the general scope of policy advocated by the member, upon which I commented, and to which I replied. I could not misunderstand him in expressing the opinion that the bill would have its influence, as a corrective, and I am indifferent what degree of influence is or may be ascribed to it.

The Senator laid hold of another isolated paragraph of my reply at the thirteenth page, and supposes I meant to assert that he and his friends contended that the bill would reduce the value of property and wages one-half. I assured him the other day, and now do it again, that such is not my meaning, nor does it seem to me to be the just or fair construction of the language. The language is this: "I do not impute this power to the bill, but it is enough for me that its friends do." What power? He alleges the power to reduce wages and property one-half. I say the power to reduce wages and property, and to improve our relations to foreign trade, without assigning any particular proportion of reduction. The Senator draws the the proportion from a hypothetical case stated by me in illustration of the general proposition under consideration, that a reduction of wages would be beneficial to the laborer. This I combated, and in the hypothesis assumed a case in which wages were supposed to be reduced one-half. Having gone through with this, which appears on the face of it to be, what it is, hypothetical, and not founded on propositions intended to be imputed to any one as used in argument, I return by a new paragraph to the bill, and use the language I have read, not intending to refer to the hypothesis, or the proportion of reduction in it, but to the general proportion under consideration. He therefore gives a meaning to my remarks never designed or thought of by me until I heard his construction. He does not read the speech as I understand it, and meant it should be understood. This explanation is the same I gave the other day, and is what the Senator called a disclaimer. It is a disclaimer of nothing but his construction of my language and meaning. If that is what he meant by a disclaimer, I am content with it, but I wish to be rightly understood. If you take the paragraphs alone which the Senator read, it may be understood as he represents; but that is not the inference as it appears to me from the whole text.

But the Senator went further, and read from my speech the next sentence, which is, "What response will the farmers, mechanics, and manufacturers made to such a flagitious proposition?" and, seizing upon the word flagitious, used in no sense offensively, not having the remotest personal application to him, but applied to the general proposition to reduge wages, &c. and not to the hypothesis or any thing contained in it, inquires of the Senate if he might not pronounce this statement a flagitious representation of his remarks? I wish him now to state whether in employing that language he meant to reflect on me personally? (Mr. D. paused a moment; and the Senator not making an answer, he added,) if he did, then I hurl back the imputation with the scorn and contempt language so unmerited and unprovoked deserves, and suspend further remarks till I hear the member.

SPEECH OF MR. STRANGE,

OF NORTH CAROLINA.

In Senate, Thursday, February 27, 1840—On the assumption, by the Federal Government, of the debts of the States, and in reply to Messrs. CLAY and CRITTENDEN.

Mr. PRESIDENT: I may say with honest Iago—but with much more sincerity than he did, "I do repent me that I did put it to you." I do most sincerely regret the rashness which has imposed upon myself a task to which my state of health is so inadequate—the undertaking to address the Senate upon a subject which opens and has already afforded so wide a field of debate. But the good humored assaults made upon me on yesterday by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] excited me to a degree that made me unmindful, for the time, of my weakness. Perhaps he brought me somewhat into the state of the Prince of Denmark when witnessing the extravagances of Laertes over the grave of his sister, he exclaimed, 'Nay, an thou'lt mouth, I'll rant as well as thou." His prophetic visions produced a correspondent delirium in myself, and tempted me to efforts to outprophesy him. Time must, as in other cases, disclose whether the four hundred who foretold success to Ahab at Ramoth Gilead, or Macaiah the son of Imlah, who prognosticated defeat, are the truer prophets.

But neither of us, I fear, can boast much of unction from above; and while it is forbidden to us to look even upon the shadows of coming events, we must be content to speculate by the pale light of reason, and to draw from the experience of the past, analogical deductions for the future.

When I said to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] on yesterday that I differed from him with less regret than I did with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] I said it in no spirit of unkindness; indeed, had I done so, I should have misrepresented my own feelings. I am not one of those who cannot do justice to a political opponent. No one, I am sure, within this chamber, listens to that Senator with more pleasure than myself; no one more admires the dexterity with which he wields his blade, although myself may sometimes feel the keenness of its edge. But I cannot but regret that the same sagacity and skill with which he wields it are not displayed in the selection of the cause in which to draw it. I should be happy to fight upon the same side with the Senator from Kentucky, did not sad experience convince me that if I ever do so, I must be content to take the wrong one.

As usual, the debate upon the report and resolutions submitted by the chairman of the Select Committee, the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] has taken a very discursive range, and the whole field of party strife has been traversed as suited the tastes of the various speakers. Upon its first introduction, the report was met by the most extraordinary fusilade ever witnessed in this chamber, and the vigor of the attack plainly indicated the heart cherished value of the objects against which the report and resolutions were levelled. And yet the resolutions contain four simple propositions, which the report sustains by able and unanswerable arguments. The first three of these propositions are:

1. Resolved, That the assumption, directly or indirectly, by the General Government, of the debts which have been, or may be, contracted by the States for local objects or State purposes, would be unjust, both to the States and to the people.
2. Resolved, That such assumption would be highly inexpedient, and dangerous to the union of the States.
3. Resolved, That such assumption would be wholly unauthorized by, and in violation of, the Constitution of the United States, and utterly repugnant to all the objects and purposes for which the Federal Union was formed.

Neither of these propositions had any one the temerity openly to question, and with all the fearlessness ascribed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] to American Senators, in the discharge of official duty, and justly, as I trust, no one here has been bold enough to dispute the truth of either of them.

But it is said their assertion in this form, and at this time, is irregular, unnecessary, and impolitic. Irregular, because no legislative action is proposed, either by the report or the resolutions. This is an extraordinary objection to come from a party who passed the resolution, condemnatory of General Jackson, through this body, by acclamation. It is true that resolution was subsequently expunged, but the ground of its expunction was not that it contemplated no legislative action. But is it true, that our duty here is confined to the mere passage of laws? Does the steerage of the vessel of State depend exclusively upon the passage of laws? And if not, is Congress to leave that steerage to other hands, and take no thought of the direction in which the vessel is tending? If, from the look out point which it occupies, it beholds rocks and shoals, and whirlpools, and quicksands lying before her, is no warning voice to be lifted up? Can there be a doubt that this is one of the most important duties which our constituents expect us to perform; that we should make diligent use of all the talents which God has given us, and of the advantages of our position, to search out political truth, keep it steadily in view, and proclaim it to our fellow-citizens? Does not the whole usage of the nation prove it to be so? In my opinion, sir, were we to neglect this, we should neglect the most important half of our duty. The report and resolutions then are not irregular, unless, as is further contended, they are unnecessary.

They are denounced as unnecessary because the assumption of the State debts by the General Government has never been contemplated by any one. Who that has looked upon the signs of the times can feel this security? Are not the newspapers of a certain class full of suggestions upon this subject, and have not the circulars of bankers been put forth indicating its propriety and even its necessity? But the Senator from Kentucky, who addressed us some days ago, [Mr. CLAY,] demands, with an appearance of scorn, if we are to pay any attention to newspaper suggestions or bank circulars? I answer, unhesitatingly, yes. He asks if our action is to be at all affected by them? Again I answer, yes. The day has gone by when the press is nothing, or money kings are to be despised. The latter great personages plant their feet upon the necks of those who control empires. How long has it been since the stamp of a banker's foot and his declaration that, if a certain war was declared, he would not be seen again for many months upon 'change, had an important bearing upon the measures of one of the first powers in Europe? This happened on the other side of the Atlantic; but are we without similar experience on this? Is it for us, yet panting after a struggle with one of these mammoth powers, to affect to despise them? Is it for us, who have lately witnessed bulletins and proclamations and letters issuing from the marble palace, agitating the vast political mass in our country, as the ocean is stirred up by the breath of the storm, to talk about being regardless of bankers' circulars? And when we hear the murmur of the coming tornado, are we to wait until it strikes us before we prepare ourselves to meet it in safety? When we see the opiates preparing for the people, and the chains being forged which are to bind them in endless slavery, is it our duty to wait until the drugs have been administered and the chains fastened not only upon their limbs, but around their hearts, till they are bound to the earth, manacled and fettered, before we warn them of their danger? No one contemplates assuming the State debts by the General Government! Did not the Senator from Kentucky, who addressed us the other day, [Mr. CLAY,] pour forth notes of lamentation over the hapless condition of the States, pressed down with debt? One might have almost fancied them the plaintive exclamations of the poetic King of Israel over the untimely fate of his son Absalom. Did he not speak of the intimate relationship existing between the States and the General Government? Were not the States commended to our sympathy, and spoken of as bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh? That if one suffers, all partake of the suffering? &c. And why was all this? From the fullness of the heart the mouth speaketh. Why speak to us of the woes of the States, and the sympathy due to them, if we were not expected to bring relief? Do men spend their breath in detailing their grievances, and appealing to the pity of those from whom they expect nothing? A politician, as old, and experienced, and skilful, as the Senator from Kentucky, speaks not without an object; and, to me, the inference is clear, that, like leaven, his words are cast into the mass to create a ferment in the public mind until it throws out some food for the cravings of the States, or rather of the British bankers. The objection, then, that these resolutions were unnecessary, is as groundless as the one that they are irregular.

And this is further conclusively proven by the third objection brought against them, to wit, that they are impolitic. How impolitic? Because, forsooth, they will injure the credit of the States. It cannot be the mere declaration that the States owe so much money that can injure their credit, because that was before a matter of public notoriety. The debts of Governments, and especially free Governments, can never be a secret to any one who desires to know the truth. They are contracted in the face of day, and are evidenced by records continually spread open in the broad light of the sun. What, then, is the discrediting matter? It is the declaration that this Government will not assume to pay them. But if it was known and believed before that this Government would not assume to pay them; if the conviction was firm and unwavering, would a declaration to that effect operate in any way upon any mind? Surely not. Suppose this Government were to declare that it would not assume to pay the debt of Great Britain; would that effect the credit of Great Britain? No! And no one imagines that it would. Why? Because the wildest visionary that ever lived, never for a moment imagined that the Government of the United States would assume the British debt. If, then, the public mind on both sides of the Atlantic were equally clear of the impression that the General Government would assume the debts of the States, as that it would assume the debts of Great Britain, could the credit of the States be any more affected by the declaration that she will not assume their debts, than would be the credit of Great Britain by a similar declaration? Surely not. The argument, then, that the credit of the States will be affected by the declaration that the General Government will not assume their debts, must be founded upon the supposition that such an expectation exists somewhere. Now, as it is admitted on the other side that no one ought to have the folly to contend for such assumption, it follows that such an expectation is erroneous. And is it right and just to suffer any one to remain under it? If no one entertains this expectation, the declaration that it is erroneous is at least harmless; and if any one does entertain it, it is but just to apprize them of their error.

But the secret that such an impression does exist somewhere, and the true origin of that impression, are disclosed farther by a metaphor resorted to by the opponents of these resolutions to show their impolicy. They speak of this Government being the father, and the States the children. From this figure the principle of consolidation is distinctly seen peeping out, and its fallacy ought to be at once exposed. Does the son beget the father, or the father the son? Is the procreator or the offspring anterior in existence? There can be but one answer to these questions. Now as the States made the General Government, and not the General Government the State Governments, and as the State Governments existed for years before the General Government, the General Government cannot be the father of the State Governments. But waiving the correctness of the figure for the present, for the sake of argument let it be conceded that the relationship does exist as supposed. Assuming this, the argument on the other side is, that it is impolitic and unkind for a father to proclaim the indebtedness of his children, and declare in advance that he will not assume their debts. But in this argument two important facts are overlooked in the case of the particular family spoken of, viz: in the first place that the indebtedness of the children is known to every one before the father speaks, and in the next place that the father cannot speak to his children without all the world hearing him. The question then arises whether such a father, knowing that his children were largely indebted, and that designing persons were endeavoring to persuade them that it was the duty of the father and the interest of the whole family that he should assume their debts, while he himself firmly believed that such a step would be ruinous to all, and unjust to many branches of it, he ought not to warn his children against listening to pernicious counsels—counsels tending to render them indolent and extravagant—and distinctly to apprise them that, according to his views of justice, expediency, and the family relationship, such a thing was totally inadmissible? So much for the first three resolutions.

4. Resolved, That to set apart the public lands, or the revenues arising therefrom, for the beforementioned purposes, would be equally unjust, inexpedient, and unconstitutional.

And here the gentlemen on the other side make their stand and fight against the resolution, and insist that it is both constitutional, just, and expedient, to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the States. On all these points I take issue. 1. I say it is unconstitutional. Why? I assume it as a political axiom, disputed by no one, that this Government has no power to raise money for any other purposes than those set forth in the Constitution which gave that Government existence. I assume further, what I suppose no one will question, that distribution among the States is not one of those purposes. Does it not follow, as an inevitable conclusion of right reason, that whatever might be the constitutional power of Congress over a fund on hand, which it was evident could never be absorbed in the proper outlay of the Government, it would be a manifest breach of all constitutional trust to make such a distribution when the effect would be to create a necessity for raising further sums by taxation to supply the place of those so diverted by distribution?

But I understood the Senator from Kentucky, who addressed us the other day, [Mr. CLAY,] to consider a portion of these lands as a specific trust to be applied to certain purposes distinctly pointed out in the deeds of cession.

The following is the language used in the cession made by the State of Virginia, on the first day of March, seventeen hundred and eighty-four, to wit: "That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved or appropriated to any of the beforementioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered as a common fund, for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation or Federal alliance of said States, Virginia inclusive, according to the usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever.

The language used in the deeds of other States is substantially the same. It is very obvious that distribution is not one of the objects of the trust, or it would have been set forth. The object, after certain reservations, is one, and that is "to be a common fund for the use and benefit of all the States, according to the usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure." It is well known that, at this time, our Federal Constitution had not been adopted, and that each State contributed by taxing and collecting from her own citizens so much to the general charge as Congress declared to be her quota. The object of the trust declared in relation to the public lands, was then manifest—that a proportion equal to what each State contributed to the general charge and expenditure, of the proceeds of the public lands, was to be applied towards her quota of such charge and expenditure, and diminish to that extent her necessity for self taxation. The words "use and benefit" exclude the idea of an actual surrender to the States; but imply an application by a trustee to the particular use declared. And as if to exclude any possibility of mistake, the deed goes on to declare that it shall be faithfully and bona fide, (appropriate words as applicable to a servant or trustee,) disposed of for that purpose, and no other use or purpose whatsoever. Nothing can be more specific and exclusive of every other use and purpose than contribution to the general charge and expenditure.

Thus matters stood anterior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution. But I understood the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] to say that, after that, the execution of the trust became impossible, and the trust fund consequently resulted to the original grantors. That the States no longer contributed, by self-taxation, their proportions to the general charge and expenditure; but the levy of taxes was made by the General Government through imposts upon the country at large, and the measure of application, and the subjects of application were thereby annihilated. It is true that, in practice, after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the States were no more called on to contribute their proportions of the public charge and expenditure, but this was a mere practical operation. Potentially, both the objects and measure of the application of the proceeds of the public lands, were preserved in the Constitution. In the first article, second section, and third clause of the Federal Constitution, it is declared:

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, etc."

The whole revenue, then, if thought expedient, might be raised by direct taxation, (and would probably be the most equitable mode,) and if so raised, clearly the proceeds of the public lands ought, according to the terms of cession, to be applied in aid of the States in their respective proportions, to lighten the burden of direct taxation upon each. Then both the object of application and the measure of proportion would stand out in bold relief. Reasons of policy and convenience have induced the States to prefer taxation by imposts to direct taxation, but in neither form do they desire to be taxed beyond the public necessities; and to no farther extent, in either form, has power been conferred on Congress to impose taxes, and in neither form has Congress the right to impose farther taxes, while a fund remains on hand applicable to the public expenditures. The public lands, then, must be used to lighten the burden of taxation, in whatever form taxation is levied. Whether the fact be strictly so or not, taxation by imposts is submitted to, because it is supposed to approximate the same proportion in contribution by the respective States, with direct taxation. The trust, therefore, upon which the public lands were held, stands in its full force, and unchanged in its nature and objects. This is conclusively shown by the striking facts, that although the Federal Constitution went into operation in March, 1789, and North Carolina made her cession in December of that year, nine months after, and Georgia made hers in 1802, about thirteen years after the Federal Constitution went into operation, both these States preserved substantially the language used in the Virginia deed of cession, which, it is now contended, could then have no operative meaning, and thereby declared trusts which it was obvious, at the time they were declared, could never be executed. This is altogether too absurd to be supposed; and it must necessarily follow that it was well understood that the adoption of the Federal Constitution produced no change in the operation of these grants. This is further confirmed by the second clause of the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution, which declares that

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory, or other property belonging to the United States."

Now what territory was there belonging to the United States, other than the lands ceded by the States? And there is no evidence that any other territory, which could be called property of the United States, was in contemplation. So far from it, purchases of territory, since made, have been seriously questioned as breaches of the Constitution. It follows, then, that these public lands were deemed the property of the United States by the framers of the Constitution, and not that the trust had resulted for the want of power to execute it. It appears, then, that Congress holds this fund under the same trusts that it does other property of the United States; and the question recurs whether, if Congress cannot constitutionally raise money for distribution among the States, she can do so indirectly, by applying the money which she holds for the purposes of the Government, to distribution among the States, and thereby create a necessity for raising other money for those purposes to which the fund distributed ought to have been applied? Every fair mind furnishes a ready answer to this question.

And is it not equally obvious, that while the Government continues in operation, such must be the effect of every distribution, unless we can suppose the improbable (and certainly not now existing) case of the General Government holding funded debt or stocks yielding an annual interest sufficient to defray its current expenses. The enlightened and able Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] in his argument on the expediency of this measure, has put the case of the present state of the Treasury and the prospective revenue, showing that an abstraction of the proceeds of the public lands must render an increase of the tariff inevitable. But is it not equally apparent that if, as he and I both think, we have no right to lay a tariff for any other purpose than revenue, a distribution of money in the Treasury, which would have the effect of rendering a reduction of the tariff impracticable, would be liable to the same objections? Both would have the effect of causing taxation to supply money which had been distributed. I thus arrive at the conclusion, that a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands as far transcends the constitutional trust powers of Congress as the assumption of the State debts, a measure from the advocacy of which, as before stated, every body shrinks.

2. Nor is the injustice of such distribution less apparent. The truth is, the only thing which recommends it to the favor of any one is its injustice. What possible inducement could twenty-six gentlemen have to contribute a sum, to be immediately divided out among them in the same proportions in which they had contributed? None. Still less would they be in favor of such a measure, if they were required to pay some one for collecting and distributing the money. But if the distribution were to be in some different ratio from that in which the contribution had been made, then would it be inevitable that some of the parties must withdraw more than they contributed, and, consequently, others less. This might commend the arrangement to the favor of those who were to be gainers by the operation; and if it were uncertain which of the parties were to be the gainers, the gambling spirit to which every man is more or less subject, would probably commend it to the favor of all. But, yet the injustice of the scheme is apparent to every one; and if the distributor were authorized to obtain imperceptibly from the pockets of the twenty-six gentlemen sums of money, according to the cost of what each might eat, drink and wear, and then to divide the money per capita, would not the inequality of the plan shock a very blunt sense of justice?

3. As to the inexpediency of the distribution objected to by the resolution, what can any man say, after the luminous and forcible portraiture made of its effects, a few days ago, by the Senator from South Carolina? It is a vast subject, and I will not overtask myself and the patience of the Senate by going into it. I leave it as left by the Senator from South Carolina. I will not attempt to gild a sunbeam.

And here, sir, the subject would seem naturally to close; but the memory of man runneth not to the contrary of the practice on this floor of making every question of any magnitude to bear upon the strife of party raging in this land. Be it so: and if gentlemen will force them upon us, I, for one, am not for shrinking from such contests. I, for one, have such confidence in my political principles, as to be willing to see them sifted and examined at all times and in all places—ay, and to believe, too, that they can bear some misrepresentation, without endangering greatly their perpetuity.

"Truth, crush'd to earth, will rise again—
Th' eternal years of God are hers;
But Error, wounded, writhes in pain,
And dies amid her worshippers."

So may error ever perish, and, among other errors, those of Harrisonian Federalism.

The great difficulty of the cause to which I belong, in our party strifes, is the preservation of our own banner. Our adversaries are ever striving to throw matters into confusion, and, taking advantage of the tumult, to rob us of our banner, and to thrust theirs into our unwilling grasp. Our names are seized upon, and appropriated to themselves, and others fixed upon us, by which our forefathers never baptized us. Thus occasionally are our own brethren and kindred, men of the same political family, and sharing with us in the common inheritance of sound faith, made for a time to fight against us; and mischief is perpetrated, difficult to repair: for it is not every man "who knows the true prince by instinct," like the fat knight, of facetious memory.

I do not know a better service that a man can do to his country, than to hold forth, with a strong arm, to the public view, the glorious Democratic banner, in its unadorned simplicity, with its plain, pithy, intelligible mottoes. The theory of Government, which should be the plainest thing on earth, has been by artifice converted into a puzzle-fool, and its simple purposes mystified and defeated. The happiness of man, through its tendencies to render him virtuous, is its sole office, if it has any worth the trouble and expense that it costs. Its systems are various, but they may be reduced to two classes: that which addresses the reason of man, and withholds from him temptations to be vicious, and that which seeks to control him by his selfish passions, his hopes, his fears, his desire of gain. Very few Governments have been based upon the former principles—the mass have adopted the latter. Perhaps the earliest and rudest form of Government in which reason was overlooked, was that in which priestcraft usurped the control of every thing, and a god or gods supposed to be speaking through the mouths of men, dictated alike to individuals and nations. The most rigid exactions were made of the masses of mankind, and the most grinding oppressions imposed upon them, that the favored few might enjoy wealth and ease, and honor and renown. The treasures of the coffer and of the heart were alike wrung from their possessors, that the dominion of their oppressors might be absolute and unquestioned. Exactions were sometimes carried so far as to demand the fruit of the body to appease imaginary deities for imaginary sins, and the products of the toil of millions were surrendered, that a few might luxuriate in exhaustless abundance, and uninterrupted ease. This has been happily styled by the celebrated John Taylor, whom I so much delight to admire and quote, the age of Jupiter; he among the heathen gods who was most imperious and extensive in his sway. But his tyranny became so oppressive, that mankind could no longer endure it, and bold spirits penetrated his temples, and discovered and exposed the frauds of his priests.

Next came the age of Mars, and heroes, clad in steel, controlled mankind. He is among the most noble of the heathen gods, and has about him a generosity of character which disdains to trample on the weak and defenceless, and scatters with liberality what he gathers by his power. Still he appealed not to the reason of mankind, but controlled them, through their fears, with the rustling banner and the bristling steel.

After him came Mercury, establishing dominion by addressing himself, through fraud and artifice, to the cupidity of mankind, or humbling them into submission by reducing them to poverty. Finally combinations were formed among all these powers, and the science of Government became complex and mysterious. It was supposed that there was no other way of correcting the evils, or rather to render them tolerable, incident to these principles of Government, than to resort to checks and balances, and to make the vices and passions of one man restrain the vices and passions of another. When Government became a mystery, it was supposed that it admitted but of three simple forms, viz: monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy, and that all Governments consisted of one or more of these elements, controlled by one another, or a combination of two or three, of the heathen deities, before mentioned.

Such was the state of things in the old world, but our sagacious forefathers saw the error of principles on which those Governments were based, and the battles of our Revolution were fought, that the whole heathen Pantheon might be dethroned with its cumbrous and expensive machinery, and that Governments might be established in the new world, formed upon moral principles That man might be restored to his native dignity—a self-governing being, disenthralled from the dominion of passions, and yielding to the sway of reason and conscience—a reason and conscience on whose tablets are written, by the finger of God himself, precious and noble truths, which can never be erased, but are refreshed by revelation from day to day. They believed that man retains much of the original image of his Maker; that something of His purity is enshrined in the breast of woman; that mercy, that most interesting of His attributes, beams forth from her eye in rays of tenderness, or gently distils in drops of sympathy. That in the bosom of man His sterner attribute of justice has a deep abiding place. Such were the principles upon which our beautiful system of governments were based. Corruption was excluded by avoiding accumulations of power; justice secured by establishing a perfect equality of rights among men; and happiness placed within the reach of all, by opening a fair field for virtue, and talent, and industry to reap their harvest, while vice, and ignorance, and stupidity, and indolence, were left to that curse to which a righteous Providence has seen fit to expose them.

But the devil came, as he has ever done to each earthly paradise, disguised as an angel of light, or in some unobtrusive form, little calculated to excite the alarm of those whose destruction he meditates. Connate with our Constitution were those who held to the old belief that honest disinterested reason was an unsafe governor, and that Jupiter, Mars, and Mercury—one, or all three, must be restored—hence an established religion, standing armies, vast navies, exclusive privileges and monopolies, and whole hosts of eleemosynary dependants upon the labor of others, had all their advocates. In all this we perceive what constitute the warring elements of party in our land. But constant association, even in strife, will assimilate men to each other, and one may gather moral contagion from another whom he hates—and thus have these parties been constantly varying in the intensity of their principles, so as even sometimes to render it doubtful which was which. The result has been that Jupiter, and Mars, and Mercury, have all been imperceptibly regaining in part their lost empire; and, although disavowed in our constitutions, have exerted substantial control in our public affairs. Of these, as might have been expected from his nature, Mercury has been by far the most successful. He has not only given tone to our Governments, but has enthroned himself in the hearts of our people, until, instead of increasing in virtue, and disinterestedness, and patriotism, an eager haste to be rich has become our distinguishing national characteristic. Hence every individual is pursuing riches as the chief good, and money, money, money, currency, currency, currency, is the continual cry in the country, in the city, in private conversation, and in the debates of this chamber. To all this the Governments have been contributing by example, and the stimulus of their measures, tariff, internal improvements by the General Government, lending revenues for banking purposes, and other kindred operations.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] has represented the friends of the Administration as differing among themselves as to which of these causes have produced these effects. He will pardon me for saying there is no such difference among them—they all concur in believing every one of them the offspring of the same parent, and to have acted harmoniously in the accomplishment of his designs. Some may suppose one of these causes more efficient than the rest; others may have supposed another; but all agree that the whole responsibility is to be shared among them; and in what exact proportions it is not thought very material to inquire.

But what, after all, is the great evil they have produced? Is it any actual diminution of the resources of the country? This, perhaps, they have effected to a great extent; but that is little or nothing compared to the real evils. These are transferring by stratagem and fraud, from A to B, the hard earnings of the latter, not by a regular and slow process, but by the quick and unseen movements of a mountebank; defeating that tendency to equilibrium at which our institutions aim; leaving the one party overwhelmed in amazement and distress at a poverty which has rushed upon him like an armed man; the other panting with that feverish thirst for wealth which sudden success begets—the deepest curse of him who feels it—resembling in kind and intensity that of the fabled Tantalus; or wallowing in an ostentatious luxury, at war with our Republican institutions—provoking impotent envy in some; in others, less wealthy, ruinous efforts to vie in splendor. Individual and aggregate misery is the inevetable consequence. A man is fitted, by a gradual increase or reduction of his means, to bear the maximum or minimum with calmness, while sudden reverses either way bring in their train the loss of content, and, with it, happiness. In either case, the passion of avarice is stirred to madness. This is the real curse under which we are at present laboring. This is the agony through which we are passing, of which I speke yesterday. A picture, drawn by the hand of an ancient master, is not inapplicable to our times. Sallust, in one of his epistles to Cæsar, thus expresses himself:

> In process of time, the ascendency of wealth became complete. Its excellence was universally acknowledged, and power and honors followed in its train. From the same era, the decline of virtue may be dated. Poverty was now held as ignominious. Innocence of heart and simplicity of manners were interpreted into a satire on the times. Thus the youth, taught to look up to riches as the sovereign good, became apt pupils in the school of luxury. Avarice and pride supplied their precepts. Rapacity and profusion went hand in hand. Careless of their own fortunes, and eager to possess those of others, shame and remorse, modesty and moderation, every principle, gave way. All rushed into a profligacy that heeded no restraint, either divine or human.

And why, we are tauntingly asked on the other side, did we not prevent these evils? In turn, I will ask another question: Has not the Democratic party been striving against them—inefficiently, it is true, but still striving—from time immemorial? We read a parable in Scripture of a certain husbandman, who sowed good seed in his field; but, while he slept, an enemy came and sowed tares among his wheat. Would it not have been an aggravation of the wrong, had that enemy taunted him to his face, by asking him why he suffered tares to grow among his wheat? We are the descendants of those (politically, I mean) who sowed the good seed of Democratic principles in our constitutions, and yonder are the descendants of those who sowed the tares of Federalism among it; and now they ask us why we have not prevented their growth. They point exultingly to this and that bad measure, which they have themselves cajoled or forced us into, and laugh at us for not having avoided them, although, like struggling men, in attempting that which we would, we have been forced to do that which we would not. The State bank deposite system, they know well, we were pressed into by them in our efforts to escape from the more dangerous system of the United States Bank. It was to us a half-way house, as they have endeavored since to make it for themselves, between a United States Bank and a total disconnection of the Government from banking affairs.

But they ask us farther why we do not correct these evils, now that we are fully aware of their existence. Mark again the insulting cruelty of this inquiry. They bind a man's hands behind his back, and cast him into the water, and ask him to swim. Have we not been endeavoring to remedy these evils, and have we not encountered from them continual resistance? Yet the evils admit of no immediate remedy. The poison of avarice has seized on the heart of the nation, and that is a malady which admits of no radical cure during the present generation. Of him in whose bosom the serpent avarice has fixed its envenomed tooth, it may with truth be said, as Iago said of Othello:

> "Not poppy—nor mandragora,
> Nor all the drowsy syrups of the world
> Can ever med'cine thee to that sweet sleep
> Which thou ow'dst yesterday."

Yet, in talking of remedies, they always indicate to us such as consist with their mistaken notions of the disease, and are for administering those which must inevitably aggravate its symptoms. Still there is something we can do—something we have done, and something, I trust in God, we will yet do, if not to heal the disease, at least to prevent its spread. We may stand, like Moses, between the living and the dead, and prevent its extending to those who are yet healthy. And if we cannot hinder its extending itself through the whole living mass, we may prevent its transmission to posterity. This can only be done by successfully resisting the mad schemes of those who are continually administering fresh poison in the form of high tariff—United States Bank—connecting the Government with banks—distributing revenue among the States—assuming State debts, &c. This is all we need do. Let us perform our constitutional duty of furnishing the nation standards of weights and measures, and of the value of property; and freed from all distracting influences from ourselves, the States will be as certain to abide by all these, as that flowers succeed the showers of spring. You have no right to say to the States that they shall keep their accounts in dollars and cents; that they shall measure cloth with a yardstick, or their corn by the bushel, or weigh their bacon by the pound; but it is your duty to furnish them with standards, by which value weights and measures may be tested. You should perform this duty, and having performed it, ask for no more power in relation to these subjects. You have all that is needful for liberty, and more can only be desired by tyranny. The banking institutions, debts, and internal improvements of the States, will soon be brought within wholesome limits, if you will only let them alone. A bad currency is a curse to the community in which it exists, and the State Legislature will soon be forced, by a community which feels the smart, to apply the proper correctives; and States having no resources but those derived from direct taxation, to pay debts and carry on works of internal improvements, will become very chary in contracting the one, and quite prudent in conducting the other.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] tauntingly reminds us that the present Administration, on coming into power, found the nation in a high state of prosperity; but the Senator well knows it was a deceptive prosperity; it was that state of pleasant delirium which some poisons produce. The raging madness had not then disclosed itself; lethargic prostration had not supervened.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] presents, in glowing colors, the oft-drawn picture of the prosperity for which we are indebted to the credit system. Our numerous steamboats, canals, railroads, villages, and fast multiplying States, are all attributed to this credit system. In this argument the Senator, I think, falls into two fallacies; one, in attributing too much to the credit system, and another, in assuming that the friends of the Administration are warring upon it. I will not say that the credit system has no share in the production of these great results, but I do say that they are mainly to be ascribed to the great national advantages which Heaven has vouchsafed our country—to that elastic spring which exists among the inhabitants of all new countries, but chiefly to our glorious free constitutions, founded on moral principles, to which men have flocked in crowds from other lands. To the credit system, I, for one, am no enemy; but I am for leaving it to the States, to be fashioned according to their fancy, and I am well satisfied that they will not much abuse it. I am for withdrawing, at once and forever, our awkward intermeddling with it. With us it is like bladders in the hands of boys—at one time we blow it up to its highest tension, and at another explode it with a great noise. Let us cease from this foolish and frivolous, not to say dangerous, employment. And in addition to this, let us cease by our vicious examples to perpetuate the false notions prevalent in the country, that show and wealth and pomp are the only elements of happiness, and that virtue and talents are worthless, except so far as they contribute to these. Let us, on the contrary, present abiding examples of economy and republican simplicity.

These, Mr. President, are my remedies, and I do not think it would be saying much for them merely to declare that they are far preferable to the one to which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] looks with such ecstatic devotion. I do not think this the proper place for discussing the merits of Presidential candidates; but are we to sit here from day to day and hear the President of the United States denounced on the other side of this chamber as utterly unfit for the station he fills, and other men "applauded to the very echo," as endowed with every quality which can fit a man to govern, and admit, by our silence, the truth of all that is alleged? As an American statesman—as a lover of my country, I feel that it is wrong, and that it is my solemn duty to put in a counter plea.

The Gheber looks to the East for his God, but the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] looks to the West, and, as might be expected, his eye encounters a setting and not a rising luminary. Not a giant rising in his strength, and rejoicing to run his course, but a being worn out and exhausted, unfitted for action, and suited only for repose. And what is still more unfortunate, even this setting luminary is surrounded by no halo of glory, but, like the moon, described by Moore in his song, weeping "behind a cloud"—(I will not say "for the maiden's shame," because that might be supposed to have a sinister allusion, but) for shame that while a portion of his countrymen are lauding him to the skies as a sage, a hero, and a statesman, he is compelled to remember the old proverb, "Praise undeserved is censure in disguise." Reposing on his own estate, (not in a log cabin, as some have pretended, but in a splendid mansion, as I am told,) perfectly unconscious of any merit, his friends insist upon dragging him forth to dissolve, by his presence, the fanciful conceptions of his great qualities which they have conjured up in the public mind. There was a time when some of the leaders of the party who are now seeking to make political capital out of military fame, declared that the election of a military chieftain to the Presidency of the United States was the greatest curse that could fall upon the nation. Why have they now selected a military chieftain for their political leader? Is it because they believe what has been said of him, that "he is not general enough to hurt him?" Why, then, present him in the glare of military glory? Is it to dazzle the people as moths are said to be by the brightness of a candle?

But more in sorrow than in reproach, do I declare his military renown to be like the tinsel glitter of dresses at a theatre, got up for show, and for the occasion, which will not bear the light of day, or the scrutiny of examination. Alas! where shall we look for the evidences of the sagacity and heroism of William Henry Harrison? Are they to be sought for in that page of history which records the battle of Tippecanoe? Are they to be found in his surprise and agitation, when Joe Davis carried the white banner; not very high, it is true, nor yet as a flag of truce, but by necessity, and fought under it, or rather over it, with desperate valor, snatching in death a victory which had been thurst into the hands of the enemy by the want of skill (to use no harsher term term) of his chief? Are they to be found in the story of his consigning to the slaughter the chivalrous Croghan, with his handful of men, while the General himself, within sound of the well directed and effective fire of Fort Stephenson, stood with some thousands of stout Americans at his back, wringing his hands, and crying out "his blood be upon his own head?"

Are they registered in the page which tells of the battle of the Thames, where he reluctantly pursued a retreating foe, while bolder spirits, among whom you, sir, stand nobly conspicuous, pressed forward, and gathered wounds and laurels, dripping with the same blood? Are they to be found in the tragic story of the river Raisin? Are they found in his resigning his command in May, 1814, amid the very heat of the war, upon the acknowledged ground that detraction had breathed upon his name, and he not choosing to court an inquiry into the truth of the imputations? Are they furnished by the deliberate rejection of his name, when his country was bestowing the meed of approbation upon some of her sons who had earned it by deeds of valor? If these are his jewels, they are as worthless as the black diamond to the lapidary. Deeds like these shine like dark lightning. They will resound through the earth like silent thunder.

But the military fame of this new Messiah, who is "to bring peace upon the earth," is a mere make weight. It is as a skilful diplomatist, a profound politician, that he is to commend himself to the hearts of the people, and win from them the oaken chaplet on which so many look with a longing eye. As to his diplomacy, I have heard of but one opportunity afforded him for its display, and then I have learned that high authority pronounced him, in advance, utterly unfit for the station to which he was assigned, and that, in the event, he managed so dexterously as to have himself rebuked as an officious intermeddler with matters that did not concern him.

But as the great physician, who is to "purge the general weal," what may we conjecture will be his probable practice? Homeopathic, so far as administering the same drugs which have a tendency to produce the disease will make him so, but altogether wanting in the prudence of that practice, so far as the amount of the doses is concerned. As a black-cockade Federalist of the old stamp, he will, of course, oppose every thing approved by the Democratic party, and will deal largely in Federal nostrums, and must of course be very popular with the Northern and Western Democracy. As a juvenile member of an Abolition society, he will, in his old age, be particularly acceptable to Southern slaveholders, and more especially as he has avowed, in advance, his approbation of the benevolent design of converting the public domain into negroes, that an American sun may not shine upon a single slave. As the advocate of a tariff, which was not to be relaxed "until grass should grow in the streets of Norfolk and Charleston," he will doubtless prove a great favorite with the Southern people in general, and especially the Nullifiers. But not to be tedious, I will urge his political excellences no farther than merely to add, that as the advocate for selling free white men, who cannot pay costs, out of jail as bond servants, he is likely to be a Magnus Apollo—Æsculapius, if you please—all over the country with the "huge paws," as the laboring men of the nation have been contemptuously called by that party whose hopes of success rest upon a false estimate of their worth and good sense.

I have too much confidence in the people of these United States, to fear an elevation to the Presidency of such a man as this. They cannot prefer him to the present talented incumbent, who has wisely studied and eloquently described the disease preying on the health of the country, and who will give it none of the dangerous prescriptions it would be doomed to take from the hand of his rival. Like every wise physician, he has much confidence in the vis medicatrix naturæ—the medical power of nature, doubting at the same time whether diseases are often cured by men "who pour drugs, of which they know little, into stomachs of which they know nothing." He believes that nature needs but little assistance; and that, if not disconcerted by officious intermeddling, her works are commonly performed safely and efficaciously. Attempts may be made, and doubtless will be made, to deceive the people into the belief that there is no material difference in the political opinions of the two rivals. The people will easily detect the fraud, for an unerring index is furnished in the fact that the ardent and leading advocates of the one have ever been the ceaseless opponents and traducers of the other.

It is not the first time I have heard the shout of triumph from the Federal camp on the eve of a battle. I thank God I have seldom heard it after it was over. Did not the Federalists shout lustily in advance, their lungs would suffer for want of exercise. I scarcely know whether to attribute this premature boasting on their part to that blind confidence and enthusiasm so natural to an assailant, or to political cunning, in which they are so well versed, calculating thereby to confirm the timid of their own party, to induce the same class of ours to unite with them, and to decide in their favor the legions of the wavering. To this latter opinion I rather incline; but having so often failed in obtaining by it success, I would advise them to lay it aside, and adopt some other expedient.

And now, having undertaken to advise my Federal friends, I would warn them against another practice which, I verily believe, has often contributed to their defeat. I mean their custom of giving great political feasts with the hope of making a strong impression, and convincing men of the justice of their cause by tickling their palates and addling their brains. The practice springs out of their great radical mistake that man is more of an animal than an intellectual being. But upon their own basis they miscalculate. It is never the mass of voters who are invited to these feasts; it is the elite of the party, the favored few, and, as a matter of course, no one of opposing politics is there. What is the consequence? There is no fellowship between the ins and the outs. The mass of the people finding themselves excluded, together with the leading men of the Democratic party, cannot fail to perceive that a common destiny has visited both, and they are naturally drawn into association with those who have been excluded like them, and not with those who have been revelling in pleasures in which they have not been invited to participate.

But lest I may be casting pearls—I will not say before swine—lest I may be casting away good counsel upon those by whom it will not be justly valued, I will close my didactic strain.

A few words, in conclusion, to the people of my own State. The Presidential strife is not the only one going on at present. One is now raging in North Carolina in which my colleague and myself have a deep interest. At the last session of Congress, we presented on this floor resolutions containing the opinions of the Legislature of that State, of popular sentiment upon certain great leading questions. We then declined assuming for the Legislature a responsibility which, according to our understanding of the Democratic doctrine of instruction, (a doctrine which we received with implicit faith,) properly rested upon it. We took issue with the Legislature, as we had a right to do on its expressed opinion of popular sentiment; and to enable all parties to have the issue tried, and at the same time to put ourselves and our political principles fairly before the people of North Carolina, we avowed our determination to resign our commissions into the hands of the next Legislature, whatever political party might prove to be in the ascendant. That we may not be supposed to have forgotten the pledge, or to repent having made it, I now solemnly renew it. I hold my seat in this body but as a trust from the people of my State. As their wish that I should hold it has been questioned, to them I refer for the solution of the doubt. All I ask is, that they will have the goodness, in their next legislative elections; to keep this question distinctly before them, and cast their votes accordingly; and to their decision, whatever it may be, I will bow with filial submission. It is not likely that I shall often again trouble the Senate until that decision is made; and in conclusion of what may be the last address I shall ever make it, I ask pardon of the Senate for having so long and so unprofitably occupied its time.

On the day after the remarks of Mr. STRANGE, Mr. TALLMADGE of New York addressed the Senate, and, in the course of his speech, was pleased to consider the observations of Mr. STRANGE upon the Federal practice of feasting a sarcastic allusion to the entertainments given to the President during his summer tour through his native State—indulging at the same time in some very coarse remarks upon the President, which were understood by Mr. STRANGE to charge the President with ingratitude to his native State, and of having played the traitor towards it.

In reply, Mr. STRANGE said: I should not have again so soon troubled the Senate, Mr. President, had not the Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] done me the honor to notice some of my remarks made on yesterday, perverting them to a far different sense from that in which they were used by me. He was pleased to suppose that I had some sarcastic allusion to the entertainments given to the President during his tour, last summer, through the State of New York. These entertainments were altogether different from the Federal feasts to which I alluded. The latter seem to be given for no object but to produce effect, and act upon elections; the former, were the mere rendition of courtesy and the outpouring of, good feeling towards a distinguished fellow citizen, upon his return after a long absence from his native State. They were due to the man, but still more to the Chief Magistrate of the nation; and I deeply regret that the political rancor of the Federalists should have caused these public demonstrations of good feeling to be confined to one political party. Of what ingratitude to his State, on the part of Mr. Van Buren, the Senator speaks, I am at a loss to understand. Does he mean to complain that he has administered the affairs of the General Government according to his sense of the true interests of the great body of the nation, and not in reference to the local interests and peculiar opinions of the people of New York? That he has not betrayed the confidence reposed in him by the whole American people by providing mainly for that State with which his own personal fortune and that of his kindred is identified? This I understand to be the complaint, and I must say it is just such an one as I should have expected, not from the personal, but from the political character of the Senator. And as for the word "traitor," which the Senator has seen fit to apply to the President of the United States, I wonder that the utterance of it does not palsy his tongue.

[Mr. TALLMADGE then endeavored to throw the blame of the indications of respect towards the President in the State of New York, at the time referred to, being confined to one party, upon the President himself, ascribing it to his addressing himself, on his arrival at the Battery, to his "Democratic fellow-citizens."]

Mr. S. again said: I am glad the Senator from New York has introduced this topic, as it affords me an opportunity to bear my testimony to the great unfairness with which the President has been treated on this subject, and altogether for political effect. Almost as soon as it was known that the President intended to visit New York, there were murmurings in the Whig ranks that there would be no enthusiasm in his reception; that it would be cold, and confined to a few office holders and devoted partisans. His response, at the Battery, to the address made him, was seized upon as a pretext to execute what had been long predetermined. It was said he had avowed himself the President of a party, by responding to his "Democratic" fellow-citizens. Had any other class of citizens addressed him, and thus entitled themselves to a response? Did not the orator who addressed him speak in behalf of his "Democratic fellow-citizens?" Was the President to deny to the orator the character he had assumed? And, if allowing him the character, could he do otherwise than respond to it? Suppose an orator had addressed him in behalf of his Masonic fellow-citizens: could the President do otherwise than respond to his Masonic fellow-citizens? If his Whig fellow-citizens really designed to show respect to the President, would they not have selected an orator to address him, or have united with the Democracy in the selection of a common spokesman? Not having done either of these, could they reasonably expect a response addressed to them from one to whom they had said nothing? The expectation would have been unreasonable. It was never entertained; and an event which every one must have foreseen has been spoken of with affected amazement, and perverted to the injury of one who does honor to his State and country, for party purposes.

NOTE.—When the foregoing reply to Mr. TALLMADGE was made, the speaker was under the impression that public entertainments had been given in New York, to the President, by his political friends. He was confirmed in that opinion by the Senator from New York, Mr. TALLMADGE,] who being from that State, was supposed to be cognizant of events transpiring there. He has since learned, from an unquestionable source, that the President positively declined the invitations given him to partake of public dinners. That he never accepted an invitation to a public dinner in his life, although he has been constrained frequently to participate in entertainments which, from the numerous attendance, assumed the appearance of a public dinner.

APPENDIX,

Containing some evidences of Gen. Harrison's heroic and political merits. The other incidents referred to in the foregoing speech, connected with his life, being well known matters of history.

In reference to his general political opinions, I believe the following to be authentic:

John Randolph of Roanoke, who despised both the Adamses, on the floor of the Senate of the United States in 1826, thus witheringly retorted on Gen. Harrison, for his black cockade doctrines in support of John Q. who was their President:

"Now, sir, the only difference between the gentleman from Ohio and myself is this—and it is vital: That gentleman and myself diff r fundamentally and totally, and did differ when we first took our seats in Congress—he as a Delegate from the Territory Northwest of the Ohio river, I as a member of the other House, from the State of Virginia. HE WAS AN OPEN, ZEALOUS, FRANK SUPPORTER OF THE SEDITION LAW ADMINISTRATION—and I was as zealous, frank, and open an opponent of the black cockade and sedition law Administration. We differ fundamentally and totally—we never can agree about measures or about men." In reply to this charge, what is the answer of Gen. H.? Does he deny it? So far from it he admits that "it is very probable he (Mr. R.) might have heard me express sentiments favorable to the then Administration—I certainly felt them."

Extracts from the letter of General Duncan, Governor of Illinois, now a political friend of General Harrison, relative to the affair at Lower Sandusky, dated March 25, 1836:

About the 20th of July, 1813, General Harrison, then at Lower Sandusky, hearing that the British army had crossed Lake Erie to Fort Meigs, being about five thousand strong, immediately changed his head quarters to Seneca, seven or eight miles up the Sandusky river, where he assembled his forces then on the March from the interior, leaving Major Croghan with about 150 men to defend Fort Stephenson, with an understanding at the time that the fort, then in a weak and wretched condition, was to be abandoned, should the enemy advance with artillery, but if not, to be defended to the last extremity.

About this time General Harrison received information that the enemy had raised the seige at Fort Meigs, and had started in the direction of Sandusky and Camp Seneca. On receiving this intelligence, he determined to rereat from his position, and immediately sent an express to Fort Stephenson, which arrived about sunrise, ordering Major Croghan to burn the fort with all the munitions and stores, and retreat without delay to head quarters, giving also some precautionary instructions about the route, &c.

On receiving this order, Croghan instantly placed it in the hands of the officers, who were all present, and required them to consider, and express an opinion of the propriety of obeying or disobeying it. The board was formed, and on putting the question, beginning as usual with the youngest officer, it was ascertained that a majority of us were for destroying the order Croghan returned to the room, and being informed of our directions, remarked, "I am glad of it; I had resolved to disobey at all hazards," and immediately despatched an express to General Harrison, giving him that information. Immediately on the arrival of this express, Gen. Harrison despatched Lieutenant Colonel Ball, with his squadron of dragoons, with orders to arrest Croghan, bring him to head quarters, which was done, and sent another officer to take command. By this time, in consequence of his not arriving agreeably to his expectations and orders, the General abandoned all idea of a retreat, although his munitions and stores were piled up ready to be set on fire as soon as Croghan should reach Seneca; and it is not doubted that if Croghan had arrived according to orders, General Harrison would have retreated instantly, leaving the whole frontier, our fleet at Erie, and the stores at Cleveland—the destruction which was the object of the invasion and movements down the lake—at the mercy of the enemy.

McAffee, the historian of the late war, and Dawson, the biographer of General Harrison, have studiously kept out of the view that the object of the invasion was the destruction of our ships under Commodore Perry, at Presque Isle, and boats and stores at Cleveland. These were looked upon with solicitnde by the British—were reconnoitered, and, on one or two occasions, were attempted to be destroyed, by landing the force on board their fleet. They have also failed to account for the movement of the whole British forces down the lake, in the direction of Cleveland and Erie, before their defeat at Sandusky, which was attacked to satisfy their Indian allies, who demanded the scalps and plunder of the place. They had kept out of view the fact that General Harrison had determined to retreat to the interior, after burning all the supplies which he had collected—that he ordered Major Croghan to abandon and burn Fort Stephenson—that his refusal to obey, and failure to arrive at headquarters, prevented this retreat, and consequent destruction of our fleet, millions of public stores, and exposure of five hundred miles of frontier to the combined enemy.

Both have stated that General Harrison never doubted that Major Croghan would be able to repulse an enemy of near two thousand, and which they say he understood to be five thousand, with one hundred and thirty men; his effective force on the day of battle, one six pounder, with ammunition for only seven shots, and about forty rounds of small arms, when the fact was notorious that Gen. Harrison was heard to say, during the siege, when the firing could be heard in his camp, speaking of Croghan, "the blood be on his head; I wash my hands of it," not doubting for a moment, nor did any one with him, that the garrison would be cut off.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH DUNCAN.

Col. PRESTON, Mil. Com., Senate.

Upon the subject of his resignation, there is the following testimony from General Armstrong, late Secretary of War, supported by Gen. Harrison's own letters:

MESSRS. GALES and SEATON: Having recently seen, in an article published in the National Intelligencer, and entitled a biography of Gen. Harrison, a gross misrepresentation of my feelings and conduct towards that officer in the campaign of 1813, (evidently intended to to throw upon me the odium of having made necessary the General's resignation,) I have thought it incumbent upon me to disabuse the public on this head, and show that every thing asserted by the biographer, imputing to me hostility to the General in any form, or from any motive, is downright fiction, arising either from a total ignorance of facts, or an utter disregard to truth. The passage thus characterized is in the following words:

"The war having been thus gloriously terminated within the General's own district, he repaired to Erie, and there tendered his services to the army operating in that quarter. Unfortunately, the Secretary of War was there, who felt some old griefs unredressed, and being, moreover, envious of the laurels so dearly but justly worn by the General, and unwilling to see another added to the wreath, ordered him to repair to Ohio, where he had no further duty to perform, having already brought the war to a close in that quarter. The order was obeyed; he returned to his family, and immediately resigned his commission, declaring that he could not honestly eat the bread of Government when he was denied the privilege of rendering service in return."

To refute this compound of falsehood and calumny, it will but be necessary to exhibit the official letters which passed between the General and myself at the period, and on the occasion referred to:

General Harrison to the Secretary of War, Buffalo, October 24.

"Before this reaches you, you will no doubt be informed of the loss of your messenger, Captain Brown, with the despatches entrusted to him. Not, therefore, having received your directions, and being entirely ignorant of the state of our military operations in this quarter, I was much at a loss to know how to proceed; but, believing that General Cass, with his brigade, would be able to secure Detroit and our adjacent conquests, after having concluded an armistice with the greater part of the hostile tribes, I concluded that I could not do better than to move down the lake with the remaining part of the troops, which I shall bring immediately to Fort George, where I shall await your orders."

Secretary of War to General Harrison, Wilna, October 30, 1813.

"I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letters of the 5th and 24th inst. The despatch, by Capt. Brown, and which, with him, was lost in Lake Erie, suggested, as an ulterior movement, your coming down to the Niagara river, and putting yourself on the right and rear of De Rottenburg's position before Fort George; while General McClure, with his brigade of militia, volunteers, and Indians, menaced it in front. The enemy seems to have been aware of this, or of some similar movement, as he began his retreat on the 9th, and did not stop till he had gained the head of Burlington bay, where, I understand by report, he yet is. This is his last stronghold on the peninsula; routed from this, he must surrender, or make good a retreat to Kingston: His force is estimated at twelve or fifteen hundred men—the capture or destruction of whom would give a glorious finale to your campaign."

The same to the same, Boonsville, Nov. 3, 1813.

"When I wrote you from Wilna, it was doubtful whether our attack would be made upon Kingston, or upon Montreal. Reasons existed for preferring the latter, and have probably determined Gen. Wilkinson to go down the St. Lawrence. In this case, the enemy may have at Kingston, besides his fleet and usual garrison, twelve or fourteen hundred men from the West. Had we not a sufficient corps in the neighborhood, they might do mischief, and even render insecure the winter station of our fleet. To prevent this, it is deemed advisable to draw together at Sackett's harbor a considerable military force. There are now at that post four or five hundred men of all descriptions—sick, convalescent, and effective. Col. Scott's detachment (about 700) is on its march thither; and it is barely possible that Col. Randolph's (not arriving in time to move with the army) may also be there. This does not exceed 350. McArthur's brigade added to these, will make a force entirely competent to our object. To bring the brigade down the lake, you must have the aid of the fleet, which will be readily given by Commodore Chauncey. The officers of the several corps composing your division, as well as those at Fort George as those at Detroit, (not necessary to the command of the troops now in the field,) should be immediately detached on the recruiting service. I need not further invoke your attention to a subject so important to the early and successful opening of the next campaign, and to the extent and character of your particular command."

General Harrison to the Secretary of War.—Head Quarters, Newark, Nov. 16, 1813.

"Commodore Chauncey, with the fleet, arrived here yesterday, and informed me that he was ready to receive the troops, and carry them down the lake, and that the season was so far advanced (rendering the navigation dangerous to the smaller vessels) it was desirable they should be embarked as expeditiously as possible.

"As a very small part of the militia and volunteers had arrived, and the situation of Sackett's Harbor appearing to require immediate reinforcement, I did not think proper to take upon myself the responsibility of postponing the departure of the troops for the lower part of the lake, conformably to the directions contained in your letter of the 3d instant. The information I received yesterday, from two respectable citizens that were taken near to Fort Meigs in June last, and who made their escape in an open boat from Burlington, confirms me in the propriety of sending them off. These men state that the British troops were hurrying to Kingston from York as far as possible—the regulars going down in boats, and militia bringing the latter back.

"Our troops are now all embarked, and are under the command of Col. Smith, who is an officer in whose capacity and bravery the greatest reliance may be placed. I shall set out this evening for the seat of Government, and have the honor to be, with the highest consideration," &c.

Same to the same.—Head Quarters, Cincinnati, May 11, 1813.

"I have the honor, through you, to request the President to accept my resignation of the appointment of Major General in the army, with which he was pleased to honor me. Lest the public service should suffer before a successor can be nominated, I shall continue to act until the 31st instant, by which time I hope to be relieved.

"Having some reason to believe that the most malicious insinuations have been made against me at Washington, it was my intention to have requested an inquiry into my conduct from the commencement of my command. Further reflection has, however, determined me to decline the application, because, from the proud consciousness of having palpably done my duty, I cannot believe that it is necessary, either for the satisfaction of the Government or the people, that I should pay so much respect to the suggestions of malice and envy."

The preceding documents established the following facts:

1st. That the General, when arriving at Erie, was not from enmity or envy ordered to repair to Ohio, or otherwise prevented from giving his services to the army then on the Niagara, as asserted by his biographer.

2d. That, on the contrary, he was, without delay, put in command of the army, and assigned to a service which, had it been performed, would have justly entitled him to another wreath of laurel.

3d. That, by a second order from the Secretary, he brought down McArthur's brigade to reinforce the garrison at Sackett's Harbor—an order entirely approved and speedily executed by the General.

4th. That, on the 11th of May, six months after leaving Sackett's Harbor, he resigned the command of the district, and quitted the army—not, as his biographer asserts, because denied the privilege of serving the Government, and therefore ashamed to eat his bread; but, as he himself says, because he had some reason to believe that malicious insinuations to his disadvantage had been made at Washington.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

February, 1840.

As to the refusal of his country to bestow on him a mark of approval.

In the tenth volume of Niles's Register, page 125, we read the following as a part of the proceeding in the United States Senate, to wit:

"The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution directing medals to be struck, and, together with the thanks of Congress, presented to Major General Harrison and Governor Shelby, and for other purposes. After some discussion, Mr. Lacock moved to amend the resolution, by striking therefrom Major General Harrison. This motion was determined in the affirmative, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Gaillard, Gore, Hunter, King, Lacock, Mason, Roberts, Thompson, Tait, Jackson, Turner, and Varnum—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Barber, Barry, Condit, Horsey, Macon, Morrow, Ruggles, Talbot, Wells, and Williams—10.

In the 10th volume of Niles's Register, on the 414th page, is a letter over General Harrison's own signature, dated July 16, 1816, from which the following is an extract:

"A vote of the Senate of the United States has attached to my name a disgrace, which I am convinced no time or efforts of mine will ever be able to efface. Their censure is, indeed, negative; but it is not on that account the less severe."

ABOLITION.—In 1822, he wrote as follows:

"TO THE PUBLIC.

"FELLOW-CITIZENS: Being called suddenly home to attend my sick family, I have but a moment to answer a few of the calumnies which are in circulation concerning me. I am accused of being friendly to slavery. From my earliest youth to the present moment I have been the ardent friend of human liberty. At the age of eighteen I BECAME A MEMBER OF AN ABOLITION SOCIETY, established at Richmond; the object of which was to ameliorate the condition of the slaves, and procure their freedom by every legal means. My venerable friend Judge Gatch, of Clermont county, was also a member of this society, and has lately given me a certificate that I was one. The obligations which I then came under I have faithfully performed."

"WM. HENRY HARRISON."

In 1833, General Harrison delivered a Fourth of July Oration at Cheviot, Ohio, in which he made the following declaration:

Should I be asked if there be no way by which the General Government can aid the cause of emancipation, I answer, that it has long been an object near my heart to see the whole of the surplus national revenue appropriated to that object. With the sanction of the States holding slaves, there appears to me no constitutional objection to its being thus applied, embracing not only the colonization of those that may be otherwise freed, but the purchase of the freedom of others. By a zealous prosecution of a plan formed upon this basis, we might look forward to a day, not far distant, when a North American sun would not look down upon a slave.

Upon the subject of selling out free white men, I have in my possession one of the printed journals of the Senate of Ohio for the year 1820, from which the following is a true extract:

Extract from the journal of the Senate of Ohio, Tuesday, January 30, 1821:

The Senate met pursuant to adjournment.

The Senate then, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole upon "the bill from the House entitled an act for the punishment of certain offences therein named," and after some time spent therein, the Speaker, Allen Trimble, resumed the chair.

Mr. Fithian then moved to strike out the 18th section of said bill, as follows:

Be it further enacted, That when any person shall be imprisoned either upon execution or otherwise, for the non-payment of a fine or costs, or both, it shall be lawful for the sheriff of the county to SELL OUT SUCH PERSON AS A SERVANT, to any person within this State, who will pay the whole amount due, for the shortest period of service, of which sale public notice shall be given at least ten days, and upon such sale being effected, the sheriff shall give the purchaser a certificate thereof, and deliver over the prisoner to him, from which time the relation between such purchaser and the prisoner shall be that of MASTER AND SERVANT, until the time of service expires; and for injuries done by either, remedy shall be had in the same manner, as is, or may be provided by law in the case of master and apprentice. But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent persons being discharged from imprisonment according to the provision of the 37th section of the act to which this is supplementary, if it shall be considered expedient to grant such discharge. Provided that the court, in pronouncing upon any person convicted under this act, or the act to which this is supplementary, may direct such person or persons to be detained in prison until the fine be paid, or the person or persons otherwise disposed of agreeably to the provisions of this act.

And the yeas and nays being required, those who voted in the affirmative were, Messrs. Beasly, Brown, Fithian, Gass, Heaton, Jennings, Lucas, Mathews, M'Laughlin, M'Milton, Newcom, Robb, Russell, Scofield, Shelby, Spenser, Stone, Swearington, Thomson, and Womeldorf—20.

And those who voted in the negative were, Messrs. Baldwin, Cole, Foos, Foster, WM. H. HARRISON, M'Lean, Oswall, Pollock, Ruggles, Roberts, Wheeler, and Speaker—12.

REMARKS OF MR. CRARY, OF MICHIGAN,

In the House of Representatives, Friday, February 14, 1840—The order of the day being the motion of Mr. CASEY to refer the memorial of the National Road Convention, held at Terre Haute, Indiana, to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill appropriating $150,000 in each of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to be expended on the Cumberland road, and the substitute of Mr. PICKENS for said instructions, as follows:

"And that the memorial be committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to consider the expediency of reporting a bill in favor of the measure."

And Mr. MARVIN's amendment to the original proposition, and substitute for Mr. PICKENS's amendment, as follows:

"And that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report bills in accordance with the estimates contained in the reports from the Chief Engineer, and the Chief of the Topographical Engineers, to the Secretary of War, and communicated to Congress by the President, making appropriations for the year 1840, for the continuation of the construction or improvements of harbors and roads, and the navigation of rivers, for which appropriations have been heretofore made."

Mr. CRARY spoke as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I am aware that it has become a common custom to examine nearly all questions that come before us, with reference to constitutional considerations. It is not to be supposed, however, that the most rigid constructionist will call in question the power of the House to give efficiency to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MARVIN.] The General Government has jurisdiction over most of the navigable rivers in the country, and especially over those leading into the Mississippi and the St. Lawrence. The ordinance of 1787, for the government of the territory northwest of the Ohio, provides that "the navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and the St. Lawrence and the carrying places between the same, shall be common highways and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said territory as to the citizens of the United States and those of any other State that may be admitted into the Confederacy, without tax, impost, or duty therefor." By this clause of the ordinance, these waters are the common highways of the whole Union. The United States have the jurisdiction over them, and have the right to improve their navigation. This improvement cannot be made by the States, if by such improvement those waters are deprived of their character of "common highways."

The only question, then, Mr. Speaker, for our consideration, is, whether these improvements are necessary, and appropriations at the present time expedient. I am aware that the system has been charged with numberless abuses. If these exist, they should be corrected. But until they are pointed out, I am disposed to vote the appropriations, believing them necessary to give protection to the rich and increasing commerce of the West. Much of the cry of extravagance is without foundation. The expenditures have indeed, in the majority of cases, exceeded the estimates; but it is to be recollected that the estimates were made when labor and the products of labor were comparatively at a low price. A work estimated at $100,000 dollars in 1830 cost nearly double that amount in 1836, by reason of the great rise in prices, and the universal demand for labor. Many of the works have been made more permanent than was originally contemplated. Instead of piers of wood that must soon decay by the action of the elements, they have been built of stone, which often had to be transported from a distance. But the greatest cause of the excess of the expenditures over the estimates, is traceable to the action of this body. During our long sessions, we have been in the habit of delaying the appropriations to so late a period in the season that contracts for labor and materials could not be made to advantage. It often happened that works were suspended for six months in the year, awaiting the tardy and uncertain action of Congress; and were then recommenced in the midst of the summer months. This left only about three months for active operations, two of these the most unhealthy of the year, and the other a month of storms and tempests. Under such a system of appropriations, there must be waste and extravagance—but the fault was with the makers of the laws and not with those who executed them.

The expenditures for harbor improvements on Lakes Erie and Michigan amounts to about $1,500,000, and there has been constructed sixteen harbors into which vessels can run with safety, and two others are nearly completed. When, in 1827, the first harbor improvement on Lake Erie was authorized, there was upon that lake 4,453 tons of shipping. The steamboat and shipping tonnage on the 30th September, 1838, amounted to 36,385 tons. By a statement of the collector at Mackinaw, made in 1838, it appears that nearly 57,000 tons of shipping entered that port between the 14th of April and 25th of September of that year. This amount of tonnage is employed in the Lake Michigan trade, where a vessel often runs two hundred miles in a storm before she can find a harbor.

The gentleman from New York, last upon the floor, [Mr. BARNARD,] stated that the commerce on these lakes now exceeded 100,000 tons monthly. Allowing eight months of navigation annually, and it would, for that period, exceed 800,000 tons—equal to half the tonnage of the Atlantic States. Nearly one moiety of the Atlantic tonnage is registered and employed in the foreign trade. The vessels are fitted out for distant voyages, and after leaving port, are not exposed to the dangers of our own coast. On the lakes they were exposed daily and hourly, for they were constantly in sight of the shore, and liable to be driven upon it in every unfavorable gale.

It has been by means of the harbor improvements on the lakes that the whole of the public domain in the Northwest has been brought into market. When this system was commenced, the State that I have the honor to represent was supposed to be a bleak and barren wilderness—"a country of sand hills, sometimes crowned with a few stunted trees and a scanty vegetation, but generally bare, and thrown by the wind into a thousand fantastic shapes"—a country unfit for cultivation, and so filled up with marshes, that enough of good land could not be found to supply the demands of the soldiers of the war of 1812. Such was Michigan, even after the close of that war; but its whole aspect has been changed by the expenditure of a few thousand dollars in harbor improvements.

More than 200,000 people have been induced to make this "beautiful peninsula" their home, and have been the willing instruments of causing more than $8,000,000 to flow into your Treasury since 1834. Nor has the influence of these harbors been confined to my own State. They have been the means of settling Northern Ohio, Northern Indiana, and Northern Illinois, and they are now filling up Wisconsin and Iowa with the enterprising and intelligent of the old States—with the men who carry with them the principles, moral and political, which inspired and animated the pilgrims of the Plymouth Rock.

These are some of the benefits that have accrued to the country from our improvements on the lakes. The question now before us is, whether these works shall go on to completion. By your past legislation, you have induced the settlement of a lake coast nearly 2,000 miles in extent, with all the country adjacent; you have persuaded thousands upon thousands of your population to go into the wilderness, and purchase your public domain, with the expectation that you will continue those improvements. Their continuance is demanded by the interests of commerce. Without them, we shall have no avenues by which the products of our industry can find a market. Without them we shall be isolated, be cut off from all the benefits of the Union, and be compelled to bear only its evils.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr PICKENS] embraced the opportunity yesterday to pass a high compliment to the energy, enterprise, and intelligence of the Northwest. He looked forward with pride and joy to the addition of new States to the Union. I am pleased at this expression of his broad and expanded views. I, too, Mr. Speaker, look forward to the time when State after State shall be embraced within the Union, when Representatives shall stand up on this floor, whose homes are on the shores of the great Pacific. An opportunity will soon be presented to test his patriotic professions; and when it comes, I feel an an assurance that he will not be found wanting in his deep devotion to the principles of liberty. Wisconsin will soon be here to take her place in the rank of States, and it will probably be the good fortune of many now here to assist in forming two or three States out of the present Territory of Iowa.

The gentleman from South Carolina objects to these appropriations, because they are not necessary for the common defence. He thinks that all our future battles are to be fought upon the Atlantic. In his opinion, the Canadas are to become free in any future contest with Great Britain, and are to be united with us in the bonds of a common Union. This, sir, may all happen, but not immediately. If a war comes out of the Northeastern boundary question, the grand theatre for military operations will be upon the lakes. There will be fought our battles, and there our arms will be covered with defeat and disgrace, or crowned with victory and with glory. Already is there a force in the Canadas of some eighteen thousand men, under experienced officers, and ready to invade us at any moment. The militia of those provinces are in a state of excellent discipline, and commanded by officers who have been in regular service. For three years the British Government have been fortifying along our whole frontier. They have rebuilt fort Malden, the key to the commerce of the upper lakes. They have fortified Bois Blanc island at the mouth of the Detroit river. Are all these movements necessary to preserve the peace of the Canadas? Must our whole frontier be lined with cannon to keep down the spirit of Canadian patriotism, and love of liberty? No, sir! In the event of war, these fortifications are designed to cut off our commerce with Lakes Huron and Michigan. But this was not all. British troops are stationed at every important point on that frontier, and British influence is concentrating the Indian tribes of the Northwest among the hundred islands of Lake Huron. Were all these fortifications, and all these armed men, necessary to preserve peace among British subjects? It may be, sir, but it tells a sad story for British misrule in her provinces, and such misrule as once justified rebellion and revolution. It is however to be recollected that we have a long line of boundary yet to adjust. On our part it is to be adjusted without compromise, without concession. We have declared for the boundary of the treaty of 1783. Does the British Government intend to adhere to that boundary? The late message of the Governor of New Brunswick shows no such intention. He talks of compromise, of concession. Are the gentlemen from Maine prepared for this?

[Mr. SMITH here replied, No: never!]

No: never, is the reply; and it is such a reply as should come from a Representative of the people of that gallant State. It is made in the spirit of the country. This House has declared for the line of the treaty, and we are bound to abide by that line. War is, indeed, to be avoided, but not at the expense of any portion of that territory which was won by the battles of the Revolution, and bequeathed to us as the inheritance of liberty.

Mr. Speaker, I have ever considered harbor appropriations as necessary for the defence of the lake frontier. They are necessary to protect our shipping from being destroyed by the enemy. A breastwork upon the piers, with a few cannon, and men to use them, will render almost any harbor secure from military incursions. In connection with this subject, it may not be improper to allude to the agreement entered into between the British Government and the United States in 1817, in regard to the armament of the lakes. By that agreement, neither Government was to emply more than two vessels on the upper lakes, each of 100 tons burthen, and armed with one eighteen pounder. If my information is correct, this agreement has been violated by the British Government, and they are now building two armed steamers on Lake Erie, ostensibly for the preservation of the peace of the Canadas, but in reality to maintain an ascendency upon those waters in the event of war.

Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the President to be opposed to appropriations for harbors. When his message, together with the report from the Treasury Department, was transmitted to this body, the operations of the Topographical Bureau and Engineer Corps, for the year 1839, had not been laid before the head of the War Department. Directions had been given that all our public works should be inspected by competent officers, and the result of their labors was not communicated until the 7th of January. The Bureau of Topographical Engineers reported on the 30th of December, 1839, and the Chief Engineer on the 7th of January, 1840. On the 8th of January these reports were laid before the President, and on the 9th of the same month, he transmitted the same to Congress "for their action and consideration." This document contains "a more than usually detailed statement of the history and progress of the works, together with detailed estimates of the probable cost of each work, and of the sums required for each year." It is a document that will enable Congress to legislate understandingly on all subjects of harbor improvement. It tells us that the works under charge of the Engineer Department will require the sum of $1,386,887 for 1840; and under the charge of the Topographical Bureau the sum of $1,807,424 for 1840. There are tables showing the whole amount that will be demanded to complete all the works in a permanent manner. There is also much valuable matter on the subject of the commerce of the upper lakes. No man can read it without coming to the conclusion that the fifteen hundred thousand dollars expended on the harbors of these lakes, has been the most profitable expenditure of this Government. It had been the means of creating a tonnage in ships, brigs, schooners, sloops, and steamboats, valued at $2,399,600. Since 1830, a commerce at the single port of Cleveland, had been created of the annual value of upwards of $50,000,000. Such was the character of the document sent to us by the President, and to which he invites "our consideration and action." Does this look like opposition to this system of improvements? Does it indicate a spirit of hostility either to the Cumberland road or to harbors? As the particular friend of the latter, I am glad of such opposition. It will do more than has ever yet been done to induce the country to urge these works to completion.

Those of the Opposition who are friendly to these improvements, were doing the President great injustice. He has sent to us the best report that ever came from the head of the Executive, and yet they are dissatisfied because the estimates were not to be found in the annual report from the Treasury. They are not there, because they were not completed when the Treasury document was made out. But they are before us now, and with the sanction of the President. What more do gentlemen want? What more would they have? It seems to me that they ought to be satisfied. But no; the President can do nothing that will satisfy them. If he includes the estimates for such works in the annual budget, he is forthwith charged with recommending extravagance, and with wishing to extend Executive patronage. If they are omitted in the budget, and sent up by the proper Department, according to the practice of the Departments, then comes the cry of opposition to all improvements. Sir, the spirit of opposition to this Administration rides over the best interests of the country.

I now come to that portion of my remarks which relate to the original proposition, as well as to the amendment. It must be well known to every member of the House that the expenditures of this Government are in a great degree confined to the Atlantic States. In those States, we expend $5,000,000 annually in creating and supporting a navy. We expend other millions on fortifications and custom-houses, and in giving protection to commerce. In those States, nearly all our munitions of war are manufactured, and there are paid out and expended the salaries of most of our public officers, civil and military. The great body of our legislation has been for the immediate benefit of these States. Congress seldom looks westward, except when some question in regard to the public domain is under consideration. This is a natural condition of things. The power of the House rests with the States of the Atlantic, but it will not be with them always. Another census will show, that

"Westward the star of empire takes its way."

There has been of late much speculation as to the probable effects upon our prosperity of the large indebtedness of the States. It has been said that the interest on a debt of $200,000,000 will drain us of our resources. There is no doubt that the payment of $10,000,000 of interest annually, to a foreign power, will have a sensible effect upon our prosperity. It will create a dependence upon foreign capitalists and foreign banking institutions; but this dependence will not be as great as that of the West upon the Atlantic States, by reason of the operations of this Government.

In 1834, the expenditures of the Government were $24,601,982; for the civil list, $4,404,728; the military, $10,061,427; naval affairs, $3,956,260; and for the payment of the public debt, $6,176,565. The receipts for the same year, were $21,701,935, of which $16 214,957 were from customs, and $4,857,600 from the public lands. The appropriations for that year, according to a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, were $1,111,000 in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Computing the population of the Union, for that year, at 15,000,000, and that of these States at 2,200,000, and there was paid into your Treasury, by these States, for customs, the sum of $2,378,193, being $1,267,193 more, for customs alone, than was expended in those States. In the same year there was paid into the Treasury from those States, for the sale of public lands, the sum of $1,346,989. Admitting that those States paid but one-half of the amount received for public lands within their borders, and they paid into your Treasury, for customs and lands alone, the sum of $3,051,687, being $1,940,587 more than was expended in those States. But the whole expenditure for the Union amounted to $24,601,982, which would give to those States the sum of $3,608,290, whereas they received but the sum of $1,111,000. So much for the receipts and expenditures for the year 1834, and their operation upon the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

We come now to the year 1839, when the population of the Union may be estimated at 17,000,000, and that of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, at 3,000,000. During the past year there were no special expenditures in either of these States, so that the whole of the appropriations resulting immediately to the benefit of these States could not exceed $1,000,000. The whole of the appropriations of the Government amounted to $37,217,812, which, if paid equally by all our population, would give to these four States, as their proportion, the sum of $6,567,849. In other words, they paid into your Treasury $6,567,849, and received from the same $1,000,000. But as this calculation may be objected to on account of the receipts from other sources than lands and customs, my remarks will be confined to the two latter. For the first three quarters of 1839, the receipts from customs were $18,328,392, and for the last quarter they may be estimated at not less than $2,500,000, giving the sum of $20,828,393 for the year. Of this sum the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, must pay $3,675,600. There has been collected in these States for public lands, during three quarters of the year, the sum of $2,234,265; and supposing one-half this sum to be paid by citizens of those States, and there has been taken from their pockets, for lands during three quarters of the year, and for customs during the whole year, the sum of $4,792,732, and directly returned to them, in the form of appropriations, the sum of $1,000,000. Add this heavy balance to the interest which those States are paying to Europe on State indebtedness, and we have a sufficient cause for the derangement of their currency; for the low price of all the products of labor and for the general pecuniary distress which pervades that whole section of country. Without a national debt, these States are placed in the situation that the South and West were in 1820, when Mr. Crawford, in a report to the House of Representatives, on banks and currency, said:

> In the West and in the South, the complaints of a deficient currency have been most distinctly heard. In the latter, these complaints are of recent date. In both, they proceed in a greater degree from the disbursement of the public revenue, than from any other cause. The great mass of public expenditure is made to the east of this city. The revenue accruing from imports, though principally collected in the Middle and Eastern States, is paid by the great mass of consumers throughout the United States. That which is paid for the public lands, although in some degree drawn from every part of the Union, is principally paid by the citizens of the West and the South. The greatest part of the revenue accruing from the public lands, as well as that collected in the Southern States upon imposts, has been transferred to the Middle and Eastern States to be expended. The necessity of making this transfer, arises from the circumstance that the great mass of the public debt is held in those States, or by foreigners, whose agents reside in them; and from the establishments of dock yards and naval stations in their principal ports. This transfer will continue to be necessary until the public debt shall be extinguished, and until the other expenditures of the Government can, consistenly with the public interest, be more equally distributed.

Notwithstanding this sectional inequality in the appropriations, I am disposed, Mr. Speaker, to vote liberal supplies for the defences of the country, for the support of the army and navy, and the public works. Will the Atlantic States be actuated by a similar liberality? When the West brings forward objects for which expenditures are expedient, will those States give to them a consideration commensurate to their importance? Unless this is done, the Union will be, to the West, of little advantage. If that section is to be divested of its circulating medium from year to year, without any adequate return, it does not require the spirit of divination to foresee the consequences. There is glory in belonging to the Union; there is a feeling of pride in its associations. But all these may pass away, by the infliction of burdens grievous to be borne, by forcing one section to become hewers of wood and drawers of water, in support of a Government established "to provide for the common defence, and promote the general welfare." Sir, this is not spoken in a fault-finding spirit. I am not to be thus understood. But it is to be borne in mind that the West has contributed more than its full share to the funds of the Treasury; and in asking that a portion of these funds be returned to them, and expended on constitutional objects, they are governed by a sense of justice, and a desire for "a more perfect union."

It seems to be my misfortune, Mr. Speaker, to come from a State that gentlemen are in the habit of taking for illustration. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUBBARD] has gone to Michigan to find materials for a speech, which materials could have been furnished from his own State. Hereafter he had better look at home, before going abroad to find fault with his neighbors. It has not been my habit to bring up and arraign the internal affairs of my own or any other State. Whatever the condition of politics in my own State, whether power be in the hands of Whigs or Democrats, it is my wish at all times to be the defender of her rights, and to promote her best interests. The movements of my political opponents at home will never be alluded to by me unless they are a legitimate subject for our consideration. If the time of the House is to be devoted to the party contentions of the States, we shall find ourselves upon an illimitable ocean, without helm or compass.

Mr. Speaker, I will take the liberty to assure the gentleman from Alabama that all the expenditures in Michigan have been confined to constitutional objects. All the roads were made when Michigan was a Territory. Most of them were military roads, and all of them have resulted to the great benefit of the United States. The road from Detroit to Fort Gratiot was a military road. That from Detroit to Chicago was of the same character; and also, that from Detroit to Saganaw. The latter road ought to be completed to Mackinaw. There is no way of reaching that post at present, but by Lake Huron; and yet it is the Gibraltar of Lake Michigan; and in the event of war, if well fortified and defended, will give security to the whole of Western Michigan, Northern Indiana, and Illinois, and Eastern Wisconsin. Is such a road unconstitutional? If so, all roads for military purposes are unconstitutional; for there is not a road in the Union of more importance for protection and defence. There are other roads in Michigan to which the gentleman has alluded. Some of them were constructed for military purposes, and others for the purpose of bringing the public lands into market, and giving them the value affixed by law.

An impression seems to have gone abroad that large sums of money have been expended in Michigan for internal improvements. The gentleman from Alabama has alluded to some 800 miles of road in that State, and to numerous harbor improvements, and intimated that all this had been done in a State that was a wilderness. We are not entirely a wilderness, as will be demonstrated on this floor after the next census, and as has already been demonstrated by the returns to your Treasury, from the sales of the public lands. From that State alone you have put into your Treasury $8,490,163, from 1833 to September, 1839, and $10,774,034, since your lands were first brought into market.

We have also, in common with the rest of the Union, paid our proportion of the revenue derived from the customs. And what have been the returns in the form of expenditures for legitimate objects of improvement? With a peninsular coast of seven hundred miles, there has been expended, to 1837, for internal improvement, $296,713. Let us now examine the account with Alabama. For internal improvement there is put down to that State $198,950, and for fortifications $1,358,764. Yes, sir, Alabama can have fortifications to defend her against an assailing foe, but Michigan must depend upon her stalwart arm alone for protection. Alabama had also received 400,000 acres of the public lands for the improvement of the Muscle shoals in the Tennessee river. That land is worth not less than$ 700,000. But the gentleman is willing to give up the avails of this land, and all that Alabama has received from the General Government, if we will only put an end to internal improvement. This is patriotism of a high order, and, if entirely disinterested, has my hearty commendation. But, in the present instance, there seems to be something of self-interest about it. On a map at the left of your chair, sir, is delineated the Tennessee river, Muscle Shoals, and the canal around the north bend of the shoals. Yes, sir, also a certain railroad on the south side of the river, running from Decatur to Tuscumbia, through Courtland.

The gentleman from Alabama, when at home, takes his letters and papers from the post office at Courtland. This may well account for his patriotism. It may also be accounted for on the supposition that his district is particularly interested in the railroad improvement.

[Mr. HUBBARD here said that he had opposed appropriations for such purposes long before the railroad charter was granted. That so far from the railroad interest operating in favor of his election, the contrary was the fact. He received a much larger vote in the counties where the canal was run than in those counties along the route of the railroad; not on account of the railroad or canal, but because there were more Democrats in the former counties and more Whigs in the latter. Those who sent him here would give up the donation if you would stop plundering them to carry on works of internal improvement. Yes; the State of Alabama could not only afford to surrender this donation, but give a million dollars in the bargain, if you would not take any more of their money.]

Mr. CRARY resumed. The patriotism of the people of Alabama is not to be doubted. They have accepted the donation, and they have thus given evidence of a knowledge of their true interests. I should like a similar donation for my own State; but it will not be made this session. Even a cession of the lands for a fair consideration, the favorite project of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] will find little favor with the House, as at present constituted. A change must come over us before "the sun and the moon and the eleven stars will make obeisance." "The arms of our hands must first be made strong," and honor and power must first be in our possession.

Mr. Speaker, I have thus far confined myself to the question. I have now something to say about men. Ever since the Harrisburg Convention, no speech has been delivered on this floor which has not some reference to the existing political relations of the country. This has not been in order. It is not our province to make Presidents, nor to waste the time of the House in making speeches in favor of the candidates of either political party; and yet this has been done, and to an extent that it would be almost out of order not to make a reply. I propose to reply, but not in the way that will be most agreeable to the Opposition. I shall indulge in no vituperation, and make use of no abusive epithet. These weapons belong to my political opponents.

The gentlemen from Indiana, [Mr. PROFFIT,] who occupied the floor yesterday, has brought before the House the hero of North Bend, not as he is in his old age, with mental infirmities fast thickening upon him, but as he was when in command of the Northwestern army in the last war. That gentleman has applauded the Presidential candidate of the Opposition for three great exploits: 1st, the battle of Tippecanoe; 2d, being the first to suggest the armament of the lakes; and, lastly, for the battle of the Thames. I have a few words to say on each of these subjects.

Any one who will put himself to the trouble of reading the official account of the battle of Tippecanoe, will see that General Harrison performed no great act of generalship on that occasion. From the General's own confessions, the army was encamped in an exposed position, affording "great facility to the approach of savages," and at night was completely surprised by the Indians, and only escaped destruction by the gallantry of the brave Kentuckians, and a part of the old fourth regiment from Massachusetts. But I will confine myself to the official report, that will prove all that has been asserted. It will also prove that General Harrison was the greatest egotist that ever wrote in the English language. Other generals have awarded some merit to the God of battles, but not so with General Harrison. It was "I" that did all from the morning that "I commenced my march," until "I announced that I had no intention of attacking them (the Indians) until I discovered that they would not comply with the demands that I had made—that I would go on and encamp at the Wabash." "I halted," and "I resumed MY march." "I advanced," and "I rose at a quarter after four o'clock." "I mounted MY horse, I rode to the angle that was attacked, I reinforced every part of the line, I formed the body of dragoons, I meant to pursue the enemy in their flight, but," aye, BUT, "being engaged, I did not observe it until it was too late." Yes, this would be captain of captains, did not observe the flight of the enemy "until it was too late" to pursue them.

But, Mr. Speaker, I must return to the morning of the 6th of November, when this consummate General was within eleven miles of the scene of his subsequent exploits. A march of six miles is made through open prairies, "with the infantry in two columns of files on either side of the road, and the mounted riflemen and cavalry in front, in the rear, and on the flanks," when, coming to open woods, the whole army is formed in order of battle. A company of mounted riflemen formed the advanced guard; then came the United States infantry, flanked by two companies of militia infantry and one of mounted riflemen; then comes the baggage, covered by three companies of militia infantry; and lastly comes the cavalry. We ought now to expect a fight, for the whole army is "in the order of battle." But we are doomed to disappointment. The order is given to "break off in short columns of companies," and to move slowly and cautiously along, the several corps changing position "three times in the distance of a mile." At last a creek is approached, when the order for battle again passes from column to column.

Mr. LINCOLN here raised a question, whether it was in order to discuss matters not before the House.

Mr. OGLE said no friend of Gen. Harrison feared the discussion.

Several members expressing a wish for the debate to proceed, Mr. LINCOLN withdrew his motion.

Mr. CRARY resumed, and said he did not expect to be allowed to proceed. It was to him a matter of no consequence. He thought, however, he was indulging in no greater latitude of debate than was yesterday permitted to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PROFFIT.] When Mr. P. was speaking, Mr. BRIGGS temporarily occupied the Speaker's chair. That gentleman had canvassed not only the merits of General Harrison for the Presidency, but called up the past political history of a member of the House, [Mr. WICK,] and yet no one rose and called to order, or pronounced the remarks irrelevant to the question. He was free to admit that such discussion was unprofitable; but if it was in order to make the attack, it ought also to be in order to make a reply. Were gentlemen prepared to allow of such a course of attack, and then prevent a reply? If so, evil would come out of it of no ordinary magnitude.

Mr. PROFFIT rose to explain. He appealed to the House, whether he said any thing disrespectful of his colleague. He did not intend to injure his feelings.

Mr. CRARY said he was aware that the feelings of his colleague [Mr. WICK] were not injured. But this did not justify the attack. Did the gentleman know that he would not hurt his feelings?

But, Mr. Speaker, to return to General Harrison, whom we left with his army drawn up in the order of battle. No enemy, however, appears; but, from certain indications of a hostile feeling, it is determined to encamp for the night. "Whilst I was engaged in tracing the lines for the encampment," information was received that the Indians "had answered every attempt to bring them to a parley with contempt and insolence." This was not to be borne. A refusal to answer by the Indians, caused the lines of a camp to be traced; but when they answered "with contempt and insolence," the camp lines are obliterated, the army moves forward, with "every man eager to decide the contest immediately." It moves about the width of an eighty acre lot, and then halts again, not to encamp, but to enable "I" to hold a parley with three Indians, one of them the particular friend of the Prophet. Well, what does this friend of the prophet say? Why, that an answer had been sent to Gen. Harrison's demands, but that the bearers "have unfortunately taken the road on the south side of the Wabash." What was this answer? The official report showeth it not. It only says "I answered that I had no intention of attacking them until I discovered that they would not comply with the demands which I had made." On a promise from this friend of the Prophet that no hostilities should be committed till the will of the President of the United States was explained, our hero resumes his march, and advances within one hundred and fifty yards of the town. Fifty Indians sally forth, and demand a halt. "I immediately advanced to the front, and caused the army to halt." "In a few moments the man (he friend of the Prophet) who had been with me before, made his appearance. I informed him that MY object, for the present, was to procure a good piece of ground to encamp on, where we could get wood and water. He informme that there was a creek to the northwest, which he thought would suit our purpose." * * * * "I found the ground for the encampment not altogether such as I could wish it." It was suited for regular troops, opposed to regulars, "BUT IT AFFORDED GREAT FACILITY TO THE APPROACH OF SAVAGES."

Here follows a description of the ground from the official report:

> It was a piece of dry oak land, rising about ten feet above the level of a marshy prairie in front, (towards the Indian town,) and nearly twice that height above a similar prairie in the rear, through which, and near to this bank, was a small stream, clothed with willow and other brushwood. Towards the left flank this beach of high land widened considerably, but became gradually narrower in the opposite direction, and at the distance of one hundred and fifty yards from the right flank, terminated in an abrupt point.

On this ground pointed out by an enemy, and "AFFORDING GREAT FACILITY TO THE APPROACH OF SAVAGES," were traced the lines of a night encampment, with the front and rear lines separated from each other about twenty-seven rods on the left, and fourteen rods on the right flank.

Mr. UNDERWOOD here inquired what authority Mr. C. had for saying the ground was pointed out by the enemy.

Mr. CRARY referred him to the official report, where he would find it under General Harrison's own sign manual.

But to return to the order of encampment. The front line was occupied by one battalion of United States infantry, flanked on the right by two companies of militia, and on the left by one company. The rear line was composed of the other battalion of United States infantry on the left, and four militia companies on the right. The left flank was filled up by two companies of mounted riflemen, and the right flank by one company. Two troops of dragoons were encamped in the rear of the left flank, and one troop in rear of the front line. These troops were all in single rank, and were defended by two captain's guards, consisting of eighty-eight men, and two subaltern's guards, consisting of twenty men. But as the report makes no mention either of a picket guard or of a common camp guard, it seems that this indispensable requisite of an army, encamped in an enemy's country, was entirely overlooked and omitted. This is evident, from the fact, that in the opening of the battle, some of the men were stricken down in the very doors of their tents.

We have here, sir, the camp of General Harrison when in an Indian country, and so apprehensive of an attack that "the order of encampment was the order of battle, and each man slept opposite to his post in the line." General Harrison says his order of march was "similar to that used by General Wayne." But was the order of encampment that of General Wayne, or that of any other General winning glory in Indian warfare? Did General Wayne ever encamp in an Indian country without first throwing up a breastwork either of wood or of earth? Was not this course pursued by all the early Indian fighters of New England? Such breastworks are often spoken of by her early writers, and Hubbard tells us of one case where a stone breastwork was thrown up in the midst of a fight. Did Colonel Johnson ever encamp, when in the midst of hostile Indians, without defending his camp by a breastwork? If he had, sir, his gallant little band of mounted men would never have covered themselves with glory at the battle of the Thames. In the Black Hawk war, did General Atkinson ever omit the barricade for a single night? Never. When it could not be made of wood, one of earth was thrown up. To General Harrison belongs the honor of encamping an army without breastworks, in sight of an Indian town, the inhabitants of which "HAD MANIFESTED NOTHING BUT HOSTILITY." Let the honor be his, and let his political friends write it on all their banners; but the hand writing should be one of blood—the blood of one-fourth of a most gallant and chivalrous army.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have not yet done with this camp upon "dry oak land," and surrounded by a "marshy prairie." It appears, from the official report, that the fires were built within the camp, and were burning at a quarter after four o'clock in the morning. "Our fires afforded a partial light, which, if it gave us some opportunity of taking our positions, was still more advantageous to the enemy, affording them the means of taking a surer aim." Under such circumstances, need we wonder at the slaughter that ensued? The fires were, indeed, extinguished after the battle commenced, but this proved that they should not have been built, if it proved any thing. Camp fires were necessary, but in Indian warfare they should be without the camp, if allowed to burn all night. They then gave no advantage to the enemy. On the contrary, on coming within their range, the enemy became the object of "a surer aim."

Sir, I pass over the movements of the General during the battle. I say nothing of his horseback ride in a camp with a right flank of fourteen rods; nothing of his order to Major Daviss to dislodge, with a party of dismounted dragoons, the enemy from some trees in front of four companies of United States infantry. Let others decide whether Indians could be driven from such a position by swords and pistols better than with muskets and bayonets. It is, perhaps, decided from this fact, that the dragoons were driven back with the loss of the gallant Major Daviss, and that the enemy were immediately dislodged by a company of infantry. I need not allude to the number of men engaged in battle, nearly one-fourth of whom were killed or wounded. The army, says an official letter of the 18th December, deducting dragoons, was but little over 700 men. Of these, 62 were killed, and 126 wounded. The Prophet's force amounted to 450. Of these, from 36 to 40 were left on the field. What official precision! From 36 to 40 were left on the field; but these did not comprise all the dead. The Indians were seen to take off not only the wounded, but the dead. Indians take their dead from the field in the midst of the battle! Such stories are often told, but they generally come from warriors who fight at a respectable distance, and make out their reports of the dead on supposition. In the present instance, the dead may have been taken away; for the report says, "several were found in the houses, and one, of many graves fresh dug, was opened and found to contain three dead bodies." Could all this have been done in the presence of a victorious army? Not in civilized warfare. In such a war, the conquerors bury the dead. With these facts before them, the trusty followers of the Prophet might have claimed, at least a drawn battle, and in support of their position, have pointed to the dead taken from the field, and to the fresh graves in which they were buried. But the Indian account of this battle has not been given to history. If, however, you and I had been present, Mr. Speaker, at their next great war dance, we should have heard the songs of the braves of their nation, and listened to the recital of their deeds of renown.

I have done, Mr. Speaker, with the official account of the battle of Tippecanoe. It has been converted into a victory. Let it be so recorded on the page of history. But, for the honor of the country, let there also be recorded on the same page, deeds of more enduring fame—not indeed on the part of the officers and soldiers, for they fought like men; but on the part of the General, who, without intrenching his night encampment, without the ordinary precaution against surprise, exposed these gallant spirits to sacrifice and slaughter.

The gentleman from Indiana has given to General Harrison the credit of first suggesting the armament of the lakes, in the war of 1812. If I am correctly informed, that honor belongs to another. It was first suggested by Gen. Armstrong to Governor Eustis, then Secretary of War. The letter bore date the 2d of January, 1812, and says:

Resting, as the line of Canadian defence does in its whole extent, on navigable lakes and rivers, no time should be lost in getting a naval ascendency on both; for, cæteris paribus, the belligerent, who is the first to obtain these advantages, will (miracles excepted) win the game.

Again, the same letter says:

For western defence, employ western men, accustomed to the rifle and stratagems of Indian warfare. To their customary arms add a pistol and a sabre, and to ensure celerity of movement mount them on horseback. Give them a competent leader and a good position, within a striking distance of Indian villages or British settlements. Why not at Detroit, where you have a strong fortress and a detachment of artillerists? Recollect, however, that this position, far from being good, would be positively bad unless your naval means have ascendency on Lake Erie."

In "Armstrong's Notices of the War of 1812," at page 177, is a note on the subject of the armament of the lakes, in the following words:

No efficient measures were taken by the Government to obtain a command of the lakes until October, 1812 A letter written about this time by General Armstrong to Mr. Gallatin, was probably the means of recalling the attention of the cabinet to this important subject. In this letter the General stated the following facts: "That he was informed by Captain Chauncey that as early as the month of July, Captain Woolsey had requested twenty six-pounders, of which there were more than one hundred in the navy yard unemployed; that the intention of Woolsey was to arm such vessels of commerce as could be found on the Lake and at Sackett's Harbor, with the aid of which he would be able to get a complete command of the water."

On these facts Gen. Armstrong remarked that "the object was of the highest importance; that besides giving us the advantage of an exclusive and uninterrupted use of the lakes for public purposes, it would effectually separate Upper from Lower Canada, cut asunder the enemy's line of communication, and prevent Brock and Provost from succoring each other."

Now, sir, no letter is found from Gen. Harrison on this subject until the month of December following. On the 12th of that month, he wrote to the War Department, advising the employment of naval means; or rather saying, "if the Government would employ naval means, all these objects could be accomplished in the short space of two months in the spring." But this advice, if such it could be called, was substantially revoked in his letter of the 17th of March. At this time he says:

"If there is positive certainty of our getting the command of Lake Erie, and having a regular force of three thousand five hundred, or even three thousand, well disciplined men, the proposed plan of setting out from Cleveland, and landing on the northern shore, below Malden, would, perhaps, be the one by which that place and its dependencies could be most easily reduced."

After stating his ignorance of "the preparations that were making to obtain the naval superiority upon Lake Erie," and the utter impossibility of transporting a large and undisciplined army, the General proceeds:

Although the expense and difficulty of transporting the provisions, artillery, and stores for an army round the head of the lake, would be very considerable, the lake being possessed by our ships, and the heavy baggage taken in boats along its margin, the troops would find no difficulty "in the land route."

Here, sir, are the views of a man who has been praised for being the first to suggest the armament of the lakes. Fortunately for the country, these views did not prevail. Time had lessened the influence of the General of the Northwestern army, and his suggestions were discarded. A new order was issued by the War Department for prosecuting the campaign on the plan given in March, which was, "to get command of the lakes."

But, sir, the plan of operations came near being defeated by a cautiousness amounting to timidity, I had almost said to cowardice. On the 21st of April, the General, after approving of the plan of operations presented by the War Department, says that he shall watch the movements of the enemy narrowly, "but in the event of their landing at Lower Sondusky, that post cannot be saved" The enemy did land, but not to fulfil this prophecy. The post was saved, but not by General Harrison. He had withdrawn the body of his army to Seneca, nine miles distant. Under command of the gallant Col. Croghan, a detachment of one hundred and sixty men resolved to defend the post, or die in the attempt. Sir, need I tell the result? It is written on the brightest page of our history.

Mr. Speaker, I will not allude to the determination of General Harrison to destroy his stores at Seneca, and retreat to Upper Sandusky, leaving the whole lake coast defenceless. Nor will I allude to his order to Major Croghan to abandon the fort and repair to head quarters. These I pass over; and I pass over, also, the General's official report, wherein it appears that he left this intrepid body of men to meet all the assaults of near two thousand of the enemy, and left them, too, with but "one six-pounder, seven rounds of cannon cartridges, and forty rounds of small arms."

In April, the post could not be saved; on the last days of July, he ordered it to be abandoned and burnt; but, on hearing the cannonading, he made the discovery that any attempt to storm it could be resisted with effect. He therefore remained in his camp at Seneca, without making a solitary movement, until he was informed that the enemy were retreating. He then went towards the post as fast as the dragoons could carry him, but "not an enemy was to be seen." The General then returned to Seneca, and wrote the Secretary of War that he had before informed him "that the post of Lower Sandusky could not be defended against HEAVY cannon." He had informed him that the post could not be saved at any rate; and while the battle was raging, speaking of Croghan, he said, "the blood be on his own head—I wash my hands of it."

In August the exertions of the War Department were crowned with success. Our squadron obtained command of the lakes, and, soon after, General Harrison crossed over to make an attack on Malden. When he arrived, Proctor had fled, and was not overtaken until he reached the Thames of Lake St. Clair. This happened on the 5th of October, when a battle was fought that closed the war in Upper Canada. Of late, the friends of General Harrison have claimed great honor for him on this occasion, but he does not deserve it. The glory of the victory was awarded at the time to Colonel Richard M. Johnson, and it belongs to him. His regiment of mounted men made the charge upon the British lines, and broke them to pieces. They also crossed the swamp, and fought against the Indians, without any aid from the rest of the army. The charge was suggested by Colonel Johnson; and all that General Harrison did was to give the order. I am aware that the official report gives us to understand that the plan of attack came from "a moment's reflection."

"While I," says the General, "was engaged in forming the infantry, I had directed Colonel Johnson's regiment, which was still in front, to be formed in two lines opposite to the enemy, and upon the advance of the infantry to take ground to the left, and forming upon that flank, to endeavor to turn the right of the Indians. A moment's reflection, however, convinced me that from the thickness of the woods, and swampiness of the ground, they would be unable to do any thing on horseback, and there was no time to dismount them and place their horses in security. I, therefore, determined to refuse my left to the Indians, and to break the British lines at once by a charge of the mounted infantry. The measure was not sanctioned by any thing that I had seen or heard of, but I was fully convinced that it would succeed."

This is the statement of General Harrison. Would any one imagine from it that the change in the order of battle was suggested by another? Yet such is the fact. Colonel Johnson says: "I requested General Harrison to permit me to charge." He did charge, and at such speed that the British had not time to discharge their third fire before they were totally routed.

Mr. COOPER here inquired of Mr. CRARY his authority for asserting that the order of battle was changed at the request of Col. Johnson.

Mr. CRARY referred to Armstrong's notices of the war of 1812, wherein was a letter asserting the fact, under Col. Johnson's own signature.

This battle put an end to the war in Upper Canada. In the following spring General Harrison tendered his resignation as Major General of the army. It was immediately accepted, and the vacancy filled with the name of Major General Andrew Jackson. I have seen it stated, Mr. Speaker, in a late publication of the friends of General Harrison, that this resignation was brought about by the War Department, from a spirit of malice and envy. This is a libel upon the reputation of an able, but much abused public servant. The then Secretary of War entertained no ill will towards the commander of the Northwestern army. He probably considered him an inefficient General, and was glad to supply his place with the name of him whose achievements as a warrior and civilian have filled the measure of his country's glory.

I am aware, sir, that my remarks militate against hundreds of certificates that have been produced to prove General Harrison an able commander. These certificates are entitled to consideration. But it is to be recollected that the great majority of them were given by officers over whom the General had authority. They are the evidence of witnesses under duress, and are to be received, at least with caution, before the high tribunal of the public. It is not common for generals of distinction—the heroes of battle fields—to go about the camp to obtain certificates of good conduct. At Austerlitz, and Jena, and Marengo, Napoleon needed no such endorsement of his fame; nor did Nelson, at Copenhagen, at Aboukir, and at Trafalgar. It was reserved for General Harrison to establish the precedent of obtaining certificates from subaltern officers to prove himself a warrior and a hero

Mr. Speaker, I have done with General Harrison. He is now the Whig candidate for the Presidency, and his friends expect to succeed by inspiring in his behalf a military enthusiasm throughout the country. They are doomed to disappointment. They may raise the pæan shout in glorification of their hero, but it will meet with no response from the hearts of the millions.

REMARKS OF MR LEET,

OF PENNSYLVANIA.

In the House of Representatives, March 20, 1840.—The bill for the relief of Sylvester Phelps and the heirs of Charles Landon being under consideration in Committee of the Whole, (Mr. DAVEE in the chair,) a motion was made by Mr. PETRIKIN to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. LEET said: He desired to make a remark or two in reply to his friend and honorable colleague, [Mr. PETRIKIN.] He would not incline to do so, did he not suppose his colleague labored under a misapprehension in regard to the controlling and leading facts upon which the claim of the persons named in the bill was predicated. The report, it is true, has been read at the Clerk's desk; but, since that, and pending the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] I have read (said Mr. L.) the report, and now have it before me. Mr. Chairman, I am free to say, that I am one of those who are desirous, and feel it a duty, to scrutinize all these private claims that come before Congress. It is right we should do so: no man will gainsay it. But I am utterly unwilling that my solicitude to protect the Government should prevent me from doing ample and full justice to individual claimants, who demonstrate before us that their demands are fair. If this claim be a just one, as I believe it is, I hold we are bound, by every principle that should govern men, or associations of men, to pay it. It is magnanimous, in a great and powerful nation, to see that justice is done to private claimants. It is, however, objected against this bill, that the claim is a stale one: the property, for the destruction of which, by the soldiery of the United States, as is alleged, indemnity is sought, having been destroyed as far back as 1815. Is this a valid objection? Shall it prevail? Ought it to prevail? I unhesitatingly say, no. Why, sir, it is well known to members of Congress—it is known to every man in the country, that it is an exceedingly arduous and tedious process to get a bill granting relief to individuals through both Houses of Congress. Many causes, which we cannot control, combine always to make the tediousness of the progress of a private bill in Congress heartsickening and discouraging to the persons to be benefited thereby, and their only consolation is, that tardy justice will sometime or other come. If bills that ought to pass do not become laws for a series of years, as is the case, I believe, in many instances, it is not the fault of the claimants. Where a claim has been regularly followed up from Congress to Congress, I cannot agree that the mere lapse of time shall constitute any reason against its ultimate liquidation. I do not conceive that the Government is bound by any law of limitations, either written or unwritten. The only proper inquiry is, is the demand a just one? I know of one claim that has been before Congress upwards of thirty years. It seems to me to be just, and I frankly confess that it never occurred to me that the circumstance of the great lapse of time since it ought to have been paid, constituted any sort of objection to the payment of it. But I shall say no more upon this point. What, Mr. Chairman, are the material facts in the present case? They are few, but strong and satisfactory. It seems that in 1815 the house of the persons named in the bill, was taken possession of by United States soldiers, in pursuance of an order of one of the United States officers, not only without the assent of the owners, but against their express wish; that during the occupancy of the house by the soldiers, an unusually large fire was made, and continued for some time. The heat became so intense as to communicate to the wood, and the house was burnt down. The fire, it is true, was not discovered for ten or twelve hours after the soldiers had left. Now, sir, so far as this bill is concerned, the only and material question for our determination is, did this destruction of property occur from any wilfulness or negligence on the part of the owners, or was it the consequence of the doings of the United States soldiers? From the facts stated in the report of the committee, and I take them as correct, I think no gentleman will, upon due consideration, doubt as to how and by what means the burning happened. It was not mere accident; it was not a matter with which the owners appear to have had any connection whtaever; but was occasioned by the carelessness, to use the mildest phrase, of the United States soldiers. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion the bill ought to pass, and shall accordingly cast my vote for it.

REMARKS OF MR. PETRIKIN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

In the House of Representatives, March 6, 1840—In reply to Messrs. BARNARD and FILLMORE of New York, and Mr. POPE of Kentucky, on the appeal taken by Mr. FILLMORE from the decision of the Chair, declaring Mr. F. out of order in discussing a proposition growing out of the New Jersey contest.

Mr. PETRIKIN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It may be thought a bold move in a plain, uneducated countryman like myself, to rise in opposition to two learned lawyers and one Governor. There is, indeed, a fearful odds against me, if I am to judge from the reputation which they have acquired among their own partisans; but, sir, silence would imply assent to their charges and opinions, and to leave them uncontradicted would be criminal. When duty dictates I am bound to obey; and shall therefore ask the indulgence of the House while I attempt to answer what has been said by those learned gentlemen.

The first gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] who addressed the House, had worked himself into a passion, and attempted to drive us from our position by a storm of epithets and hard words. He accused the majority of this House of tyranny, despotism, and oppression—scarecrows, which we have so often heard iterated and reiterated by that gentleman and the party with which he acts in this House, that we have ceased to be frightened. The gentleman particularly complained that I had been frequently instrumental in making him take his seat, by calling him to order, and says "if he expects to speak hereafter, he must ask my leave." I would have been much gratified if my calls to order had been successful in inducing him to cease violating the rules of this House and all the laws made to govern parliamentary bodies; but I regret that I am compelled to say that although my efforts have been backed by the decision of the Speaker, and that decision sustained by the majority of the House, I have been, so far, unsuccessful in my efforts. That gentleman rarely addresses the House in order; and often perseveres in his speech in defiance of the requests and commands of the Speaker and the decision of the House. Yet, in the face of all this, we hear him rise in his place and complain that he is gagged, and deprived of his rights as a Representative and a citizen. I appeal to every candid man who now hears me, and to the records of the proceedings of this House, in verification of the truth of what I assert.

The gentleman in his ardor to assert his own rights, always forgets that he is violating the rights of others. Is not every violation of the rules of order a violation of the rights of other members? Is not the occupation of the time allotted by the rules of this House for the consideration of the private claims of persons from every quarter of this Union, a violation of their rights? And yet the gentleman complains that his rights are violated. Does the gentleman suppose he can justify himself here, or before the country, in occupying yesterday and to day in making speeches for mere party purposes? Will the gentleman coolly and calmly ask himself whether he thinks he will be justified in his course of conduct, when he must know that its effect is to prevent hundreds of claims from being acted upon, about which there can be no dispute, and for which the individuals claiming have been praying Congress, every session, for years, to settle?

Mr. Speaker, the object I had in view, when I moved the question of order, was to preserve the time allotted for the consideration of private bills, many of which had been examined and reported by committees, as presenting claims, which were just beyond dispute. Not only has this been the case at this session, but many of them have been for years past presented to Congress, but neglected, because the time allotted for their consideration had been consumed in speech-making—in debate, which was worse than useless. We are now, Mr. Speaker, in the fourth month of this session, and not one hour has been devoted to the consideration of private bills. We see upon our tables, day after day, reports and bills for the relief of individuals, many of whom are now suffering, and who have been soliciting Congress for twenty years to pass upon their just claims; but now, when, for the first time this session, they are reached, we are prevented from acting on them by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] starting a question of no interest to any one—I will not say "it is done for the vilest political purposes," as Mr. SMITH of Connecticut said of my political friends, but I will say for no other purpose than to enable him to occupy the time of the House in making a speech on the New Jersey contested election—a subject that he and the partisan lawyers in this body who act with him have each made one or two, and some of them three, speeches upon, going over the same story, without advancing one new idea, or eliciting or developing a single fact to elucidate or throw new light upon the subject in dispute. The gentleman being himself snug, warm, and comfortably fixed, and well fed with the good things of this world, forgets the hunger, cold, and other privations, which many of those are now experiencing, whose just claims are before the House, and the action on which is being delayed, in consequence of his course. It is too often the case that we forget, or do not think of, what we do not feel or see. If it were otherwise, our actions would often be very different from what they are.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] has been occupying the floor of this House at least one half of the session of yesterday and to-day, and yet, in the very face of this fact, complains that he is gagged, and not permitted to speak. I should like to know from him, if he calls this being gagged, what would be the consequence if his gag was removed? I suppose he would occupy the whole time of the House, and then complain that it was not sufficiently long to satisfy his loquacious disposition. So much for the first lawyer, and his windy war of words.

Now, sir, I will briefly notice the second lawyer, the gentleman from New York, [Mr BARNARD,] on my left, who endeavors, by a lengthy statement of what he calls facts, to get around the laws made for the government of this House. I am no lawyer, but I have some little knowledge of how exceptions are taken to opinions delivered by law judges, and must beg leave to object to the reception of the gentleman's statement, although it took himself and two other learned lawyers so long to concoct it. I appeal to every lawyer in this House, if ever they saw a string of facts embodied in a bill of exceptions to the opinion of a judge, delivered on a simple point of law, particularly where the pretended facts only existed in the fertile imaginations of the gentlemen who drew the bill. I must beg leave to protest against the lumbering of the journals with such stuff, or permitting such innovations on the long and established practice of this House.

I shall now give my attention to my third opponent, the Governor, [Mr. POPE of Kentucky,] who attacks us by dealing out "soft sawder" to the Speaker, which might do if the gentleman was selling wooden clocks to an old woman, but certainly can have little effect with the Speaker, to induce him to alter his decision in this case. I am satisfied that the gentleman himself was only carried away by his sympathy for, and zeal to help his party friend out of his difficulty, and get the GAG out of his mouth, of which he has so bitterly complained.

I know the gentleman from Kentucky will, when he reflects, see the impropriety of his political friends' interfering with the time set apart for the relief of claimants, such as wounded and disabled soldiers and seaman, or the widows and orphans of those who have died or been killed in the service of their country. I know him to be a person of humane and good feelings, and feel confident, when he coolly looks at this matter, that he will see that his friends are in the wrong, and that the gentleman from New York has no reason to complain of tyranny or oppression, but that those, the business of whom he prevents action upon, have a right to complain of him.

The gentleman from Kentucky also complains that I stop persons on the floor from speaking as often and as long as they wish. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would not be under the necessity of doing so, if those gentlemen would conform to the rules and orders of the House—if they would not be obnoxious to the charge of being out of order.

The gentleman from Kentucky complains because a majority in this House have used the gag law to prevent useless talking, and stop idle debate; but he forgets to say any thing about the gag law which his political friend from Kentucky, in another part of this building, wished to inflict on the country to gag freemen, and prevent their thinking, speaking, and exercising their constitutional privileges. That gag law would, in the estimation of him and his political friends, be right and proper, though it would bind the freemen of the country hand and foot to the car, and force them to gratify the sordid ambition of their political leaders.

O! yes; I have no doubt but those very persons who are now so vehement in their remonstrances and denunciations against gag laws, tyranny, and oppression, would be not only much gratified if the Kentucky gag law was passed, but as loud in praises of it as they now are in denouncing all restraints upon their lawless and disorderly course in this House.

The gentleman from Kentucky objects to the use of the previous question in this House, and particularly points me out as the most frequent mover of it. How the fact last stated is, I do not know. The previous question is essential to getting any business of the country done, and I consider it an imperative duty (not at all times a pleasant and agreeable one) to move it whenever I think it can be seconded; and I would inform gentlemen that threats, denunciations, sneers, ridicule, or epithets, will not cause me to shrink from what I consider my duty. I shall in all cases act as I deem right, regardless of the opinions of others.

I will not follow the gentleman to Tippecanoe, nor undertake to contradict him as to the matter which appears to be uppermost in the mind of every one of the party with which he acts, (if we are to judge by their introducing it into every debate.) I mean their attempts to palm Gen. Harrison on the people for a wise and brave man. It is not necessary for me, or any one else, to do so. History, and the facts on record, disprove all they assert on this subject, and the people are not so easily duped as they imagine, by their system of puffing.

I am at a loss to know what the gentleman from Kentucky means by the term "slang whang." If he means granting a request made of me by himself, I then undersand it. I have always found the gentleman kind and courteous in my communications with him, and I have always endeavored to be equally so in return, when I could do so without a violation of my duty as a Representative.

The gentleman from Kentucky begs the Speaker to reconsider his decision and reverse it. I can assure the gentleman it is too late for the Speaker to grant his request, however earnestly made, if he were even disposed to do so. The House has decided the question in part, and put it beyond the reach of the Speaker. I hope this will not be a fresh source of accusation against the Speaker as being "an instrument of tyranny and oppression;" an expression used, if I am not mistaken, by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] in his remarks on this question.

I will now briefly notice the question before the House, and then conclude. I made the objections to the discussion of the question of reconsideration during the time allotted for private bills, with the view I before stated. I believed the decision of the Speaker was wrong or I would not have appealed. I never occupy the time of the House with frivolous questions, merely for the purpose of preventing the business of the country being done; nor will I, if in my power to prevent it, suffer others to do so. There is a difference between the question of order I brought before the House and that decided by the Speaker and sustained by the House some days since, on the appeal from the decision by a gentleman from New York. In that case there was no special order; nor did it interfere with the business allotted for any particular day. In this case the rules of the House particularly and specifically assign the Friday and Saturday of each week, after the morning hour, to the consideration of private bills, and that, I allege, cannot be dispensed with or set aside except by a motion to adjourn, or by a vote of two-thirds of the members present. I also think the Speaker is wrong in entertaining the point of order made by the gentleman from N. York, [Mr. F.] during the pendency of the question on my appeal before the House; and I consider a motion to lay a question of order on the table is not in order at any time, but particularly when the Chair has received two motions as points of order and two appeals from his decision. I do conceive that that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FILLMORE,] is the last man in the House that ought to complain of the Speaker, who has treated him with great indulgence and courtesy, and only interrupted him after repeated calls to order from every quarter. With these remarks I shall leave the subject to the decision of the House.

REMARKS OF MR. BUCHANAN, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

In Senate, Tuesday, March 3, 1840—On the speech of Mr. DAVIS of Massachusetts against the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. PRESIDENT: I rise to perform a painful but imperious duty, which I owe to myself. The speech which I lately delivered in favor of the Independent Treasury bill has been made the subject of criticism and censure in another part of this Capitol; under what rule of order I confess I cannot comprehend. In some portions of the country, at public meetings and in the public press, I have been denounced as the enemy of the laboring man, and have been charged with a desire to reduce his wages, and depress his condition to that of the degraded serfs of European despotisms. Sentiments have been attributed to me, which I never uttered, and which my soul abhors. I repeat, what I declared in that speech, that if I could believe for a moment that the Independent Treasury bill would prove injurious to the laboring man, it should meet my unqualified opposition.

I had intended to embrace the first opportunity which presented of doing myself justice upon this subject. Business called me away, and I was absent whilst the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] addressed the Senate on the resolutions now before it. I understood that he had referred to the wages of labor, in no offensive terms to me, however; but in such a manner as to have presented the opportunity which I so much desired. When the Senator from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE] afterwards alluded to the same subject, the debate had assumed a personal character, and I was not the man to interfere against him in such a contest. He had said nothing which could excite any disposition on my part to pursue such a course.

Had I obtained the floor at any time during the last week, my explanation would have been short and simple. The means, and the only means, by which it was alleged that I had sought to reduce the wages of labor to the standard of the hard money despotisms of Europe, was, by the introduction of an exclusive metallic currrency into this country. Now, to such a radical change in our currency, I have ever been opposed. I have avowed my opposition repeatedly upon this floor and elsewhere; and never more distinctly than in my late speech in favor of the Independent Treasury. My motto has always been to reform, not to destroy the banks: and I have endeavord to prove—with what success, I must leave the public to judge—that such a radical reform in these institutions as would prevent violent expansions and contractions of the currency, and thus enable them always to redeem their notes in specie, would prove eminently beneficial to all classes of society, but more especially to the laboring man.

On Saturday evening last a message was sent me by a friend, requesting me to examine the published speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS] and suggesting that it contained an erroneous statement of the arguments which I had used in favor of the Independent Treasury bill. I examined his speech in the National Intelligencer, having never read it before, and I confess it struck me with the utmost astonishment. I found that, throughout, he had attributed to me arguments in favor of the bill which I never used; nay more, that the objections to the bill, which I had endeavored to combat, had been imputed to me as the very arguments which I urged in its favor.

I shall proceed to make some remarks upon his speech. In performing this duty, it is my sole purpose to justify myself, without feeling the slightest disposition to do him injury.

In my remarks I urged the passage of the Independent Treasury Bill, because it would separate the banks from the Government, and would render the money of the people always secure, and always ready to promote their prosperity in peace and to defend them in war. Great as are the advantages, direct and incidental, which the country will derive from the passage of this bill, I knew that it could accomplish little or nothing, towards reforming our paper currency, or restraining the banks within safe limits. This opinion I have declared upon all occasions, and never more emphatically than in my late speech. I stated that the additional demand for gold and silver which it might create would not exceed five millions of dollars per annum, according to the President's estimate; and that although this might compel the banks to keep more specie in their vaults in proportion to their circulation and deposites, yet that it would prove but a very inadequate restraint upon excessive banking. Nay, more; I plumed myself upon the fact that I had been the first to suggest the amendment requiring the holders of Treasury drafts to present them for payment to the depositaries with as little delay as possible, for the express purpose of saving the banks from the injury which might be inflicted upon them by locking up a large surplus of revenue in gold and silver in the vaults of the depositaries. And I endeavored to prove, not only by my own arguments, but by the authority of one of the most distinguished financiers that this country has ever produced, that the banks never could be injured by the adoption of the Independent Treasury bill, unless in the event of a large surplus revenue, which would not probably soon occur. I also stated that it would thus become their interest, as it already was that of the rest of the community, to prevent the accumulation of such a surplus. In referring to the blessings which would flow to the laboring man from the existence of a sound mixed currency, whose basis should be gold and silver, I expressly declared that the bill would exercise no great influence in producing this desirable result.

Again, in speaking of the effect which this measure would produce in reducing the amount of our imports—a consummation devoutly desired by all—what was my argument? That the bill would, in some degree, especially after June, 1842, diminish our imports; because we should then have a system of cash duties, which would operate as an encouragement to our domestic manufactures.

One of the great objects of my speech was to answer the objections which had been urged against the Independent Treasury bill, by proving that it would not injuriously influence the business of the country in the manner which had been predicted by its enemies; and especially that it would produce little or no effect upon the sound and solvent banks of the country. I thought I had succeeded. It certainly never entered into my conception that any person on the face of the earth could so far have mistaken my meaning as to attribute to me arguments in favor of the bill, as directly opposite to those which I urged as darkness is to light.

You may judge, then, Mr. President, of my astonishment, when, in the very second paragraph of the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, I read the following sentence:

"The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] with his usual acknowledged ability, and the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] following in his track, have advanced the propositions that the embarrassments and distress with which the country has been grievously afflicted for several years past, and which now paralyze all its energies, are imputable to the pernicious influence of bank paper, that this bill [the Independent Treasury bill] contains the necessary corrective, as it will check importations of foreign goods, suppress what they call the credit system, and by restoring a specie currency, reduce the wages of labor and the value of property. This is the character given to the measure by its friends; and alarming as the doctrines are, I am gratified that they are frankly avowed."

Now, sir, I openly declare, in the face of the Senate and the world, not only that no such doctrines were ever avowed by me, but that these remarks of the Senator are palpable, I will not say intentional, misrepresentations both of the letter and spirit of my speech.

What! sir, to attribute to me the remark, that this bill, by applying the necessary corrective to the pernicious influence of bank paper," "and by thus restoring a specie currency," will produce the disastrous consequences which he has enumerated; when a considerable portion of my argument was devoted to prove that the bill would produce no injurious effect whatever upon the sound and solvent banks of the country. Nay, more, that it would exert but a very trifling influence, indeed, if any, even in restraining within safe limits their loans and issues. Now, sir, it may be very ingenious; but it is certainly not very fair to put into the mouth of a friend of the bill, as arguments in its favor, the strongest objections which have been urged against it by its enemies. These would be so many admissions of its fatal consequences, and they would be he stronger when converted into arguments in its favor by one of its friends. Against the whole current of my remarks—against my express and reiterated declarations, both upon this and former occasions, that I was no friend to an exclusive hard money currency, but was in favor of well regulated State banks, how could the Senator be so far mistaken as to sit down and deliberately write that I had urged in favor of this bill, that it would restore a specie currency, and thereby reduce the wages of labor and the value of property? I leave it for him to answer the question according to his own sense of justice towards a brother Senator who had never done him harm.

But the Senator does not stop here. Throughout his whole speech he imputes to me the use of such arguments in favor of the bill as I have stated, and dwells upon them at length—arguments which, if I had ever used, would prove conclusively that I was an enemy of the bill which I professed to advocate, and that scarcely even in disguise. This is the light in which he presents me before the world. Towards the conclusion of his speech, he caps the climax. He says:

"To follow out the case I have supposed: The income of every man, except the exporter, is to be reduced one-half in the value of wages and property, while all foreign merchandise will cost the same, which will obviously, in effect, double the price, as it will take twice the amount of labor, or twice the amount of the products of labor, to purchase it."

"I do not ascribe this power to the bill; but it is enough for me that its friends do. What response will the farmers. mechanics. manufacturers, and laborers make to such a flagitious proposition?"

And all this the Senator says in a professed reply to me. He thus charges me with having ascribed to the Independent Treasury bill the power of reducing the income of every man in the country "one half, in the value of wages and property." Had I contended in favor of any such power, well might the Senator have said it was "a flagitious proposition." He would almost have been justified in the use of a term so harsh and unparliamentary.

Self-respect, as well as the respect which I owe to the Senate, restrains me from giving such a contradiction to this allegation as it deserves. It would surely not be deemed improper, however, in me, if I were to turn to the Senator, and apply the epithet which he himself has applied to the proposition he imputes to me, and were to declare that such an imputation was a "flagitious" misrepresentation of my remarks.

So far from imagining that the Independent Treasury bill would restore to the country a metallic currency, I believed that it would exercise but a slight influence in restraining the excesses of the banking system. Other and much more efficient remedies must be adopted by the several States to restrain these excesses and thus to prevent future suspensions. In my remarks, I stated distinctly what legislation would, I thought, be required to accomplish this purpose. In the first place, I observed that the banks ought to be compelled to keep in their vaults a certain fair proportion of specie compared with their circulation and deposites; or, in other words, a certain proportion of immediate specie means, to meet their immediate responsibilities. 2d. That the foundation of a specie basis for our paper currency should be laid by prohibiting the circulation of bank notes, at the first, under the denomination of ten, and afterwards under that of twenty dollars. 3d. That the amount of bank dividends should be limited. 4th. And above all, that, upon the occurrence of another suspension, the doors of the banks should be closed at once, and their affairs placed in the hands of commissioners. A certainty that such must be the inevitable effect of another suspension, would do more to prevent it than any other cause. To reform and not to destroy, was my avowed motto. I know that the existence of banks and the circulation of bank paper, are so identified with the habits of our people that they cannot be abolished, even if this were desirable.

Such a reform in the banking system as I have indicated, would benefit every class of society; but above all others, the man who makes his living by the sweat of his brow. The object at which I aimed by these reforms was not a pure metallic currency, but a currency of a mixed character; the paper portion of it always convertible into gold and silver, and subject to as little fluctuation in amount as the regular business of the country would admit. Of all reforms, this is what the mechanic and the laboring man ought most to desire. It would produce steady prices and steady employment, and, under its influence, the country would march steadily on in its career of prosperity without suffering from the ruinous expansions and contractions and explosions which we have endured during the last twenty years. What is most essential to the prosperity of the mechanic and laboring man? Constant employment, steady and fair wages, with uniform prices for the necessaries and comforts of life which he must purchase, and payment for his labor in a sound currency.

Let us in these particulars compare the present condition of the laboring man under the banking system which now exists, with what it would be under such reforms as I have indicated. And first, in regard to constant employment. What is the effect of the present system of bank expansions and contractions, and revulsions, in this particular? Is it not absolutely certain, has not experience demonstrated, that under such a system, constant employment is rendered impossible? It is true that, during the short period whilst the bubble is expanding and the banks are increasing their loans, and their issues, labor of every kind finds employment. Then buildings of all sorts are erected, manufactories are established, and the carpenter and the mason, and other mechanics, are in demand. Public works are prosecuted and afford employment to an immense number of laborers. The tradesman of every description then finds customers, because the amount of paper in circulation produces a delusive appearance of prosperity and promotes a spirit of extravagance. But, sir, under this system, the storm is sure to succeed the sunshine; the explosion is certain to follow the expansion; and when it comes—and we are now suffering under it—what is then the condition of the mechanic and the laboring man? Buildings of every kind cease, manufactories are closed; public works are suspended, and the laboring classes are thrown out of employment altogether. It is enough to make one's heart bleed to reflect upon their sufferings, particularly in our large cities, during the past winter. In many instances the question with them has not been what amount of wages they could earn, but whether they could procure any employment which would save them and their families from starvation. If our State Legislatures, which alone possess the power, would but regulate our bloated credit system wisely, by restraining the banks within safe limits, our country would then be permitted to proceed with regular strides, and the laboring man would suffer none of these evils, because he would receive constant employment.

In the second place, what is the effect of the present system upon the wages of labor, and upon the prices of the necessaries and comforts of life? It cannot be denied that that country is the most prosperous where labor commands the greatest reward; but this not for one year merely—not for that short period of time when our bloated credit system is most expanded—but for a succession of years; for all time. Permanence in the rate of wages is indispensable to the prosperity of the laboring man. He ought to be able to look forward with confidence to the future, to calculate upon being able to rear and educate his family by the sweat of his brow, and to make them respectable and useful citizens. In this respect, what is the condition of the laboring man under our present system? Whilst he suffers more under it than any other member of society, he derives from it the fewest advantages. It is a principle of political economy confirmed by experience, that whilst the paper currency is expanding, the price of every thing else increases more rapidly than the wages of labor. They are the last to rise with the expansion, and the first to fall with the contraction of the currency. The price of a day's or of a month's labor of any kind—the price of a hat, of a pair of boots, of a pound of leather, of all articles of furniture, in short, of manual and mechanical labor generally, is fixed and known to the whole community. The purchaser complains when these fixed prices are enhanced, and the mechanic or laborer, in order to retain his customers, cannot, and does not raise his price until he is compelled to do it by absolute necessity. His meat, his flour, his patatoes, clothing for himself and his family, mount up to an extravagant price long before his compensation is increased. It was formerly supposed that the productions of meat and flour were so vast in our extended and highly favored land, that a monopoly of them would be impossible. The experience of the last two or three years has proved the contrary. The banks, instead of giving credit in small sums to honest men, who would have used the money wisely, in promoting their own welfare, and, as a necessary consequence, that of the community, have loaned it to monopolists, to enable them to raise the price of the necessaries of life to the consumer. Have we not all learned that a million of dollars has been advanced by them to an individual, for the purpose of enabling him to monopolize the sale of all the beef consumed in our Eastern cities? Do we not all know that this effort proved successful during the last year in raising the price of this necessary of life to twelve and sixteen cents, and even higher, per pound. Now, sir, although the wages of the laboring man were then nominally high, what was his condition? He could not afford to go into the market and purchase beef for his family. If his wages increased with the increasing expansion of our credit system, aggravated in its effects by the immense sales of State bonds in Europe, still the prices of all the necessaries of life rose in a greater proportion, and he was not benefited. I might mention, also, the vast monopoly of pork produced by a combination of individuals extending from Boston to Cincinnati, which, by means of bank facilities, succeeded in raising the price of that necessary of life to an enormous pitch. What then did the laborer gain, even at the time of the greatest expansion? Nothing—literally nothing. The laborers were a suffering class, even in the midst of all this delusive prosperity. Instead of being able to lay by any thing for the present day of adversity, which was a necessary consequence of the system, the laborer was even then scarcely able to maintain himself and his family. His condition has been terrible during the past winter. In view of these facts, I said:

"All other circumstances being equal, I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that that country is most prosperous where labor commands the highest wages. I do not, however, mean by the terms 'highest wages,' the greatest nominal amount. During the Revolutionary war, one day's work commanded a hundred dollars of continental paper; but this would scarcely have purchased a breakfast. The more proper expression would be, to say that that country is most prosperous where labor commands the greatest reward; where one day's labor will procure, not the greatest nominal amount of a depreciated currency, but most of the necessaries and comforts of life. If, therefore, you should, in some degree, reduce the nominal price paid for labor, by reducing the amount of your bank issues within reasonable and safe limits, and establishing a metallic basis for your paper circulation, would this injure the laborer? Certainly not; because the price of all the necessaries and comforts of life are reduced in the same proportion, and he will be able to purchase more of them for one dollar in a sound state of the currency, than he could have done, in the days of extravagant expansion, for a dollar and a quarter. So far from injuring, it will greatly benefit the laboring man. It will insure to him constant employment and regular prices, paid in a sound currency, which, of all things, he ought most to desire; and it will save him from being involved in ruin by a recurrence of those periodical expansions and contractions of the currency, which have hitherto convulsed the country."

Now, sir, is not my meaning clearly expressed in this paragraph? I contended that it would not injure, but greatly benefit the laboring man, to prevent the violent and ruinous expansions and contractions to which our currency was incident; and by judicious bank reform to place it on a settled basis. If this were done, what would be the consequence? That, if the laboring man could not receive as great a nominal amount for his labor, as he did "in the days of extravagant expansion," which must always, under our present system, be of short duration, he would be indemnified, and far more than indemnified, by the constant employment, the regular wages, and the uniform and more moderate prices of the necessaries and comforts of life, which a more stable currency would produce. Can this proposition be controverted. I think not. It is too plain for argument. Mark me, sir, I desire to produce this happy result, not by establishing a pure metallic currency; but "by reducing the amount of your bank issues within reasonable and safe limits, and establishing a metallic basis for your paper circulation." The idea plainly expressed is, that it is better, much better, for the laboring man, as well as for every other class of society, except the speculator, that the business of the country should be placed upon that fixed and permanent foundation which would be laid by establishing such a bank reform as would render it certain that bank notes should be always convertible into gold and silver.

And yet this plain and simple exposition of my views has been seized upon by those who desire to make political capital out of their perversion; and it has been represented far and wide, that it was my desire to reduce wages down to the prices received by the miserable serfs and laborers of European despotisms. I shall most cheerfully leave the public to decide between me and my traducers. The Senator from Massachusetts, after having attributed to me the intention of reducing the wages of labor to the hard money standard, through the agency of the Independent Treasury bill, has added, as an appendix to his speech, a statement made by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. MERRICK,] of the prices of labor in these hard money despotisms; and it is thus left to be inferred that I am in favor of reducing the honest and independent laborer of this glorious and free country to the same degraded condition. The Senator ought to know that there is too much intelligence among the laboring classes in this highly favored land to be led astray by such representations.

3. Payment of wages in a sound currency. Under the present unrestricted banking system this is entirely out of the question. Nothing can ever produce this effect except the absolute prohibition of the issue and circulation of small notes. As long as bank notes exist of denominations so low as to render it possible to make them the medium of payment for a day's or a week's labor, so long will the laboring man be compelled to accept the very worst of these notes for his wages. Unless it may be at periods of the highest expansion, when labor is in the very greatest demand, notes of doubtful credit will always be forced upon him. This was emphatically the case after the explosion of the banks in 1837. He could then procure nothing for his work but the miserable shinplaster currency with which the country was inundated. This he would not lay by for a rainy day, because he did not know at what moment it might become altogether worthless on his hands. The effect of it was to destroy all habits of economy. Besides, as a class, laborers suffer more from counterfeit and broken bank notes than any other class of society. In order to afford the laborer the necessary protection against these evils, he ought always to be paid, and would, from necessity, always be paid, in gold and silver, if the issue and circulation of small notes were entirely prohibited.

Thus, it will be perceived, that without the imposition of wholesome restrictions upon the banks, the laboring man can never expect to receive either constant employment, or steady and fair wages, paid in a sound currency, or to pay uniform prices for the necessaries and comforts of life, which he is obliged to purchase. Under our present system every thing is in a state of constant fluctuation and change. Prices are high to-day, low to-morrow. Labor is in demand to-day, there is no employment to-morrow. There is no stability, no uniformity, under our present system. Of all men, laborers are the most interested in such a wise regulation of the banking system, by the States, as would prevent the violent expansions and contractions in the currency, and the consequent suspensions of specie payments under which we have been suffering.

Why, sir, under our present system, we endure the evils both of an exclusive hard money currency and a bloated paper system, without experiencing the benefits of either. The one is the inevitable consequence of the other. At the present moment we have reached a point of depression in the currency which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] considers as low, or lower, than the hard money standard. Here we are, without credit, because no man, for the prosecution of his necessary business, can procure a loan from the banks. They are now in that state of exhaustion which is the inevitable consequence of their former highly excited action. The case which Senators supposed might exist, should we suddenly adopt a hard money currency, exists already. It is now fact, and not fancy. The man who purchased a property but one year ago, in the days of the highest expansion, for two thousand dollars, and paid half the purchase money upon it, could, at this moment of depression, scarcely sell it for the remaining one thousand dollars. This is one of the greatest evils of our present ever changing system; but such things must recur and recur again forever, unless some efficient remedy shall be applied.

But the Senator from Massachusetts has appealed to the ballot box in the most solemn manner, as the means of freeing the country from the calamities which he says I have admitted would flow from the passage of the Independent Treasury bill. I unite with him most freely in this appeal. His fear of the result in his own State is probably the best excuse which he could make for the manner in which he has treated my speech. The morning is not merely dawning upon old Massachusetts; but a beautiful and brilliant Aurora is now shedding her light upon it, and giving promise of a bright and glorious day. We have at least an equal chance with the friends of the Senator, of carrying Massachusetts.

MR WEBSTER. As good a chance as we have of carrying Pennsylvania?

Mr. B. said: before I take my seat I shall answer this question; but at present I am speaking of the Senator's State. I will not venture absolutely to predict success to the cause of the Administration in Massachusetts at the next election, although my hopes are high. Year after year the cause of correct principles has been gradually advancing in that ancient and renowned Commonwealth; and such a revolution in public opinion never goes backward.

The Senator appeals to the polls, and expects that the laboring men of the country will come to the rescue. In this I venture to predict he will be entirely mistaken. He will find it to be a Herculean task to persuade the laboring man that the party with which he is identified in friendly to him and to his interests. What have we heretofore witnessed in the Senate? When the pre-emption bill was before this body, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] attempted to deprive the poor man who had fled from the oppression of Europe to seek a home in the far West from enjoying its benefits unless he were a naturalized citizen. His proposed amendment was sustained by distinguished Whig members in debate; but was voted down by the friends of the Administration. Again, sir, what party is it which, with some honorable and distinguished exceptions, has always opposed these pre-emption laws? Is not the poor man who goes into the wilderness, settles upon the public lands, erects himself a cabin, and expects to maintain and rear his family by the labor of his hands, entitled to our protection? To permit him to purchase his quarter section of land on which he has settled, at the minimum price, in preference to all others, is but sheer justice to him, and experience has proved that it diminishes the receipts of the Government but two or three cents per acre. Which is the party that has ever opposed this equitable and just principle; and, by the course which it has pursued, would afford the speculator an opportunity of enriching himself, by purchasing the house and the home of this poor settler over his head, and thus depriving him of the fruits of his honest labor? No, sir, no: the laboring men of the country know too well which party is their true friends to be persuaded to enlist under the Whig banner by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The right of suffrage is the most sacred political right which the citizens of a free Government can enjoy. Like the right of conscience, it ought ever to be regarded as a question between the individual man and his Maker, with which no human power ought to interfere, unless by convincing the reason. This is the very foundation upon which our Republican institutions rest. All men are regarded as equal in the sight of the law; and they ought all, therefore, to be equally free when they approach the ballot box. I ask, has this principle been respected in regard to the laboring man in our extensive manufactories? Have they never been told that unless they voted according to the dictation of their employers, they should be immediately discharged? Have they never even been accompanied to the polls by their employer or his agent, to see that the tyrannical mandate should be carried into execution? The man who would act in such a manner, and thus abuse the little brief authority which his station has given him over his fellow men, is at heart a despot and a tyrant. These things I have never witnessed myself, but have often heard.

I now come to answer the question propounded to me by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] in regard to the political prospects in Pennsylvania; and permit me here to say, that although I do not complain, I should not have been the first to introduce such topics upon this floor. Unlike some of my friends in the Opposition, I have made no predictions here which the result has not verified. I am, therefore, entitled to some little character as a prophet, which, small as it may be, I should be sorry to lose. The smoke which was raised by the late Whig National Convention has had time to vanish away; and we can now see objects in their true colors and just proportions. I have endeavored to view the party struggle in my own State in the light of truth, so as not to deceive myself or others; and I have had the best opportunities of acquiring correct information. I now declare that I firmly believe the Keystone State will remain true to her ancient political faith; and from present appearances, no future event can be more certain than that she will sustain the present Chief Magistrate and his principles, by a triumphant majority.

There is one circumstance which, in my opinion, renders the result absolutely certain. It was our misfortune to have been under Whig rule for a period of three years, during the administration of Governor Ritner. In what manner did that administration treat the laboring men employed upon the public works? No laboring man was permitted to remain in the employment of the State, unless he would pledge himself to support the re-election of Governor Ritner. He was deprived of the means of earning his bread by the sweat of his brow, unless he would abandon his right to feel and to think and to act, as a free and independent citizen of the Commonwealth. In many instances, the superintendents on our railroads and canals marched up to the polls at the head of numerous bands of the laborers, to enforce a compliance with the pledges which had thus been extorted from them, and to see that they voted for Governor Ritner. The election came, and Governor Ritner was defeated at the polls by a handsome majority. Immediately afterwards, it was announced from high official authority that this election should be treated as if it had never taken place. The attempt to carry this mandate into execution produced what has been most unjustly called the Harrisburg mob. A revolution was threatened, but the leaders fled from the fearful responsibility which they had assumed, at the first moment of fancied danger; and what had begun in tragedy, thus ended in broad farce.

Now, sir, I shall not say one word to the prejudice of General Harrison. It is his misfortune in Pennsylvania to be identified with the leaders of the party which I have just described. They are his chief and most prominent supporters, and were the most active and influential in procuring his nomination; and they are sufficiently heavy to drag down any candidate for the Presidency in Pennsylvania to whom they are politically bound. This very fact will lose General Harrison thousands of independent Whig votes in Pennsylvania. I trust I have now sufficiently answered the inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts.

REMARKS OF MR. DAVIS,

In Senate, March 6, 1840—In reply to Mr. BUCHANAN.

When Mr. BUCHANAN had concluded his remarks,

Mr. DAVIS rose and said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The member from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] is of opinion that I have not met one of his charges, and is pleased, in the exercise of his courtesy, to say I have evaded them, and made a false issue. Nothing can be more unjust—nothing more unjust, as I view the matter; and how far it becomes him to make such declarations, after declining to point out more distinctly his causes of complaint, you and others must judge. Sir, I have no cause for evasion or a false issue; the plain matters of fact are enough for me, and I will take care that the member does not escape from them by an issue varying much, as I think, from that made in the outset. If his opinions are scrutinized by the public—if they are found unpalatable, and the tide of public opinion rolls back upon him, he will not escape from his responsibility by turning upon me, and raising a controversy here about the influence of the sub-Treasury in introducing a hard money currency. Sir, I did not rise to retort the indecorous language of the member. Harsh epithet can add nothing to the force of truth, nor can violent language strengthen a feeble or false argument. They contribute nothing to the dignity of the Senator, are a violation of the rules of this body, and will be estimated by the public, as they are, unworthy of this place.

Why is this matter brought here at this late day? He does not question the identity of the speech I delivered here and the one in print. This he cannot do; but complains, among other things, of attacks made upon him in the public press. This is the secret of the whole matter. The country condemns his opinions on wages. The laborers are startled at the thought of being brought down to "the standard of prices throughout the world." This is the topic on which the press speaks, as far as I have met its language, and this the Senator has labored to explain by reading from his speeches; but he does not read the parts of his late speech to which I chiefly replied, and to which I have drawn his attention, but the public shall have an opportunity to read it, and judge for themselves whether it can have any interpretation but that given to it.

But the Senator now, for the first time, as far as I have heard, asserts that he did not hear the whole of my speech. Not hear it, when it was mostly a comment upon his remarks, and he present and near me! If he did not hear it all, why did he speak to me at the close as if he had? Why did he use complimentary language, which I shall not repeat in this place?

But, sir, what is the issue made now? It has dwindled down into this: The gravamen, as he expressed it, is, that I have put into his mouth words that he never used in regard to the influence which the sub-Treasury may have an introducing a specie currency. I have made him also, he thinks, too much of a hard money man. I do not, in stating his objections, pretend to use his words, for that is out of my power. In treating of this subject, he has reviewed his opinions upon banks, excessive issues of paper, a mixed currency, the reduction of the currency, and the effect on wages. Though he states the gravamen to be what I have described, yet he has thought it necessary to dwell on all these matters, and especially to labor to prove that he is in favor of banks and a mixed currency, and that he is not for coming down to hard money alone, or for reducing wages to the hard money standard. But, sir, he does not come to the point to which I have called his attention. I asked him more than once to tell me what he means in his speech, wherein, speaking of the failure in success of our manufactures and the remedy for that evil he says, among other language equally forcible: "Reduce our nominal to the real standard of prices throughout the world, and you cover the country with blessings and benefits." This, he contended, is what the interests of the manufacturers require. Yes, sir, to reduce thus the prices of production and wages. I asked him what this standard of prices throughout the world was, and whether it was not hard money. But to this no answer has been made. He does not meet the inquiry, but affirms he is for a mixed currency, and not for reducing wages to the humble pay of the serfs of Europe; but what is the meaning of this part of his speech? Has it none? or, if it has any, what is it? He is for reducing "the paper bubble," in other words, bank paper, to this standard; and this is "to cover the country with blessings and benefits." Sir, take this language in connection with what I read from the member's speech this morning, and who can halt or doubt as to the meaning.. If the sense be not that "the paper bubble" is to be reduced till the price of wages, and every thing else, comes to be as low as it is in hard money countries, then it has, in my judgment, no intelligible meaning. There is no qualifying or altering it; and yet I am charged with making him too much of a hard money man. Sir, the Senator is unconscious what language he uses about banks—a tone of severe reproof and denunciation runs through his speech against our system, which he affirms to be the worst in the world; and even now, in speaking of them, while he disclaims being a hard money man, he says they have hugged the manufacturers to death. Whatever else his printed speech contains, the parts which I read, when last up, cannot be perused without making the inference which I draw from it, and it will be so understood wherever it is read.

But, sir, the Senator, complains that I have put words into his mouth. What words have I put into his mouth? Where are they, and what are they? Is this a fair representation? I have stated his opinions, his arguments, and his views of policy, but, with the exception of one or two instances, about which I have heard no complaint, I have not pretended to use his words. This is apparent on the face of my speech, and yet he repeats that I have put words into his mouth.

He thinks I have not only made him too much of a hard money man, but have imputed to him an opinion that the bill will have a greater tendency to restrain the issues of bank paper, and to introduce hard money, than he contended for. He admits that it is to have some influence—how much does not appear. Have I not shown that he is in favor of a reduction of prices "to the standard of prices throughout the world?" Have I not shown that he contends for this as a wise policy, that we may obtain exclusive possession of our markets, and enter successfully with our manufactures and products the markets of the world, by selling as low as any country? Have I not shown that this standard of prices, as it is called, is identical, in all its effects, with the standard of prices in hard money countries? Have I not shown that this reduction in prices, both of wages and property, is proposed to be accomplished by reducing the amount of our currency till prices are brought to this standard? And have I not shown all this by the printed speech of the Senator, as put forth with his approbation? Is not the language and the conclusions irresistible? It will, it must, be so understood by all who read it.

After all this—after a delay of six weeks without complaint till the doctrine was condemned by the public, and after bringing the Senator to this point—after showing that he is in favor of German prices, and that he calls Germany emphatically a hard money country, he complains that I made him too much of a hard money man, and that I make him express the opinion that the sub-Treasury bill will bring things nearer to this result than the contended for, or believed it would. What if it should produce this result? What if it should go beyond his anticipations? What if there is a misapprehension by me of his views as to the extent of its influence—of what consequence is it? It will only carry out his views and policy more strongly than he anticipated—and that policy, he says, would "cover the country with blessings and benefits." He cannot seriously regret this, if it should turn out to be so. It is, sir, a small matter, and will be so regarded. For he will not deny that he is for a reduction of the currency, and that such a reduction, in his opinion, will reduce prices, and consequently the price of labor, for the reasoning of most of his speech goes to that point. Nor will he deny that, in his opinion, the bill tends to reduce the currency, and will thus carry out these views as far as its provisions can carry them. It is, therefore, part and parcel of this policy, and has been and is so understood every where. It is too late to come with such a complaint, as the Senator might have corrected and fixed the limit of influence he ascribed to the bill, if he had chosen to do it, on the spot, or he might have done it at this time, in unobjectionable terms, if that was his only purpose. Am I, under such circumstances, to be rebuked for inferring, that his arguments had some connection with the bill? The bill was the topic of discussion: and it is singular, when the speech was chiefly spent on banks, currency, and the reduction of prices, that we should infer that the arguments were designed to have some pertinent application to the subject? That they were designed to enforce and illustrate the policy to be introduced by the measure under consideration? If they were not urged for this purpose, for what end were they brought forward.

But, sir, my object in rising was announced in the outset to be limited to a reply to the doctrines and opinions of the Senator, and chiefly to those which related to manufacturing and labor. My attention was attracted by these, as my speech fully proves, and my object was to test their soundness, and not weigh or consider the exact influences of the bill in carrying out these doctrines and opinions. The power of the bill was a subordinate matter, and will be so considered by the public. It may answer to talk about here, but will be of little avail. Attention is and will be directed to the policy; to the reduction of wages and property advocated by the Senator. The public will be content, as I am, that he should limit the power of the bill where he pleases, while his arguments show its tendency is towards the establishment of his general policy. The doctrines and principles advanced will go out with it, and they must be subjected to scrutiny, as they cannot be shut out of view by a controversy about the probable degree of effect of the bill. The doctrines go to the German standard of prices; and at that point they will hold the Senator. But, in the opinion of the Senator, I make him a hard money man, contrary to my express admission that he is for a mixed currency. Not so. He makes himself such, against his own declarations. He takes both grounds, and I give him credit for it in my speech; and it is for him, and not for me, to harmonize the opinions.

The Senator has reiterated an isolated sentence of my speech, and again infers that I have represented him as arguing that wages and property will be reduced one-half. I have several times told him distinctly that such was not my meaning, nor was it the fair construction of the whole text. I argued simply that he was in favor of reduction, without intending to say how much. I assured him that my purpose did no go beyond that. This was due to him, for he gave a meaning to the language that was not designed to be conveyed. With this he is not content, but persists in his own construction, re-asserting it in acrimonious language. While he does this, he admits that if he had made such a proposition, it might have been justly characterized as flagitious. Now, sir, I leave you and all others to determine whether a reduction of wages and property to German prices, with labor at a few pence a day, is a descent of one-half; whether such a process reaches hard money, whether it will "cover the country with blessings and benefits," or be flagitious.

Sir, the Senator is of opinion that I would hold him and his friends up as enemies of the laborers. This again is a great mistake. I have spoken of his opinions, his statements, and his views of policy—not of his motives or feelings. I have traced his arguments out into their consequences, and left the matter there for approval or condemnation—but have neither held the Senator, or his friends, up as enemies of any body.

If I could be surprised at any thing, it would be at the tone assumed in this controversy. The Senator talks of my hectoring him, and one would think he considered me the aggressor. Sir, let all who have heard and witnessed what has passed, bear testimony to the unfounded character of such a suggestion, and to the manner in which the Senator proceeded to correct what at most could be no more than a misapprehension. The matter is unprovoked, and of the Senator's own seeking. Any misapprehension would have been cheerfully set right, if it had been pointed out in terms of courtesy. But the Senator chose to make this appeal in the way and manner in which it has been done, accompanied by language which is unparliamentary, ungentlemanly, and untrue; and let the tribunal to which he has appealed decide between us, and determine whether I have met his complaints, and whether there is the least ground to sustain his charge of misrepresentation.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, February 25, 1840.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York, adverse to the Independent Treasury bill, &c.

Mr. T. went at much length into an examination of the policy of the Administration, and the course of the Executive in relation to the Sub-Treasury bill. When in was first broached in the President's message, in 1837, it was the whole subject of the message, and in the success of this single measure was involved the success of all the measures of his Administration. He brought forward no other proposition, and it was soon made known that those who could not support this Sub-Treasury bill could not support his re-election. He (Mr. T.) was in a peculiar and trying situation. It was the first question of moment with which he had differed with the President and the supporters of his Administration. The issue was made, and the people of New York decided against the policy of the Administration. This was not deemed conclusive, and they had again, in 1838, and yet again, in 1839, pronounced their condemnation of it. They had thus passed three several times on the policy of the Executive, and, after all these decisions, his colleague, [Mr. WRIGHT,] who was the sole representative of that State on the floor of the Senate when the Independent Treasury bill was before them, had voted for its passage. Had he (Mr. T.) been similarly situated, he would have felt it his duty to have regarded the expressions of public sentiment, and have acted differently. That his colleague was the only representative of his State for so long a period, was not his (Mr. T's) fault. The political friends of his colleague had prevented an election at the last session of the Legislature. At the present it was known that a majority in both branches were opposed to the Sub-Treasury bill, and of course it was known that they would send a Senator here who would represent their sentiments and those of the people of State on this subject. He regretted that under these circumstances the bill should have been hurried through this body before the State of New York had an opportunity of being heard. He saw by the newspapers how it had been hurried through on the last evening, and when the Senator from Maryland, at a late hour in the afternoon, requested the Senate to adjourn, the usual courtesy on such occasions was denied him. He thought that such a refusal, under such circumstances, was unprecedented, in the annals of the Senate.

Mr. BENTON said the Senator was mistaken; there had been similar refusals, and under much less excusable circumstances. During the Bank panic, when the Opposition had the majority in that chamber, they attempted to break him down by physical exhaustion; and to prevent it he was compelled to resort to the use of expedients, and this was done in a sultry day in June,

Mr. TALLMADGE. This occured before his time, and was probably during the exciting debates on the removal of the deposites; but he repeated, that under the circumstances, he regretted that the bill was passed so precipitately. His colleague was chairman of the committee who had the bill in charge, and had he requested some delay on the bill, it would have been granted, and he would not have been thought chargeable with a seeming want of courtesy. His colleague was aware of his election, and should he not have waited for his arrival here, so that his Legislature and State should have had an opportunity of being heard on the bill? Though these resolutions might not have been passed at that period, it was perfectly well known they would pass, and this, it might have been expected, would have had some influence on his colleague's course, and if he had not waited for his (Mr. T's) arrival, he might at least have waited for the expression of the sentiment of the Legislature of his State, especially as his colleague professes to be of that school of politicians who recognise the right of instruction. These resolutions explain the objections to the Sub-Tteasury: they oppose it because its effect will be to produce two currencies in the country—one appreciated, and the other depreciated. The better currency of gold and silver coin will be for the officers of the Government, and the baser, of depreciated bank paper, will be for the people. Add to this the doctrines recently put forth by those in the confidence of the Executive—that it is the policy of this Administration to bring down the wages of labor in this country to a level with that received by the paupers of Europe—and it will be seen there is just cause of alarm to the friends of our free institutions.

Mr. WRIGHT said he should not have felt called upon to participate in this debate at all, had not the remarks of his colleague, in relation to the passage of the Independent Treasury bill in this body, been made personal in their application to himself; but as they had been so made, it was necessary that he should make a more minute statement of the facts, and of his own course, in relation to the action of the Senate upon that measure, than he had done upon a former occasion, when called out from the same quarter.

Preliminarily, however, he was bound to confess, though he did not pretend to be very well schooled in questions of courtesy, it did appear to his mind as somewhat singular that he should be arraigned for want of courtesy as a Senator, by one who was not, at the time the transaction complained of occurred, either present, or a member of the body. The Senate, as then constituted, was the tribunal to which he was properly, as he was willingly, responsible for the propriety or impropriety of his conduct upon that and all other occasions, when he acted here. Those who were then Senators, and were present, saw and heard, and could judge. Upon their judgments he was willing to rest the matter. To them, and to them only, was he amenable for his course: and he would now tell his colleague, as he had told him upon a former occasion, that he would not discuss, on this floor, with him or any other man, the propriety of his acts within these walls, touching any matter transacted here when the complainant was not a member of the Senate. This, he hoped, would end this matter between him and his colleague here. If the gentleman chose to discuss this, or any other topic, touching his course and conduct, elsewhere, he was at liberty to do so. The choice of the time, place, and manner, were open to him. Elsewhere, he might have rights in the matter, and he presumed he would know how to exercise them wisely, but here, he could have none.

As, however, his course upon the occasions alluded to had been characterized as "precipitate and wanting in courtesy," it was due to himself, and to those who constituted the Senate at that time, that he should detail somewhat minutely the facts in relation to the action of the body upon the Independent Treasury bill, during the present session, that his constituents and the country might know with how much propriety this charge had been preferred. For this purpose he would ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments.

The Senate met and was organized on the 2d day of December last. Through the kindness of the honorable Senator who then occupied the President's chair, and the indulgence of the Senate, he had been honored with the same place upon the standing committees of the body which he had occupied for several previous sessions, bestowed upon him, as the then presiding officer could testify, without solicitation from himself. This necessarily placed before the committee of which he was a member the reference of that part of the annual message of the President which related to the finances of the country, and consequently which related to the Independent Treasury bill. Thus situated, if it had been his object to escape the influence of the powerful talents of his colleague in opposition to the measure, the charge should have been that he was dilatory, and not "precipitate;" for it was not until the 6th day of January, more than a month after the meeting of the Senate, that the bill was reported from the committee. On the following day, the 7th of January, the Legislature of his State was to assemble, and he could not fail to know that among their first acts would be the election of a Senator.

By the direction of the committee, it became his duty to report the bill; and by the same direction, he gave notice that its consideration would be moved on that day week. The day arrived, the 13th of January, and passed, and on the 14th the bill was called up. Some discussion was had in reference to a postponement for two weeks to give time for absent Senators to arrive, and for vacancies to be filled, and reference was made to the vacancy existing from his own State. He informed the Senate that his action, thus far, had been under the order of the committee; that having discharged their order, he now cheerfully submitted the whole matter to the disposition of the Senate; that it would give him pleasure to have a colleague here before the bill should be finally acted upon, and that he should now be in the daily expectation of the news of an election and of the arrival of the person appointed to take his seat in the body; that he did not consider it proper for him to urge any course upon the Senate; nor should he, any farther than to give his individual vote upon the question of postponement. This course on his part called forth, at the time, expressions of approbation from a distinguished Senator of the Opposition, [Mr. CLAY of Kentucky,] not now in his seat. The bill was under the consideration of the Senate daily, from the 14th to the 17th of January, when the question upon its engrossment was taken. This was Friday of the week, and after the question was declared, he, in violation of the wishes and feelings of a large portion of his friends, moved that when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday, instead of Saturday, thus deferring the question upon the final passage of the bill to the following week. The motion prevailed. He entertained not a single doubt then that he should have a colleague present by the Monday to which the Senate stood adjourned.

The Monday came, but not his colleague. The bill was again taken up, and the discussion upon its final passage was continued from day to day, until Thursday, the 23d of January, when the question was taken, and the bill passed. On that day an effort was made to adjourn the Senate to give further time for the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] to discuss the bill; and when the question was taken upon the motion to adjourn, he purposely left his seat, and did not vote.

Now, as to his conduct towards his colleague, who had chosen to make himself the author of these charges of "precipitancy" and "want of courtesy." On the evening of Saturday, the 25th of January, two days after the bill in question had finally passed the Senate, the mail from the North brought him a letter, dated at the Astor House, in the city of New York, on the 23d, the day on which the final question upon the bill was taken here, signed by his colleague, giving the information that he was detained in New York by ill health, (that being the first information of that character which had reached Mr. W.) and requesting that the final question upon this bill might be postponed to await his arrival, which would be on the Monday after. But a few moments had elapsed, after the letter reached his hands, when he was informed that the same train of cars which brought the letter, brought also his colleague to the city.

Upon this state of facts, well known to the Senator by a former explanation here, he rises in his place and again makes the charge of "precipitancy and want of courtesy." To such a charge, under such circumstances, and coming from such a quarter, he had no reply to make.

His statement of facts had been made to justify himself to his constituents and the country; it had been made to those who were Senators when the transactions took place, and could judge of the accuracy of his account of the matter. To his colleague he owed neither explanation, nor reply, to this repetition of such a charge.

It would be seen that some time had been allowed, after the meeting of the New York Legislature, and before the final action of the Senate upon the bill in question, for the filling of that vacancy, and the arrival of the elected Senator to take his place in the body.

He would leave to his colleague the duty of informing the Senate and the country at what time his election had taken place; at what time the notice of the fact had reached him; what time was occupied by him in travelling from the place of his residence to the city of New York; what number of days ill health had confined him there; and all the other facts, which would account to their common constituents for his late arrival to take his seat in the Senate. He had not taken the pains to make inquiries into these facts, nor were they such as it became him to enlighten the Senate about. He did not doubt the ability of his colleague to give the information, which seemed to be called for before he should become an accuser of others; but it was at his option to give the information, or to withhold it. To him (Mr. W.) neither course had any importance, nor had he any desire upon the subject. The facts were within the reach of those to whom they owed a common responsibility; and they would make up no judgment upon either side, without giving them their true weight and consideration.

He had no disposition to follow his colleague into the discussion of the Independent Treasury bill upon this occasion. The subject was not new to either, and the views of both were fully known to their common constituents. He has further thought it proper to discuss again most of the subjects upon which we have differed since we became members together of this body. He (Mr. W.) would not follow him in this review. He had been, and continued to be, content with their first discussions, and would rest himself upon them.

His colleague has said, with some apparent feeling and triumph, that he, Mr. W. had, upon those occasions, proposed to refer their differences to their constituents, and not make them the subjects of debate and irritation here. He had done so; and he certainly had not regretted the reference. It was one which his duty, not less than his feelings, prompted him to make, and it was made to those who would take cognizance of them without their consent.

The Senator said their constituents had decided, thrice decided. Be it so. He had not questioned the assertion, nor was he to do so upon this occasion. He had not claimed to stand with the majority in his State, nor had he manifested any disposition, nor did he entertain any wish, to dispute the standing of his colleague in that particular. He felt no ambition to change places, or positions. He said now, as he had said before, leave our public acts to the determination of those common constituents, and not undertake to settle them here.

His colleague seemed to manifest peculiar anxiety to learn whether he would obey instructions from the Legislature of the State; a doctrine, he said, which originated in the school to which he, Mr. W. belonged. He was free to avow the doctrine of instructions as belonging to his school, but the present remarks of his colleague were the first intimation he had received that he too did not belong to that same school, upon this point at least. He was sorry to be compelled to infer that here again a difference was to grow up between them, as it seemed to threaten an entire separation in principle as well as practice.

He was aware that this answer had not exactly reached the object of his colleague, and that he desired him to speak particularly of the resolutions of their Legislature now before the Senate. This it was not his purpose to do at present, and the only relief he could give him now, was to inform him that when legislative instructions should call for it, he should be ready to act promptly and decisively.

Mr. TAPPAN said that the Senate had been repeatedly charged with precipitation and want of courtesy in relation to the passage of the Independent Treasury bill. He would not have thought these charges worthy of notice if they had only been made by those who were not members of this body when the bill passed; but as the same impression had been attempted to be made by others, he would briefly state the facts as they actually occurred. On the Thursday that the bill passed, after the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HENDERSON] had spoken in opposition to the bill, and delivered an elaborate argument in favor of a United States Bank, I observed, said Mr. T. "that the Senate seemed tired of the debate; that I had intended to speak on that subject, and had made some preparation for that purpose, but was not prepared then to address the Senate; and from the little attention paid to the labored argument of the Senator from Mississippi, I should conclude that the Senate did not desire to hear any more speaking, but would prefer to take the question that evening. I said that it was my own opinion that we had spent time enough on the bill, and that we ought then to proceed to a final vote upon it; but if the Senate thought otherwise, and the debate was to be continued, I would, on to-morrow, take occasion to submit my views; that at present I would give way to any gentleman who desired then to address the Senate." The Senator from Maryland then took the floor, and after making a few remarks, moved an adjournment, which was not agreed to. He then proceeded to make a very strong speech against the bill, and when he had spoken long enough for a reasonable sized speech, he gave way, and the member from Indiana made a motion to adjourn. This was also negatived, and the Senator from Maryland then proceeded until he had finished his remarks. After him, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] addressed the Senate with much ingenuity in opposition to the bill, and when he had concluded, no other gentleman seeming desirous to speak on the subject, the bill was passed.

As to the remark of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. MERRICK,] which was published several days since, and not disavowed by him, that he [Mr. T.] declined to address the Senate at all on the subject, he must say, without supposing it other than a mistake in the Senator, it was not true. He made no such declaration. But the Senator from New York seems to think that his State is the whole Union, and that the Senate should lay by, and not presume to transact any important business, until the State of New York was fully represented here. Now, he was as willing as any Senator to admit the claim of that great State to be treated with all proper respect. The Empire State is a great and populous one; but she is not the only State in the Union. There are other States besides New York. In the west you may also see great and populous States, nearly equal to her in population, and on this floor entitled to as much weight and consideration. If both the New York Senators were not here to participate in the transaction of the business of the nation with the Representatives of the 25 other independent States, it not the fault of this body, and he saw no reason why the business of this great Confederacy should be delayed on that account. But the Senator says "he has been in a peculiar and trying situation." Has he indeed been in a "peculiar and trying situation?" and, for that reason, could not get here sooner? What brought him into that situation? What was its peculiarity? What was its trying nature? He has not told us; on that we are left to conjecture. But the Senator's course has not been hidden from public view—it has been open to the world. Did the Senator suspect he could go through a complete transformation, and be insensible to the change? Why, sir, we are so constituted that we cannot choose but feel, and feel deeply, all great revolutions in our circumstances. If a man, with an apparent zeal and honesty, advocates any cause for a series of years, so as to make himself not only conspicuous among the advocates, of that cause, but one of the most honored, distinguished, and trusted of those advocates; if in this way he identifies himself with a great party, with the majority of his countrymen, and then, without any reason, or for reasons common sense scouts as frivolous and unmeaning, he abandons (I will not say his priciples, for such men have no principles) his party connections, all those he had professed to love and honor, joins his and their former enemies, and is the loudest and most unprincipled calumniator of his former associates, do you think he can do all this, without feeling that he has placed himself "in a peculiar and trying situation? No, sir, no; human nature is much the same in all; we are so constituted that we cannot decend from a life of honor and virtue to acts of base turpitude and wickedness, without feeling ourselves in "a peculiar and trying situation." Do you think, sir, that Benedict Arnold did not find himself in "a peculiar and trying situation," when he resolved to betray his country, to abandon his high and honorable station, as the gallant soldier of liberty, and sink into utter infamy? Undoubtedly he did; and although he burned and plundered the villages and towns of his countrymen with savage ferocity, to ingratiate himself with his new friends, if you could have heard the voice of his conscience, it would have told you that he found himself in "a peculiar and trying situation."

When, sir, a public man steers his course by the polar star of principle, he may be misunderstood; he may be misrepresented; he may lose his popularity; but he does not lose his honor, his self-possession and dignity. If public favor is withdrawn from him, he retires to private life, and enjoys the calm and peace of a mind at ease, and conscious of rectitude; he is not reaching out his "itching palm," and whining about his "peculiar and trying situation."

And if, indeed, the Senator has chosen to place himself in so very peculiar and trying a situation, it gives him no authority to misrepresent the motives or actions of those with whom he had been associated, although it may entitle him to the pity of all men of honor and integrity.

Mr. MERRICK said that the Senator from Ohio, in the course of his remarks, had said that a particular statement in his (Mr. M's) published speech "was not true." He wished to inquire of the Senator whether, by this remark, he intended to charge him with an intention to misrepresent facts.

Mr. TAPPAN said that he was a plain spoken man, and would say, with Martin Luther, that "he generally called a spade a spade;" but he did not say, or suppose, that the Senator intentionally misrepresented the facts: he only spoke of them as they were.

Mr. MERRICK then gave a brief history of the events previous to the passage of the bill. Having stated that it was half after five o'clock when he moved the adjournment.

Mr. TAPPAN said the Senator was mistaken in the hour; it was about a quarter past three o'clock.

Several Senators said that was about the time.

Mr. TALLMADGE appealed to the Senate, whether he had not, in all his intercourse with members, treated them with the courtesy which gentlemen owed to each other, and to the station they occupied. He was not in the habit of using harsh words there or elsewhere. He had no complaint to make of his colleague on this score. He would say that, as far as parliamentary and individual courtesy were concernee, no man carried it further than his colleague. It was his uniform manner, and he cheerfully awarded this to him. But, said Mr. T. my colleague has misapprehended me if he understood me as saying that he belonged to a school which avowed the doctrine of instruction, while I belonged to a different school. I said no such thing. But when we see Senators, who are professedly great admirers of the right of instruction, quibbling for want of a technical word, our confidence in the doctrine was a good deal shaken. He did not say his colleague would do this, but there had been instances of it in the Senate. If I received instructions, I would at once carry out the wishes of my State, or give her an opportunity of filling my place with another who would represent her truly.

He was sorry that the Senator from Ohio had thought it his duty to intermeddle in this family affair; and he would leave it to the Senate whether it was done with parliamentary or individual courtesy. The term traitor had been applied to him by political slang-whangers, but he did not expect to hear it from one who had sufficient respectability of character to obtain a seat on this floor. Traitor to what? To principle? No: a traitor to party. And for a difference in political sentiment, am I to be branded as a traitor? to be compared to Arnold? The Senator talks of what he knows nothing about, and reminds me of a certain British lord's puppy, who did not get his eyes open until he was about to be drowned. But the Senator is the very personification of Loco Focoism. He professes to be one of the Simon Pures of that school. He also professes another principle, which is a very natural one for a Loco Foco. I have seen it stated in the newspapers, that when the news of the Southampton insurrection reached Ohio, the Senator expressed his willingness to furnish powder and ball to the negroes. This feeling was only carrying out the destructive doctrines of Loco Focoism. He represents me as saying that New York is the whole Union, and that all legislation must stop until she is fully represented. I said no such thing, and pronounce it a misrepresentation—unintentional no doubt. It is likely if that Senator had his way, one Senator would be thought sufficient for New York, provided he be always right. He would not follow the example of the Senator from Ohio, and invade her territory: there is one there already who is used to repel invaders, and he will take care of the gentleman. He calls me a traitor. If I am a traitor, then are the people of New York, whose representative I am, a traitor. Let him come within her borders and say this to her sons, and they will treat him with the scorn and contempt he deserves.

Mr. HENDERSON rose to a point of order. He would inquire of the CHAIR whether he considered the course of remarks now indulged in as being within the rules of order.

The CHAIR stated that he had avoided any interference, because he trusted to the Senate to preserve its own dignity and the order of the body. He relied on the sense of honor and decorum of the Senators to treat each other with that respect and courtesy which is alike due to each other as gentlemen and the station they occupied. Since the Senator from Mississippi, however, had raised the point of order, he would say that he considered the remarks of the Senator from New York as transcending the limits of parliamentary courtesy. He regretted to be compelled to say this, but it was a duty imposed upon him by the position he held as the presiding officer of the body, and when he knew his duty he could discharge it.

Mr. TALLMADGE approved of the sentiments of the Chair, and would endeavor to observe his injunctions. All he had said was to repel the rude attack of the Senator from Ohio. Mr. T. then went into a history of his difference with the President on the Sub-Treasury bill. He said his course in relation to that bill was taken by the advice and sanction of the highest political authority in his State; but since that time, these very men who urged him to the course, had denounced him as a deserter.

Mr TAPPAN. The Senator from New York charges me with "interfering between him and his colleague;" with "invading his State," with meddling with new York politics. The Senator rose in his place and uttered a long and rambling speech, in which he censured his colleague, and in no very moderate terms charged the majority of this Senate with having passed the Independent Treasury Bill precipitately, and with the dishonest purpose of preventing him from recording his vote against it. Was I to sit here, sir, a silent listener to his foul slanders of the majority of this body, with which I had acted? Are we bound to submit to all manner of contumely and reproach? No, sir, no; the Senator shall exercise no such privilege here without the rebuke he merits. I interfered not between him and his colleague; I invaded not his State; I meddled not with New York politics: but I informed the Senator that there were other States in this Union than New York, and other Senators here whose rights were to be regarded, besides him whom his file leader pronounced fresh from the people.

But the Senator complains that I apply "odious epithets to him." I have applied no epithets: I have supposed what might have been the cause of his finding himself in so "very peculiar and trying a situation" as he confessed he had been in for some time past. I did not say that his conduct and character were paralleled by the conduct and character of Benedict Arnold. It is the Senator's own conscience which adopts this parallel: it is he that makes the hypothetical case his own. The Senator says he is always courteous in debate. What are his ideas of courtesy? He has made several speeches here since he took his seat; and what were they? The most low and vulgar abuse of all his old friends and associates, a tirade of newspaper slang and pot-house vituperation, with frequent and most complacent reference to "his speech"—a speech, when and where delivered, I neither know nor wish to know; but I can tell the Senator this: I never heard of "his speech" before, and, if it is as vulgar and abusive as the speeches he delivers here, he would do well to let it pass into oblivion without awakening a recollection of it, which can do him no honor. "Courteous in debate!" I submit to no such courtesy. In my life, sir, I have never heard any man speak in public who was more abusive, more calumnious, more careless, in his assertions; he must become courteous himself before he claims to be treated with courtesy by others. The Senator calls himself a Democratic Whig, and says I am a Loco Foco. I am indifferent what he calls me; my enemies cannot change my name; near fifty years I have belonged to a party devoted to the support of sound Democratic principles. We were called Democrats by way of reproach. What was intended as a stigma, we adhered to us an honor; we cherish the name; it designates principles. We do not change our name annually as the serpent changes his skin. I am a Democrat, simply and purely; not, thank God, a Democratic Whig, nor a Whig Democrat.

But the Senator has referred to a stale slander that he has picked up in some newspaper or other. I will not descend to answer a charge made on such authority. I would scarcely notice any charge on the authority of the Senator himself—much less the stories which he picks up out of Whig newspapers. No, sir; when a charge is brought against me, it must have an endorser, and a good and substantial endorser, and then I will answer it.

The Senator has asserted that the policy of the Administration tends to the establishment of "one currency for the Government and another for the people." One currency for the Government and another for the people! Who are the people? Are you, Mr. President, and is he not one of the people? Does the mere fact of his holding a seat in this body, raise a man above the level of the people? Sir, he may have a seat on this floor, and yet be in character and standing, among his fellow men, even below the average of the people of his own State. This has been an oft-repeated charge, that the Democratic party have established one currency for the Government and another for the people: that, while we pay ourselves in gold and silver, the great mass of the community are compelled to use a depreciated currency. He would admit that the fact exists of two currencies: one the constitutional currency, the other the currency of private companies; but whose fault is it? Did the Government or the Democratic party establish the State banks? The banks of all the States, except Ohio, south of New York, have refused to redeem their paper, and they are now fighting against resumption, and endeavoring to supersede the constitutional currency with their irredeemable trash. And we find the Senator from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE] and the party of which the Senator has become a member, associated with these banks, and giving them their countenance and support in their effort to suppress the circulation of the legal currency of the country. With a disregard of all truth and decency, the Administration are charged with causing this state of things. But I thank the Senator for his taunt, and I hope it will be remembered and profited by. The banks even in this District, where we have exclusive jurisdictions refuse to redeem their notes, and he (Mr. TAPPAN) hoped, when the subject came up for consideration, as it would shortly, that Senators would, so far as their legislation is concerned, relieve themselves from the odium of being instrumental in establishing "one currency for the Government and another for the people;" that they would sanction but one currency for the Government and the people, and that a good and substantial one. I have no more to say, sir; my object has been to repel an unjust and unprovoked attack; to let the Senator know that if he indulges himself in such attacks on me and my friends, he must expect to be answered plainly and promptly. I go no further; for, from my soul, I pity the man, who, to court the favor of new associates, finds it necessary to abuse and vilify his old ones.

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT, the resolutions were ordered to be printed, and laid on the table.

SPEECH OF MR. BYNUM,

OF NORTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, concluded January 25, 1840—On the resolution of Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, on the subject of Abolition.

Mr. BYNUM rose and said, he had much regretted the progress of the present discussion, now going on before the House, and exceedingly lamented the character it had assumed. It had been his object, at an early stage of the session, to have arrested it by a move which he had then made, but for which he had been rebuked, and read a lecture from a quarter that he had least expected. He, however, felt no disposition, at this time, to recriminate, and to wage war with those men who wore the profession of friendship to the South. The subject, to him, was of a magnitude too immense to involve in it even a personal consideration, and he should endeavor, if possible, to soar above all such.

So far, in his judgment, this discussion had been conducted entirely to the injury of one section of this country, and with the greatest injustice to one of the great parties in this House; for the complete and entire vindication of both of which, it would only be necessary to exhibit a plain statement of the facts and the history of the subjects involved, as they have transpired, both here, in this House, upon this floor, and elsewhere, within the last five or six years, which, at a proper time, it is my design, at present, to do before I take my seat, if my health and strength should sustain me in the effort. But before he proceeded to that part of the subject, he begged the House to excuse him, while he noticed several remarks that had fallen from different gentlemen who had preceded him on the opposite side.

The first of whom, whose remarks he would notice, were those of the very honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] That gentleman had taken bold grounds. The gentleman had said, in substance, that before the rights of the Abolitionists to petition upon the subject of slavery should be thwarted by this House, the whole people of the non-slaveholding States would rise en masse, to revenge an indignity so flagrant, and so violative of their constitutional rights. Now, sir, said Mr. B. before a right can be violated, it appeared to him that some evidence at least of its existence should be made to appear. If the venerable and honorable member means that the Abolitionists have any right to the slaves of the South, or interest in its existence there, then I would listen to his argument in demonstration of its violation by any action of this House. Sir, has he attempted, has he condescended to attempt, to show this? Then how has a right been violated, that never has existed? The whole of such arguments are founded upon assumption, and assumption alone; and what is such an assumption but a usurpation, or an attempt to usurp an interest, or the right in an interest, that never did exist, by purchase, acquiescence, gift, or contract? Sir, the whole idea of violating a right that never existed, is both utopean and ridiculous.

But, say gentlemen, the right is derived from the constitutional compacts. The Constitution, they say, has granted the right, by declaring that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition the Government for a redress of grievances." Now, sir, is this the right to which they allude? If so, it is clearly no right at all, by a fair construction of that instrument: an impartial interpretation will not justify an inference so absurd.

The whole object of this clause was to remove the infliction of some grievance, either personal or political. That the grievances complained of by the petitioners are personal, no man has been bold enough yet to contend; that they are in any way personally affected by the existence of slavery, at a distance of hundreds and thousands of miles from them, it will hardly be contended. The grievance complained of, then, so far, is wholly imaginary, and totally unworthy of further consideration. So far as the police of slavery affects them politically, it is equally imaginary and remote; from which it is evident that no grievance from it has existed amongst, and been experienced from it by, the petitioners. The whole complaint of grievance, therefore, is merely ideal, and does not exist in fact. The framers of the Constitution were practical men, and their whole object was to form a practical Government, for the redress, not of ideal, imaginary grievances, but substantial, existing wrongs, directly affecting persons and communities. Such, sir, were the objects of those illustrious sages who were the architects of that glorious instrument, whose subversion is now sought, under the flimsy garb of the right to petition, whether for a redress of grievances or not, real or imaginary.

To indulge for a moment the idea that the patriots who formed the Constitution contemplated a redress of grievances, so remote and imaginary as that complained of by the whole brood fanatic, is a slander, if not a libel, on their memories.

The clause of the Constitution, then, to which repeated allusions have been made, refers exclusively to grievances, tangible, real, and substantial; and there cannot be a doubt of its framers having no other in contemplation at its formation. This, then, does not appear to me ever to have been one of those legitimate subjects of grievances entertained by the founders of the Government. The right of petition, then, sir, so far, may be well questioned, where there is neither interest nor grievance upon which to found the right to redress. It is manifest, therefore, that the right of petition is a relative one, and relates immediately to a redress of a substantial and direct grievance, and to none others, as a contrary supposition would involve a glaring absurdity and impracticability, to carry out which, there can be no practical, sagacious statesman that does not now see that this whole country will be deluged with the blood of its own citizens. Such a right, if it were possible for it to exist, is too obscure and remote to be yielded, without convulsing to the very centre of the entire Republic. No man will yield it; and all are ready now to resist it, at the hazard of all that can make life desirable: and he that could desire its discussion, under present circumstances, here, must be blind, and of the most obtuse intellect—one who cannot have one single honest feeling for the tranquillity, peace, and prosperity of our common country.

If ever the sacred compromise of the Constitution is rescinded, this will be the very question that will blow its sacred fragments into a thousand atoms. Yes, sir, it is to be the fatal rock upon which this mighty vessel of State, in which we have so triumphantly sailed for the better part of a century, will be wrecked and shivered into atoms: and any statesman, after reviewing what has transpired here within a few days past, is too blind to deserve a seat here, if he has not been able to perceive it.

The whole object of the petitioners is without license from the Constitution, and in opposition to the understanding of every member of the convention that framed that instrument. This has not, nor cannot, be denied even by the learned gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS] But (says that honorable gentleman) his efforts are made in defence of a form—a mere etiquette, I suppose—which by him is placed far beyond the duties that we owe to preserve the Constitution and the Union. Sir, the idea is preposterous, and can receive tolerance only from bookmen, unpractised in the art of life, and who alone are familiar with the impracticable theories of the closet: and here let me say to gentlemen, the prayer of the petitioners is not only more unconstitutional than their grant would be inexpedient and impracticable. Then why, again I would ask, this agitation—this continued effort to disturb the peace and harmony of the country? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] says, that the South have caused it—that they keep up the agitation. How monstrous! the South the cause of it! Who have regularly introduced the subject for the last six years by folios of petitions—the South? No, sir: the idea is ridiculous, no matter from what quarter it comes. The South have only begged to be let alone. Let her institutions alone, and this is all she asks; and this she never mentions, until you attempt here, on this floor, to invade her rights of property, and the safety and security of her persons. This is the agitation that the South is guilty of here, through her Representatives except a few, who play in the hands of the Abolitionists for political effect, regardless of their sacred allegiance to the South, and its vital interests.

Mr. Speaker, said Mr. B. I have been amused for the few days past at the declarations of gentlemen who have embarked here in the cause of the Abolitionists, while I have felt humiliated, at times, as a Southern man; and I doubt whether to attribute such declarations to arrogance, or to their want of a better knowledge of Southern men, and of Southern character. Gentlemen say, just let them take this matter in their hands, and they will manage it so as to quiet the Abolitionists, and to secure the peace of the country; we to the South do not understand this subject as well as themselves. Sir, this we have been told by the honorable members successively from Massachusetts, two from New York, and one from Pennsylvania, [Messrs. ADAMS, BIDDLE, GRANGER, and HUNT.] Most modest and high minded gentlemen! Sir, this is adding insult to injury. What! yield to you the right and privilege of settling for us and our constituents this momentous question. Heavens! what a request. Have you not, in this, impeached either our integrity or competence? Surely, gentlemen, you are dreaming. You settle this question for the South? Never! never! I deny your interest in it, and repel the implication of ignorance on the subject. Sir, I throw it back, not in retort, but as a fact which may be clearly demonstrated by your own declarations here, displaying a most entire want of knowledge: yes, practical knowledge not only of the subject before us, but an entire want of knowledge of the characters with whom you have to deal on the subject.

You settle this question for us, without one particle of interest in it, and without the most ordinary practical knowledge of it; and we, who have every thing near and dear to man at stake, to set by, as mere idle spectators of the scene? Surely, I say, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen have forgotten the theme on which they are disposed to speak. No, sir; this is a Southern question, exclusively so, and must be, and will be, settled by Southern men, until they become traitors to their country and themselves. But, says the honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] they dread discussion coolly on this subject, and tells us that he is prepared to discuss the subject coolly and without agitation. Indeed, sir, what has the honorable member at stake that should excite and agitate him on this subject? Is his house in danger of the incendiary's torch? Are his fireside and household deities in peril of midnight insurrection? Are his wife and children hourly at the mercy of the black assassins, who are instigated by these discussions to acts of murder? Has he so early forgotten the bloody scenes of Southampton, that have so recently passed in a neighboring State? Can he suppose, and will it be asked of them, that those who are daily subject to the reacting of such a scene on them, shall, like him, look coldly on these bloody consequences? Has the gentlemen, and others, given a moment's reflection on the incomparable difference in the condition of the parties whom he invites to this discussion? Have gentlemen condescended to compare the difference, in interest and feelings, which must of necessity exist between the two parties on this subject? Have they, will they, compare the enormous arrogance, and the tresspasses about being made by one party, with the humble attitude of defence assumed and resolved on by the other? Sir, on the one side every thing exists that can arouse, and excite, and inflame, a man of sensibility, or of honor; while, on the other side, there is nothing but religious superstition, ignorance, or wantonness, or a thirst for mischief, that should excite, agitate, or inflame any man, except the deep detestation of the attempts of a fanaticism, that is fraught with such incalculable disasters to the human race? Well may gentlemen on the other side, therefore, affect a serenity of temperament on this subject, unknown to those who are so much more deeply interested in the discussion than themselves.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] contends that all this agitation and struggle is carried on merely for the right of petition. Can gentlemen be candid who make such assertions? For the right of petition! Why, sir, who denies that? Is there a solitary one in this House, either Whig or Democrat? No, sir! no sir! not one of either party, where the prayer could be granted and carried out in conformity with the letter, spirit, and requisitions of the Constitution. The entire rights that we exercise here as Representatives, are constitutional, and none others. Can we then justifiably entertain a proposition directly subversive of those rights, and remain faithful to the Constitution? I defy you to take the first step in the execution of the objects of your petitions, without blowing into atoms every fragment of that glorious instrument, under the authority of which we have alone convened here.

What, then, is it but treason to every article of that sacred compact, that you do in entertaining this subject, which, the most stupid is now ready to admit, must annihilate its very existence? Hence the inconsistency in the positions taken by the gentlemen on the opposite side, to me is wholly irreconcileable with every principle of reason, and equally so with any fair construction of your Constitution.

But, sir, I will not argue the right of petition further, as I will show before taking my seat, that it is used here, as well as elsewhere, as a mere catch and humbug, to amuse and delude the ignorant into toils of revolution and blood. No man believes here, nor any intelligent one abroad, that the right of petition is, or ever has been, in danger by the action of this House; and it is used only as a mere platform upon which the Abolitionists and their political friends wish to stand to hurl their firebrands of revolution and desolation at the sacred temple of your Constitution. It is a deception that they are attempting to play off upon the ignorant and credulous, to conceal the absurdity of their attempts and the enormity of their projects. No, sir, their object never has been to vindicate the right of petition. They do not say so in scarcely any of their reports or resolutions adopted by their different meetings; and it is used here to sustain them for want of any other plausible argument, and as the only one that gentlemen can excuse themselves by, for appearing here as their apologists. The whole attempt, therefore, I look upon as not less farcical than hypocritical, which has been clearly evinced to my mind, by the remarks of nearly every member that has addressed the House in favor of the petitions. Not a speech have they made, scarcely, after telling us that the object was merely to defend the right of petition, before they have launched out on the evils of slavery—the inexpediency of its existence, and the necessity of its entire abolition; with the vilest denunciations against our institutions, where it is tolerated, in which their whole feelings upon the subject have been satisfactorily, to my mind at least, developed; and I had only regretted that gentlemen had not the boldness to come out and declare their true positions upon the subject openly and freely.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] says that we should not only receive these petitions, but that they should be read, referred, reported upon, and discussed. Yes, all this to be done to observe a form, when it is admitted by all that it is impossible now to grant the prayers of the petitioners. Why such a sacrifice of substance to mere form? If our minds are perfectly made up on this subject, as all are ready to acknowledge; why, for the sake of this mere form, keep up this agitation, at the sacrifie of that substance, that can alone hold together an hour, the now freest Government on earth? Can such a course be sanctioned by any enlightened man living? But, say these gentlemen, our people (meaning Abolitionists) only wish to discuss this question with you. Where the reason for consuming time in discussing, when the minds of one party are irrevocably made up, of which, again and again, the other party has been told. This, too, however, is not what they say in their various resolutions, essays, and reports. They speak in them a very different language; they declare in tones of thunder, their object to be Abolition, and universal emancipation; when their instruments here declare, that they only contend for the right of petition, and desire discussion, showing a total variance in the declarations of their advocates here, and those set forth by themselves. There is mystery in this, not to be overlooked by those most interested in this subject, and is enough to create a suspicion, that there is something foul in these professions, in the breast of the most unsuspecting among us. Is there no stratagem in all this; first, to get this subject legitimately on this floor and the right of discussing it here acquiesced in; and, by discussing and debating it, the right of adjudicating it acknowledged by this House? Is it by this stealthy process, that the Abolitionists seek to insinuate their deadly poison within the walls of your Capitol? Is it by such means that they are to gain entrance, and get their right to abolish slavery acknowledged on the floors of Congress? Sir, I implore Southern gentlemen to mark the insiduous progress of this bloody cloud that is now rising, and threatens to pour out its unhallowed contents upon our devoted country.

We were told a few days ago by the honorable member from New York, [Mr. GRANGER,] and it was reiterated in substance by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the North had rights, and dare maintain them. What, sir, was the meaning of this? What rights of the North have been threatened or invaded by the South? None, sir; none. The South knows too well its own rights and their value, to invade those of others. This, sir, was a most unfortunate declaration, coming from the source it does, and will have the effect to open the eyes of every Southern man in the nation. What rights have that gentleman's constituents to the South that they know or dare maintain? Is this the insinuation, at last leaked out, that he and his constituents have a right to the slave property in the South? Is this his meaning? Then I can only say in the language of a greater man, "Come and take them," and we will endeavor to give you a hearty welcome. Sir, the South wishes to meddle with no right of the North—she desires nothing but friendship and brotherly love, the preservation of our Union, and the continuance of a liberal intercourse between us; but if the contest is to come, that has been intimated by the honorable member, let me say to him, as brave, as gallant as may be his constituents, he will find spirits to the South as brave and as gallant as they dare be, and with a cause in defence of their homes and firesides so just, that infants would rise from their cradles to do battle to repel a plundering foe. If these projects are persisted in, "to this complexion it must come at last"—and the honest hearted people of each section of country cannot know it too soon, who little dream at this time that a dire project is on foot, by which they are to imbue their hands in their brothers' blood. Yes, sir, the actors in this scene would keep dark, until, by exciting one portion of your countrymen against the other, they gradually and imperceptibly prepare the minds of the most innocent and unsuspecting people of each section of country for the execution of their ruthless and diabolical purposes.

I will not reply to the remarks about the abuse that is poured upon us by the English periodicals and penny posts that has been alluded to by the honorable member last up, from New York, [Mr. HUNT.] Their abuses against our institutions, that recognise slavery, cannot be greater than it has ever been against the very form of our free Government, and our free Republican institutions; nor less than it is against our religion and morals. From the subjects and vassals of kings and despots, Americans should never look for compliments. Sir, they owe us no good will, and it is the height of folly, I have ever learned, to receive counsel from an enemy.

But if one thing can be more laughable than another, it is in the declaration of the gentleman [Mr. HUNT] who addres ed the House on this subject last. I had long listened at the remarks of that honorable member, as I had to all that had preceded him on that side of the question, in endeavoring to explain, if possible, what their real object was, and what they really desired to effect, by the course that they wished this body to pursue in relation to these petitions: who has, finally, after laboring nearly three hours, concluded by telling us that they, and the whole subject, ought to be given in charge "of him" of Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] to make such a report as he thought fit and proper on this subject. Yes, this is the novel idea, the modest request, that has just been made by an honorable member on the opposite side. Is it possible that any sane man can believe that the South could be thus cajoled into submission to such an act? Why not say place them in the hands of "him" from Vermont [Mr. SLADE] at once, and effect an entire surrender of every thing that is dear to a Southern man into the hands of those that they have long been taught to believe were their deadliest enemies on earth? Sir, I feel humbled that it did not meet with the deep detestation of every Southern man on its utterance. What man, who would assent to such a proposition here, would dare return to the South and meet the frowns of his insulted and betrayed constituents? Do gentlemen believe that a report from such a source, however satisfactory to Abolitionists, would be received as satisfactory to the South and the West? What! a report from a man, although he may be as pure as the icicles that are now hanging down from the domes of this magnificent edifice, or with a heart as spotless as the bleaching snow that now covers the purlieus of your Capitol, could produce nothing, at this time, after what has recently transpired here, that could be received without exciting the greatest distrust in the mind of every man south of the Potomac! A report from one who we have been taught, from earliest infancy, was the great natural enemy of every thing that is Southern, to be received by them as satisfactory, is a thing that proves conclusively, to me, that the gentlemen are entirely uninformed upon the subject on which they have spoken, and know but little, indeed, of the true characters of those whom they have presumed to instruct upon this great question of national policy.

The honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE,] too, has come forward with great plausibility, and apparent candor, to advise and instruct those that have resisted the introduction and discussion of those petitions. He has given us a history of his last canvass, in which he has been pleased to inform us that he took ground against the Abolitionists, and sustained himself; but that the course we have pursued here, in refusing to consider the petitions, is altogether erroneous; that it only increases their number, and keeps up the agitation of the subject. If, says he, you will receive, discuss, and report on them, you will put arguments in the mouths of those that oppose them, that will effectually silence their complaints.

With what truth this assertion is made, (without impeaching the gentleman's veracity, as I dare say he believes what he has said) I will show, by incontestable evidence, before I conclude. But that a gentleman of his distinguished talents could expect such a thing for such an object, is truly extraordinary. What, sir, does the gentleman ask? To give up a great constitutional question, in admitting the petitions to be received, debated, and decided on by this House for the mere experiment of putting arguments in the mouths of certain gentlemen who profess to be our friends, but never vote with us, to enable them to meet and silence the complaints of the Abolitionists at home? Was the gentleman aware of the price that it was to cost us to put arguments in his mouth by abandoning the grounds that we have so long and uniformly taken upon this most vital question? Was he aware that it amounted to a direct request to surrender to the Abolitionists the great constitutional grounds that we so long have contended for, and resolved on maintaining, at the hazard of life and fortune, and all that is dear to man upon this earth? Would it not virtually be placing the whole question in the power of Congress, at once, for an experiment, that I will show has already been tried and failed effectually? Such a course would be treasonable to every vital interest of the South. The admission of their right of action, which amounts to a jurisdiction of the question by Congress, is the first great point that the friends of the Abolitionists desire to effect here; and, sir, if this be the friendship of the gentleman, may the Lord deliver the South from such friends.

When the day arrives that this House attempts to assume the jurisdiction of this subject, and discuss it here, the days of the Republic will be numbered, and he who could desire to bring about such a discussion, can have but little love for the blessings arising from the freest Government on the earth, and it is a poor compliment indeed to the intelligence of any Southern man, to suppose that he could be induced, for a moment, to tolerate a proposition so monstrous.

I know, Mr. Speaker, and regret it most sincerely too, that there has been a resolution introduced by a Southern man,* [Mr. CHINN of Louisiana,] in the debate of the 31 January, at which the Abolitionists and their friends here have taken new courage, on which they build their greatest hope of success in entering this House. Such a proposition is all, I know, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] has been contending for here, for the last six years, and is all that the Abolitionists themselves expect to gain at present; but, sir, this unfortunate resolution cannot meet with the APPROBATION OF THE SOUTH.

I will now, sir, once more, and for the last time, IN this debate, pay my respects to the honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE,] a gentleman, I confess, worthy of respect, both by the correctness of his deportment, and his distinguished talents. The gentleman informed the House that he had resolved to leave us; that he was done with public life, and had no motives to misrepresent any thing here. But, sir, as he retires, Parthian like, he forgets not to hurl back, as he flies, his rankling javelin at his unvanquished foes. He most adroitly, I will not say insidiously, has introduced in this debate, not for political effect, I hope, the opinions of the distinguished individual who is now at the head of this Administration. I saw, sir, the chuckle and smile of approbation that it created in a certain quarter, and I thought then how easy it would be, by a fuller statement of facts, to convert those smiles into lamentations and mourning. Now sir, I will not accuse the gentleman from Pennsylvania of wanting candor, but if he had read but a few paragraphs more, from the communication of the President to the Jackson committee, he would have deprived me of the trouble of doing it myself. He read, however, only enough of that document to place the President in a false position before the public, to the entire gratification of his enemies both here and abroad. Now I hold in my hand the same document, and will read more fully his opinions upon the subject referred to, and to show why they were received, as satisfactory to the South. In his reply to a committee of gentlemen, who addressed Mr. Van Buren on the subject, from the town of Jackson, North Carolina, under date, "Washington, March 6, 1836," he says:

Thus viewing the matter, I would not, from the lights now before me, feel myself safe in pronouncing that Congress does not possess the power of interfering with, or abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia.

Now, sir, so far the honorable member saw fit to read, and no farther, from this document, and here was he disposed to leave the subject of Mr. Van Buren's opinions to the edification of his enemies, both South and North; but I will supply the omission, and will commence with the very next word, and read the paragraph through, and to which I invoke the attention of every gentleman from the North and South. The next sentence after the word "Columbia," where the honorable member from Pennsylvania left off, begins thus:

But, whilst such are my present impressions upon the abstract question of the legal power of Congress—impressions which I shall at all times be not only ready, but disposed to surrender upon conviction of error, I do not hesitate to give it to you as my deliberate and well considered opinion, that there are objections to the exercise of this power against the wishes of the slaveholding States, as imperative in their nature and obligations, in regulating the conduct of public men, as the most palpable want of constitutional power would be.

This concludes the paragraph. Now, sir, how different is the inference from that made by the honorable member from Pennsylvania? What Southern man, uncontaminated by political prejudices, could desire more? Here Mr. Van Buren declares to the world, in language emphatic, that the reasons for opposing the exercise of the power to abolish slavery in the District even, (mark that,) are "*as imperative in their nature and obligations * * * as the most palpable want of constitutional power would be.*" Now does he not acknowledge in this, that the obligations on him are equally binding with any of a constitutional nature; and what more could an honest, honorable people desire? If he would not obey the one, he certainly would not the other. But I will read another extract to quiet, if possible, the consciences of gentlemen. From the same document, says he:

I prefer that not only you, but all the people of the United States, shall now understand, that if the desire of that portion of them which is favorable to my elevation to the Chief Magistracy, should be gratified, I must go into the Presidential Chair the inflexible and uncompromising opponent of any attempt on the part of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, against the wishes of the slaveholding States; and, also, with a determination, equally decided, to resist the slightest interference with the subject in the States where it exists.

Here, again, we have a reiteration of the same declarations in substance: "I must go into the Presidential chair the inflexible and uncompromising opponent to any attempt on the part of Congress to abolish slavery in the District," &c.

Here is an additional confirmation of what I before read, but which the member from Pennsylvania did not read. And again I say, what more could have been asked? What further was necessary to be added to satisfy any man whose object was truth, in relation to this momentous subject. Had his declarations been all that he made then, they would have been sufficient for any inquirer after truth. But I will read further from the same. Said he:

I do, therefore, believe that the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, against the wishes of the slaveholding States, (assuming that Congress has the power to effect it,) would violate the spirit of that compromise of interests which lies at the basis of our social compacts; and I am thoroughly convinced that it could not be so done without imminent peril, if not certain destruction, to the union of the States. Viewing the matter in this light, it is my clear and settled opinion that the Federal Government ought to abstain from doing so, and that it is the sacred duty of those whom the people of the United States entrust with the control of its action, so to use the constitutional power, with which they are invested, as to prevent it.

Sir, could a position on this subject be more clearly defined? Could the South, if they ever intended to support a Northern man, expect to get one more explicit, more decided, more satisfactory? I submit it to every man of reflection, that has the least candor or honesty about him. "So to use the constitutional power as to prevent it." Can any man doubt the meaning of this? No, sir; no, sir; there are none who look to the interest of the South, and places this subject above his paltry party feelings. But let me tell gentlemen, long before the date of this letter, Mr. Van Buren expressed similar sentiments to the above, when he was not before the people as a candidate for their suffrages for the Presidency of the United States.

In a letter to Mr. Gwinn, of the State of Mississippi, in 1834, he used this language, in reply to one written to him on this subject:

My opinions on the subject of the power of Congress over slave property in the Southern States are so well understood by my friends, that I am surprised that an attempt to impose upon the public respecting them should be hazarded. The subject is, in my judgment, exclusively under the control of the State Governments; and I am not apprised, nor do I believe that a contrary opinion to an extent deserving consideration, is entertained in any part of the United States. The charge, therefore, to which you have had the goodness to call my attention, that I am in favor of an interference by Congress in manumitting your slave property, is destitute of foundation; so far from it, I do not see on what authority the General Government could interfere without a change of the Coustitution, even at the instance of either or of all the slaveholding States.

Here, sir, is an avowal of the same sentiments, without reserve, or equivocation. This letter was written two years before his election to the Chief Magistracy; yet with all this evidence before us, there are those so reckless, or ignarant, and desperate, as to charge his supporters at the South of having betrayed the interest of the South upon this great question of Southern rights for yielding him their support. But how has Mr. Van Buren acted since these declarations and pledges were given? Has he defaulted in the least in any one respect? No, sir. His very first act after his election, was to renew those solemn pledges in the face of the world. In his inaugural address, he embraces the very first occasion to declare himself on this absorbing subject. Here, sir, are his sentiments as delivered to the American people in that most valuable and celebrated address.

Mr. B. then read the following extracts:

The last, perhaps the greatest, of the prominent sources of discord and disaster supposed to lurk in our political condition, was the institution of domestic slavery. Our forefathers were deeply impressed with the delicacy of this subject, and they treated it with a forbearance so evidently wise, that in spite of every sinister foreboding, it never, until the present period, disturbed the tranquillity of our common country. Such a result is sufficient evidence of the justice and patriotism of their course; it is evidence not to be mistaken, that an adherence to it can prevent all embarrassment from this, as well as from every other anticipated cause of difficulty or danger. Have not recent events made it obvious to the slightest reflection, that the least deviation from this spirit of forbearance is injurious to every interest, that of humanity included? Amidst the violence of excited passions, this generous and fraternal feeling has been sometimes disregarded; and standing as I now do before my countrymen in this high place of honor and of trust, I cannot refrain from anxiously invoking my fellow-citizens never to be deaf to its dictates. Perceiving, before my election, the deep interest this subject was beginning to excite, I believed it a solemn duty fully to make known my sentiments in regard to it; and now, when every motive for misrepresentation has passed away, I trust that they will be candidly weighed and understood: at least, they will be my standard of conduct in the path before me. I then declared that, if the desire of those of my countrymen who were favorable to my election was gratified, 'I must go into the Presidential chair the inflexible and uncompromising opponent of every attempt, on the part of Congress, to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, against the wishes of the slaveholding States; and also with a determination equally decided to resist the slightest interference with it in the States where it exists.' I submitted also to my fellow-citizens, with fullness and frankness, the reasons which led me to this determination. The result authorizes me to believe that they have been approved, and are confided in, by a majority of the people of the United States, including those whom they most immediately affect. It now only remains to add, that no bill conflicting with these views can ever receive my constitutional sanction.

Such, sir, are the sentiments contained in his inaugural address to the people of this country. "No bill," says he, "conflicting with these views, can ever receive my constitutional sanction." What equivocation, noncommittalism, or mental reserve, is here shown! What more, again I ask, can any true friend to the South desire on this subject? and how has Mr. Van Buren demeaned himself, since his elevation to the Presidency, upon

*Mr. CHINN demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. C. said that, before the question was taken, he would ask that a resolution which he would send to the Clerk's table, and which he intended to offer in case of the rejection of the other, might be read for information.

The SPEAKER said it could only be read by leave.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, and addresses of every description, touching the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or in the States or Territories, or in any manner relating to the existence of slavery or the slave trade in the United States, be referred, without debate, to a select committee, with instructions to consider and report thereon.

this subject? What pledge is it that he has not complied with, to the letter, that he has ever made to the American people? I defy calumny itself to point to one.

Such, then, is the evidence that the South has for believing him sound on this great and paramount subject Such is their justification for sustainining him without fear upon this subject. Such is the evidence in relation to his own personal and political course; and I here ask and demand to know, if any there are that now think it unsatisfactory? It will not do for them now to say that he does not deny the constitutional right to interfere in the District—when their idol, Mr. CLAY, is a fathom more deeply committed in its favor than Mr. Van Buren, who admits there are obligations equally binding on him against interference as his constitutional obligations would be.

Having considered what Mr. Van Buren has said and done on this subject, I will now show what his friends who sustain him have said and done. Yes, sir, and have been said and done on this floor, in the hall of the Congress of the United States. Yes, I will not, by denunciation, or declamation, endeavor to show, but will do it by an exhibition of the records of this House, that no man will dare dispute, what course has been pursued here in relation to this subject, by what their opponents have been pleased to call Van Buren Democrats. I will commence with the history of the subject since the formation of the present parties. up to which time, the subject of Abolition had never been considered, or seriously entertained by this body. But before I proceed with this exposition of the recorded facts, which have taken place here, before our own eyes, by the parties, many of whom are still present, and now with us, I must beg to notice one further remark made by the honorable member from New York, [Mr. HUNT.] who immediately preceded me in this debate; and here I will take the occasion to say, that the same trick, disingenuousness, and hypocritical design, seem to have characterized the speeches of nearly every gentleman, whether from the North or from the South, of that party, who have addressed the House on this subject. It seems to have been the settled plan of the party, or they have adopted it with a uniformity that excludes all supposition of its occurring by accident, of arraigning the Democratic party, and denouncing them for attempting to make, as they are pleased to call it, political capital out of the subject of Abolition, while, sir, there has not been one of them who has spoken on that side, who has not attempted to produce the impression that the Democrats were the Abolitionists, and the Whigs deserved great credit for the noble stand that they had taken on the subject. This, sir, was the intended SAUCE for our Southern palate, while, in the next breath, if he was a Northern Whig particularly, he would inveigh and rant most furiously against the denials by the Democrats to the North and South of the most holy and sacred right of petition. This, sir, was their sauce for the palates of the fanatics of the North. While this game has been carried on by the Abolitionists and their advocates on this floor, the Southern wing of the same party have invariably risen and denounced, in the most unmeasured terms, those Democrats of the North who have dared to come forward to take one step towards the maintenance of the rights of the South, by voting for such resolutions as the South might consider safe, while they pass unnoticed, and frequently with fulsome compliments, those very Northern Whigs and Abolitionists, from whom they cannot get a vote even for any one of their own propositions: not one step taken by them against Abolitionists. By such means have Southern Whigs endeavored to draw off from the support of such measures as the South felt disposed to adopt for her own security; and to excuse themselves to the South for such a course here, they profess to be in favor of the most ultra measures for Southern institutions; measures that they believed no man living, not in a slaveholding State, dare go for, and by this manœuvre (to make political capital themselves) draw off the only men who have dared to stand by the South at all, and confound them with the whole body of the Abolitionists—their own friends—the Whig party of the North. This is the game now played here, to the deadly injury of every Southern interest; a game that now has become as clear to the eye of every intellectual intelligent man as noonday; a sophistry and deception too flimsy, let me tell these gentlemen, to escape the penetration of any plain practical discerning man. Sir, so barefaced have these practices become since the recent events of a certain convention, (pointing towards Harrisburg,) that it is difficult for a Southern man to rise in his place here, and complain of the injustice done by these petitioners to their institutions, without getting around his ears a swarm from the southern wing of a certain party. Can it be that these men are so exceedingly blind, as to flatter themselves that by bullying and their adroitness in debate, they can excuse this conduct before an unseduced and uncorrupted people?

Sir, let me say to these gentlemen that such a course is at the sacrifice of the dearest rights and interests of the South; and if they ever succeed with their ultra measures, they will have to rely alone for that success on the votes of those very men of the North who are the daily theme of their bitter denunciation. And how then will they reconcile this course with the gratitude that every sincere friend of the South must owe this party—something of which I propose to show by the journals, before I dismiss the subject?

But to the gentleman from New York, whom I promised to notice once more. That gentleman, after repudiating all intention of making political capital out of this subject, before he concluded, endeavored to identify the Abolitionists with the Democratic party. And, sir, how? It is a fault common to his party, North, South, East, and West. By individualizing cases! When we speak of societies, communities, whole parties, and conventions, and other assemblages of men, we are answered, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUNT] has done, by telling us of particular individuals, who are Abolitionists, that are Democrats. The gentleman has told us that Gerrit Smith is a Democrat, and a man by the name of Woodel, if I mistake not. I understood him to say that this Smith had been put in nomination by the Democratic party for United States Senator. I have since understood, from the highest authority, that this was the act of one man alone, and was done entirely for ridicule—that the party never dreamed of such a thing. And this has been eagerly seized on here, by several—not to make political capital of; oh no!—but to mention it merely as a circumstance.

Mr. FILLMORE said he did not understand his colleague [Mr. HUNT] as saying that Mr. Smith had been put in nomination by the Democratic party. He understood him as saying that he had been put in nomination by a member from the county of Otsego, (who had been run as Speaker by that party,) and that that gentleman had moved that the name of Gerrit Smith be inserted in the bill as a proper person to be supported for United States Senator.

Mr. PRENTISS, by the permission of Mr. B. made the following explanation of the case referred to above. Mr. P. said Mr. HUNT, of New York, in his remarks of yesterday, referred to the fact that Mr. Levi S. Chatfield, who represents the county of Otsego, in the Assembly of that State, had moved to insert the name of Gerrit Smith, a leading Abolitionist, in a bill appointing a United States Senator, and spoke of it as an evidence that the Democrats of the North favored that interest, Mr. Chatfield being, he said, a prominent member of that party, and its candidate for Speaker of the body of which he is a member.

Mr. P. asked leave to say a word in reply to the imputation upon Mr. Chatfield of being an Abolitionist. He said that Mr. C. was one of his constituents, and that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUNT] had spoken truly when he pronounced him to be a man of talents and influence. Mr. P. knew him well, and could assure the House that he was a Democrat; and one, too, who had been a uniform opponent of Abolitionism, not only in the county of Otsego, but in the Legislative Hall of his State, where the Democrats had sent him for the last two years to look after their interests. In the preliminary action of the Assembly on the question of appointing a Senator, Mr. Chatfield having been called on to nominate a candidate, named Eben B. Morehouse, who is a resident of the same town where my home is, and who has, on every suitable occasion, repudiated Abolition doctrines and sentiments; but in the further progress of the question, a bill was introduced for consummating the appointment, and Mr. C. finding that the Whigs were determined that no other name but that of Nathaniel P. Tallmadge should be inserted in it, and after the names of Albert H. Troy and Addison Gardner, two distinguished gentlemen of the opposite politics, had been rejected, moved that of Gerrit Smith, as a sort of burlesque upon the whole proceeding, which was carried on in such "hot haste" as to break over all the rules of legislation, the majority even refusing to print the bill which solemnized the marriage banns between Whigery and Conservatism.

Mr. B. said this had terminated just as he had expected when he heard it fall from the lips of the gentleman from New York. It was so perfectly in character with the statements which that party are in the daily habit of making upon every subject that they touched, that it never made the least impression on his mind, as to its truth. He was so accustomed to their idle and ridiculous statements that they seldom ever gave him much pain. The gentleman, too, contradicted himself before he got through with his story. He told us that Smith was stopped from his lectures in Utica by the Democratic mob, and he was compelled to retire to his own residence, some distance from the town, to effect his object; which showed, clearly, what a favorite he and his doctrines were with the Democratic party there. Now, he doubted very much if Smith himself was not a Whig; he had heard so, at least. Other instances might be cited of Abolitionists being in the Democratic party, he had no doubt.

Sir, I dare say there are hundreds, perhaps thousands of Abolitionists in the Democratic party. No man has ever doubted but that there were some; nor that there were Federalists in that party; and members of every other denomination; Quakers, Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Catholics, and Jews, if you please. This no man has ever undertaken to deny. Sir, there ever will be good and bad in all churches—backsliders and hypocrites; and it is the same with parties. But the characters of such churches, societies, and parties, are only effected seriously by such, until a majority of their members are proven to be of such materials, and in their proportion to the whole body. My design is not, therefore, to speak of individual instances, upon which so much stress is laid by the opposite party, not only here, but throughout the country, where they have attempted to confound the parties for political effect and deception; and which has rendered it so indispensably necessary (for a fair understanding of their position and relation) that the whole history of the course that each of the parties have pursued, as bodies, parties, and societies, should be exhibitedd, as it stands on the unalterable records and journals of the House. Sir, I will not stoop to deal in "as I am informed, and as I have heard." Such evidence does not become this, or any other deliberative body, upon so grave a subject. Up to the time of 1834, 1835, and 1836, this subject had produced but little excitement in any part of this country. The abolition of slavery in the West Indies, by the English, first put this ball in motion in this country, through those who so much admired English institutions, who readily seized on the religious fanaticism of our Northern brethren, who are known to be exceedingly inflammable, from the influence which their priests and ministers exercise over them throughout that section of country, in some parts of which, old England herself is not more priest-ridden; and I doubt much if the whole project is not of English birth, brought into this country, and nurtured through the affiliation of both the churches of England and America; and it is hence nothing more nor less than a covert religious crusade, against our Government, our Union, and our liberty. Look you, sir, at every petition in every public meeting or convention, and you will find the very "ear marks" of ministerial instrumentality nearly in every step and thing that has been taken and done on this subject; and who are now entering into the political arena of this country, and entwining themselves around one or the other of the great political parties of the nation. My whole object now, by reference to these facts, is to show by which party they have been most countenanced and sustained upon this floor; that the American public may be abused no longer by the most odious misrepresentations of partisan politicians and party presses. To these facts, I earnestly invite the attention of every member of the House, and every American citizen out of it, that would be informed on the subject. Here are the records, the resolutions, and propositions, and the names recorded, of those that sustained, and those that opposed them:

Twenty-fourth Congress, journals of the House of Representatives, January 6, 1836, page 141.

Mr. JARVIS [a Democrat from Maine] submitted the following, viz:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia ought not to be entertained by Congress.

And be it further resolved, That in case any petition praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, be hereafter presented, it is the deliberate opinion of this House that the same ought to be laid upon the table without being referred or printed.

The resolution being read,

A motion was made by Mr. John Quincy Adams, that the resolution do lie on the table.

This motion was equivalent to a rejection, and was so understood by Congress.

And the question being put, it was decided in the negative—yeas 66, nays 133.

Mr. B. read the names of those in the affirmative. Of these 66, there were 13 Democrats, 53 Whigs, and not a Southern Democrat amongst them; of that number there are 12 Southern Whigs.

On the 13th of January, page 177,

Mr. Jarvis modified his resolution so as to read as follows:

Whereas any attempt in the House to agitate the question of slavery is calculated to disturb the compromises of the Constitution, to endanger the Union, and, if persisted in, to destroy the peace and prosperity of the country; therefore,

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, ought not to be entertained by Congress; and it is further

Resolved, That in case any petition, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, be hereafter presented, it is the deliberate opinion of the House, that the same ought to be laid on the table, without being referred or printed.

A motion was made by Mr. CHILTON ALLEN, (Whig,) that the said resolution and amendments pending thereto, do lie on the table, and the question being put, it was decided in the negative—yeas 58, nays 155.

Of these fifty-eight, there were ten Democrats seven Southern Whigs, no Southern Democrats amongst them.

Page 235, January 25th. Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS offered to introduce an Abolition petition, and moved that it be received.

A motion was made by Mr. MILLER, (Democrat,) that the motion that the petition be received do lie on the table, and the question being put, that the House do agree to the motion made by Mr. MILLER; it passed in the affirmative—yeas 149, nays 45.

Of these forty-five nays, there were but five Democrats, two Southern Whigs, and no Southern Democrat.

This was as near a rejection of the question of reception as could well have been, and answered all practical purposes. On 4th of February, Journal, page 280, Mr. Pinckney of South Carolina introduced this resolution:

Resolved, That all the memorials which have been offered, or may hereafter be presented, to this House, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and also the resolutions offered by the honorable member from Maine [Mr. JARVIS] with an amendment thereto, proposed by an honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and every other paper or proposition that may be submitted in relation to that subject be referred to a Select Committee with instructions to report—

That Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institutions of slavery in any of the States of this Confederacy; and that, in the opinion of this House, Congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia, because it would be a violation of the public faith, unwise, impolitic, and dangerous to the Union; assigning such reasons for these conclusions, as, in the judgment of the committee, may be best calculated to enlighten the public mind, to repress agitation, to allay excitement, to sustain and preserve the just rights of the slaveholding States, and of the people of this District, and to establish harmony and tranquillity among the various sections of the Union.

A motion to suspend the rules of the House, to introduce these resolutions, was lost by a vote of 121 to 75. There not being two-thirds, the motion was lost. On the 8th of February, (page 305,) Mr. PINCKNEY renewed the motion to suspend the rules of the House, to introduce the same resolutions; and the question being put, the rules were suspended, two-thirds voting for it, yeas 135, nays 65. Of these 65, there were 9 Democrats.

[Mr. PRIGGS of Massachusetts said there were more than 9 Democrats.]

Mr. B. replied, there were, if the gentleman counted the Nullifiers; but at that time that party were acting against the Democrats; and of course he did not feel himself authorized to rank them with us. A motion was made to take the votes upon each separate proposition: the resolution to refer to a committee, passed by a vote of 174 to 48. I voted myself against the first resolution to refer to a committee, with 47 other Southern men. In reading Mr. B's own name, against this resolution, there was a considerable laugh. Mr. B. said, he thought at first, there must have been a mistake that he voted for the resolutions; but being informed that the vote was upon the first resolution for a reference to a committee that he was reading, he said then, that his name was recorded right—that he had always been opposed to referring these petitions, as an isolated proposition. He, however, had voted for the whole body of the resolutions.

Well, the next vote was on the second branch of the resolutions, in these words:

With instructions to report that Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institutions of slavery in any of the States of this Confederacy.

Against this part of the resolution there was but one Democrat and six Whigs.

Mr. B. called the particular attention of the House to the vote on the next division of the resolutions; and to it he invited the attention of every Southern man in this country. It developed a fact about which there could be no longer quibbling, and there was no other evidence that would place more clearly the parties in their proper positions in this House. The direct vote was upon the branch of the resolution, in these words:

That in the opinion of this House, Congress ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia.

Here sir, is a direct vote upon the proposition, that has so much distracted the people of this country, and is the first darling object that the Abolitionists themselves wish to accomplish; and it is needless for any man to tell me, who has voted against this direct proposition, that he is no Abolitionist, and that he does not lend himself to them. Upon this direct proposition, the question was, shall this part of the resolution pass; and votes were—ayes 163, nays 47.

Of these forty-seven, there were but five Democrats, leaving forty-two Whigs; amongst whom, there was not a man from any slaveholding State. [Cries from both sides, read their names, read their names; read them out; let us hear.] Mr. B. said that he would do so:

Messrs John Quincy Adams, Heman Allen, Jeremiah Bailey, John Banks, William K Bond, Nathaniel B. Borden, George N. Briggs, Wm. B. Calhoun, George Chambers, Timothy Childs, William Clark, Thomas Corwin, Caleb Cushing, Edw. Darlington, Hamer Denny, George Evans, Horace Everett, Philo C Fuller, Francis Granger, Gideon Hard, Abner Hazeltine, William Heister, Samuel Hoar, Hiram P. Hunt, Joseph R. Ingersoll, William Jackson, Henry F. Jones, Abbott Lawrence,* George W. Lay, Levi Lincoln, Thomas C. Love, Sampson Mason, Jonathan McCarty, Thomas M. T. McKennan, Mathias Morris, James Parker,† Dutee J. Pearce, Stephen Phillips, David Potts, jr. John Reed, David Russell, Jonathan Sloan, William Sprague, jr. Samuel F. Vinton, Taylor Webster, and Elisha Whittlesey.

What should any impartial mind desire more to convince it of the position and tendencies of the parties now before the country than this vote upon the direct question between the South and the Abolitionists? Forty three Whigs out of forty-seven voting against this direct proposition, against the interference, by the Abolitionists, with the rights of the people of the South; and, sir, singular is it to tell, at that time that number constituted a large majority of the whole Whig vote from the non-slaveholding States in this House.

Such, sir, are the recorded facts on your journals. Can they be explained away by the brilliancy of talent, or the cunning and ingenuity of man? Here I might rest this subject; but there is more to come of equal force, and the whole facts relative to this matter are demanded, by every sacred interest, to be known, and I am determined, as far as I am able, to present them to the public. The next part of the resolution is in these words:

Because it would be a violation of public faith, unwise, impolitic, and dangerous to the Union.

For this proposition, ayes 127, nays 75. Of these 75 nays, there were 23 Democrats, 52 Whigs; among whom there is no Democrat from the South, and but 4 Southern Whigs.

The remainder of the resolution was in these words:

Assigning such reasons for these conclusions as, in the judgment of the committee, may be best calculated to enlighten the public mind, to allay excitement, to repress agitation, to secure and maintain the just rights of the slaveholding States, and of the people of this District, and restore harmony and tranquillity amongst the various sections of this Union.

And passed in the affirmative—ayes 167, nays 6.

[Mr. HUBBARD of Alabama asked that the names of the six be read.]

Mr. BYNUM. Sir, I will do so.

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Heman Allen, George Evans, Stephen C. Philips, William Jackson, Abbott Lawrence, Jonathan Sloan—6."

All Whigs.

*Now eulogized by Southern men.

†Names of the Democrats italicized.

This closes the action of the House upon the adoption of the Pinckney resolutions.

On the 18th of May, page 846, Mr. Pinckney made his report from the select committee appointed under the resolutions I have just read. This report, after an able argument, concluded by recommending the adoption of three resolutions:

1. Resolved, That Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere in any way with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this Confederacy.

2. Resolved, That Congress ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia.

3. Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, propositions, resolutions, or papers, relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery, or the abolition of slavery, shall, without being either printed or referred, be laid upon the table, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon.

The vote upon the first resolution was passed by only nine opposing it, beginning with JOHN QUINCY ADAMS and closing with WILLIAM SLADE—no Democrat among them. The second resolution, which brought up again the immediate question now before us, and which is in these words, as I have just read,

Resolved, That Congress ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia,

Was passed by the following vote: yeas 132, nays 45, as recorded on page 881. The nays I will read for the information of the House and the country. Says the the journal:

Those who voted in the negative are:

Messrs. Heman Allen, Jeremiah Bailey, William K. Bond, Nathaniel Borden, George W. Briggs, William B. Calhoun, John Carr, George Chambers, Timothy Childs, William Clark, Caleb Cushing, Harmer Denny, Horace Everett, Philo Fuller, George Grinnell, Hiland Hall, Gideon Hard, Samuel Harrison, Abner Hazeltine, Joseph Henderson, William Heister, S. Hoar, Jonathan McCarty, Thomas M. T. McKennan, Mathias Morris, James Parker, Stephen Philips, David Potts, jr. John Reed, David Russell, William Slade, William Sprague, Samuel F. Vinton, Elisha Whittlesey, Hiram P. Hunt, Joseph Ingersoll, William Jackson, Henry F. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Daniel Kilgore, Amos Lane, Abbott Lawrence, Joshua Lee, Levi Lincoln, Sampson Mason."

Amongst these names, there are six Democrats; there may be one or two more, or less. My object has been to show the course that has been persued by the great body of the two parties upon this momentous subject. Now, sir, the Northern wing of the Whig party, at that time, never amounted to seventy representatives; I do not think there were more then than fifty-five or sixty. The majority of that wing then went invariably against every measure that was passed in opposition to the views and objects of the Abolitionists.

The third and last resolution, passed by a vote of 117 to 68, some of the Southern members voting against it, believing it admitted the right of reception—of the 68 there were 22 Democrats; the increase was caused by their hostility to the reception of the petitions. Thus concluded the action of this body upon the subject of Abolition in the first session of the 24th Congress; upon which I leave it to the American people and an impartial world to make the comment. Sir, what must be the verdict of the South and Southwest, in examining this evidence, who have been so much insulted and abused by the impositions and misrepresentations that have been so long played off on them, by their artful politicians and treacherous public presses? But it is for them to revenge the wrong, and apply the remedy.

I will now, said Mr. B., call the attention of the body to the proceedings of this House upon the same subject, at the 2d session of the 24th Congress. You will find, on page 231 of the journals, January 18, that Mr. HAWES, of Kentucky, introduced the following resolution—

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, propositions, or papers, relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery, or to the abolition of slavery, shall, without being printed or referred, be laid upon the table, and that no further action be had thereon.

Mr. Hawes, before taking his seat, called the previous question, which cut off all amendments and debate; and the question being so taken on its consideration under the previous question, I voted against both, wishing myself to offer a further amendment, which was cut off, however, by the previous question. I then voted for the resolution in its present shape, and it then passed by the following vote—Yeas 129, nays 60.

Of these 69 that voted against this resolution, there were but 12 Democrats, as they then ranked.

Mr. B. again read over the names of those that voted in the negative on the adoption of the resolution, and begged to be corrected, if he had made a mistake.

*Mr. Adams did not vote; perhaps he was absent.

Such is the evidence of the facts, at that session, as exhibited by the records of the House and the journals of that body. The adoption of this resolution put the subject to rest during that session, and we heard no more of it until the Twenty-fifth Congress. Sir, we have been amused, or rather entertained, with homilies and long dissertations about the right of petition, a right that no man here or elsewhere denies in its constitutional sense. It reminds me much of the barrel thrown out to amuse the whale while the vessel escapes with its freight. It is done to effect two objects: one to make a favorable issue with Abolitionists, the other to delude us while they strike for Abolition. It shows the arts of the old enemy, emanating from the craft family. To expose this duplicity and double dealing, I call the attention of the House and the American public to the journals of the third session of the Twenty fifth Congress, December 20, page 125, where they will find recorded, in these words, [reading from the journal,]

The House proceeded to the consideration of the memorial of Isaiah Stokes and two hundred and ninety-two other men, and of Rachael Frank and three hundred and four other women, of the town of Storksborough and its vicinity, in the State of Vermont, praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, presented by Mr. Slade on the 18th instant; and of the motion made by Mr. Slade on that day, that the said memorial be referred to a select committee.' When Mr. Slade modified said motion, as follows: That the said memorial be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report a bill providing for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

I pray every Southern man in this nation to look at this, and weigh well its authority. Here is a direct proposition to effect the desired object, coming immediately from one who, of all others, ought to know best of the objects of the Abolitionists; but, as others have done, he too may say he is no Abolitionist, as though to effect their object under another name. Now, sir, what becomes of this "tub" about the right of petition, that gentlemen have thrown out to us, and descanted on so learnedly? Here is their object and bantling, stripped by its own nurse, and presented naked to us, in all its native deformity, which it has been the indefatigable efforts of gentlemen on this floor so long to keep concealed, while they have made battle on us upon the more plausible issue of the right of petition, about which they dare not introduce a proposition, for fear it would command a unanimous support, if pressed in any constitutional form. But my present object is not comment, but the exhibition of facts, that are beyond contradiction.

During the pendency of this enormous proposition, you know well, Mr. Speaker, the extraordinary excitement that prevailed here. You must recollect, when the Representatives from the South left their seats, and resolved never to return, until the question was settled—when nothing was talked of by them scarcely but the immediate call of a Southern convention—when every paper was filled with rumors of an immediate separation and dissolution of this Government, and which resulted in the call of an exclusive Southern meeting, without regard to parties. Yes, they met in one of your committee rooms, and resolved on offering a certain resolution, which has since been denounced in this House as a Northern resolution. I allude to the resolution offered by Mr. PATTON of Virginia, under the instructions of an exclusive Southern meeting. Here is that resolution:

Journals of the House of Representatives, December 21st, page 127, second session, Twenty-fifth Congress.

Mr. Patton moved that the rules prescribing the order of business be suspended for the purpose of receiving and acting on a resolution in the words following, viz:

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, and papers touching the abolition of slavery, or buying, selling, or the transferring slaves in any State, District, or Territory, of the United States be laid upon the table without being debated, printed, read, or referred, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon.

After two preliminary votes taken upon suspension of the rules, both resulting in the affirmative, the main question was put in the following words, to wit:

Page 129. Will the House agree to the resolution? and passed in the affirmative—yeas 122, nays 74.

---

*The same that was proposed by a gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. CHINN.

Here Mr. B. held up the journals and exhibited the yeas and nays there recorded, and said: Sir, amongst those 122 who voted in the affirmative I challenge any man to name one Whig from the North, or non-slaveholding States; a fact that will fall like a clap of thunder upon the ears of every Southern man that has heretofore acted in concert with that party; while amongst the 74 voting against this resolution, there is not the name of a man from a slaveholding State, and only 14 Democrats from the Northern States, of more than 80, leaving 60 Whigs, who voted against the resolution of Mr. Patton.

This resolution, Mr. Speaker, was of the mildest nature, when examined. It asked nothing—denied no right of petition, but simply determined not to act upon this most alarming and distracting question; against which, however, sixty Whigs voted, and for which, not one Whig from the non-slaveholding States voted. Here, let it not be forgotten, that by reference to the votes on the Speaker's election, that sixty votes constituted a large majority of the whole Whig vote, both from the North and South, at that time, added together in this House. Now, sir, as fact and figures cannot lie, here is an awful demonstration of feelings and sentiments, by their own recorded acts, of a majority of a party towards the sacredness of the institutions, the peace and safety of the entire people of one section of our country; and to it, I invoke the attention and serious consideration of every man, who has at heart the interest or safety of the Southern portion of this Republic. Sir, tell me—feed me no longer with empty professions in the teeth of these recorded facts.

Mr. Speaker, I have said before, that it was not individual cases that demonstrated the general characters of men or measures, that no denomination, church, society, community, state or nation, could be charged with being tainted, or with corruption, for having now and then corrupt individuals in them; but when it was evident that a majority of the members of a church or party were tainted or corrupt, then it was that the body of the members became amenable, and subject to the imputation of possessing and fostering the feelings and principles of that majority, and which gave to it its only true character.

But, sir, let us return to the journals of the next, the 3d, session of the 25th Congress. On the 11th of December, (page 51,) Mr. ATHERTON introduced a series of five resolutions, for the purpose of arresting the progress of Abolition petitions, which had been agreed on by the Democrats both from the North and from the South, in a meeting held by that party from both sections of the country. I will read each part of the resolution, and the votes on the separate divisions, and the House and the public may judge of their character. Page 58, the question was taken on the first resolution, which was in these words:

Resolved, That this Government is a Government of limited powers; and that, by the Constitution of the United States, Congress has no jurisdiction whatever over the subject of slavery in the several States in the Confederacy.

Against this resolution there were but six votes, viz: yeas 198, nays 6—all Whigs.

NAYS.—Messrs. John Q. Adams, George Evans, Horace Everett, David Potts, David Russell, and William Slade.

On the 12th December, page 60, the question was put on the second resolution, which was in these words:

Resolved, That petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and the Territories of the United States, and against the removal of slaves from one State to another, are part of a plan of operations set on foot to effect the institutions of slavery in the several States, and indirectly, to destroy that institution within their limits.

For it 136; against it 65.

Amongst these nays there are the names of but three Democrats, leaving sixty-two good and true Whigs, a considerable majority of that whole party, then members of this House, and but one Southern man, and he a Whig. Mr. B. read the names of the nays, and begged to be corrected if he erred.

Next came up the third resolution, which, being divided, the vote was taken on the first branch of the resolution, in these words:

Resolved, That Congress has no right to do that indirectly which it cannot do directly.

Yeas 170, nays 30.

Of these thirty nays, there is not the name of a single Democrat.

Then came up the remaining branch of the same resolution, which is in these words:

And that the agitation of the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, or the Territories, as a means or with a view of disturbing or overthrowing that institution in the several States, is against the true spirit and meaning of the Constitution, an infringement of the rights of the States affected, and a breach of the public faith on which they entered into this Confederacy.

Upon this the votes were: yeas 164, nays 39.

Among the thirty-nine, there is the name of but one Democrat; none from the South of either party.

The fourth resolution was then taken up, and a vote taken on its first branch, a division being called for, which first branch was in these words, page 64:

Resolved, That the Constitution rests on the broad principle of equality among the members of this Confederacy.

And passed in the affimative—Yeas 182, nays 26.

Of these 26, there is not the name of a Democrat—one Southerner, a Whig.

The House then voted on the 2d branch of the fourth resolution, in these words:

And that Congress, in the exercise of its acknowledged powers, has no right to discriminate between the institutions of one portion of the States and another, with a view of abolishing the one and promoting the other.

On this the yeas are 174, nays 26.

Among which 26 there is not the name of a Democrat.

The question then came up on the fifth and last resolution: a division being demanded, the vote was taken on the first branch, in these words:

Resolved, That attempts on the part of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, or the Territories, or to prohibit the removal of slaves from State to State, or to discriminate between the institutions of one portion of the Confederacy and another, with the views aforesaid, are in violation of the Constitution, destructive of the fundamental principles on which the union of these States rests, and beyond the jurisdiction of Congress.

Which passed in the affirmative, yeas 149, nays 52. Of these 52, there were 5 Democrats, and no Southern man of either party. (Journal, page 68.) The question was then put on the second branch of the fifth resolution, which was almost identically a copy of the resolution of Mr. Patton, offered by him under the instructions of an exclusive Southern meeting, without distinction of parties, and in the following words:

And that every petition, memorial, resolution, or paper, touching, or relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to slavery, as aforesaid, or the abolition thereof, shall, on the presentation thereof, without any further action thereon, be laid upon the table, without being debated, printed, or referred.

And the question being put on the proposition, it passed in the affirmative, yeas 128, nays 78. Of the 78 negatives, there were 9 Democrats, leaving 69 Whigs, of which 69, there were 5 Southern men.

Now, sir, I pray every Southern man to examine these resolutions, read them over and over again, one by one, and to say, if they were not sufficiently strong to secure every Southern interest; while they particularly forebore to encroach on the rights of any other portion of this Union; not an intimation about the denial of the right of petition is contained in them. They only claimed the right to dispose of them as the House thought proper, when presented, and which was by laying them on the table, &c. Now had the House no right to do this. If not, it had no right to reject the prayer of the petitioners; and if it could not do that, why not let the ignorant Abolitionists come in, and turn us out of the House at once, and take the matter into their own hands; and show at once the enormous absurdity that this Government has not the power of self-preservation? Sir, by those resolutions the right of petition was not invaded, unless, after their presentation here, we were bound to grant their prayer, and had not the right to treat that prayer, after presentation of the petition, as in the wisdom of this body, was best calculated to promote the interest, the peace, and safety of the Republic. Sir, deny this House that power, and, instanter, you dissolve the whole political body into original elements, and subject us to the reign of anarchy, confusion, bloodshed, and civil war.

The requisitions, therefore, of the Abolitionists, and their advocates on this floor, (their demands I might say,) as to what manner their petitions and prayers are to be treated by us, are monstrous and revolutionary, and will never be submitted to, while there is a freeman from the North or South to resist them.

Yet, these resolutions were denounced to the North as the "gag" that prevented and obstructed the execution of the designs of these Abolitionists, couched, too, as they are, in the mildest and most respectful terms. But, sir, when have mild epithets ever proved satisfactory to the wild Moloch of fanaticism? Never, sir, never has it been satisfied, until it had surfeited itself upon the very blood it had spilled, and yawned over the crime and spoils with which it had afflicted mankind.

But what is strange, strange, still more strange to tell, Mr. Speaker, these resolutions, while they were denounced by the Abolitionists of the North, as being the most arbitrary, infamous, and tyrannical measures that ever had disgraced the halls of a legislative council, were denounced at the South at the same time by the Southern wing of a party, as "dough-faced Northern resolutions," introduced through treachery, to barter away the rights of the South, and to secure and protect the rights of the Abolitionists. Yes, sir, Southern men, acting in concert with the Abolitionists, catering here and elsewhere for them, have been found to denounce these resolutions for favoring the Abolitionists; while the Abolitionists denounce them to the North, for sacrificing their sacred rights as men.

Sir, was there ever such an anomaly before presented to the minds of intelligent freemen? Can the South, and will the North, longer bear this political shuffling with the rights and interests of each, as dear to them as life itself, and upon a subject, too, pregnant with more evils than were contained in the "box of Pandora." We have been told—the South has been told, that these were Northern resolutions, by men whose object was, perhaps, to decoy the South into the ambush of Abolitionists; while the Abolitionists were telling the people of the North that they were Southern resolutions, to decoy them there into the same ambush of the Abolitionists: the effects of the conjoint efforts of the two branches of this party, have been to give encouragement and strength to the Abolitionists, and to promote their unholy designs in every quarter of this Union. My God! sir, and will the South not understand this, until "Brennus knocks at the gates of Rome?"

Mr. Speaker, I see now, by their looks, that my Southern friends, though of an opposite party, begin to see the awful situation into which they have placed themselves by this extraordinary course.

[Here there was some interruption that took place in the House, which was in an under tone.]

Mr. B. said, if any gentleman was dissatisfied with the truth of his remarks, let him retire—not sit and interrupt him in an under tone; or, with the courage and honor of a gentleman, let him rise and tell him wherein he had offended. He surely had not intended to offend any gentleman, and never would do it except in self-defence.

He continued, the resolutions of Mr. ATHERTON had been pronounced to have been Northern resolutions by Southern men, and Southern resolutions by Northern men, and this has been kept up by the party to operate on the ignorant of both sections, and which, to a certain extent, has had its effect, by returning an additional number of Abolitionists from the North, and certain men from the South, to co-operate with them on the floors of Congress. These resolutions were the result of the most sober and grave deliberation of the whole Democratic party, both from the North and the South, and were originally drawn up by a Southern man, [Mr. RHETT of South Carolina,] a Southern man of stability, of influence, of worth, and with character to lose—no bankrupt without personal interest in any section of the country, but one who has a deep personal interest in the very subject at issue. He drew the original resolutions, and which, after some verbal alterations, were adopted by this House, and by a majority of the Representatives from both the slave and non-slaveholding States. In the series of the five resolutions, the one offered by Mr. Patton, under the instructions of an exclusive Southern meeting, without regard to parties, and adopted without a dissenting vote from the South at the last session, was inserted and contained in the fifth resolution, almost verbatim, in substance identical, against which, however, when introduced by Mr. ATHERTON, there were Southern men of the Whig party found to vote, and others to denounce, as Northern and hypocritical, and refused to vote on them. Mr. ATHERTON, sir, was nominated to introduce these resolutions by a Southerner, Mr. LEWIS from Alabama, whose fidelity to the South, treachery itself will hardly assume the boldness to doubt. Such was the character of these resolutions, which politicians of the South, who act with Abolitionists here, have pronounced hypocritical and Northern; while their Abolition friends at the North stigmatize them as a "gag law" to the Abolitionists, and a denial to them of the right of petition; and this has been the systematic mode pursued by both flanks of that party to effect their unholy purpose.

Before I leave the journals of the last session, there is one more fact that I wish to advert to, and to which again I must entreat the attention of every man of both parties, who desire the fact in relation to this matter; and to this fact I would particularly call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOTTS.] whose course differs so widely here from his predecessors upon this subject, and who, as a kind of apology, I will not say for the Abolitionists, but for his course in preferring the reception and a reference of these petitions, has said that there were not twenty Abolitionists in this House. I wish, sir, I could think with that gentlemen; but so far from it, I am compelled, from the following, and preceding evidence, to believe that his estimate is not more than a fourth or fifth of the number. On page 75 of the same journals, sir, you will find the following records:

A motion was made by Mr. Slade, that the rules in relation to the order of business be suspended, to enable him to move a resolution, which was read at the Clerk's table, as follows:

Whereas, there exists, and is carried on, between the ports in the District of Columbia, and other ports of the United States, and under the sanction of the laws thereof, a trade in human beings, whereby thousands of them are annually sold and transported from said District to distant parts of the country, in vessels belonging to citizens of the United States:

Therefore, to the end that all obstacles to the consideration of this subject may be removed, and a remedy for the evil speedily provided:

Resolved, That so much of the fifth section of the resolutions on the subject of slavery, passed by this House on the 11th and 12th of the present month, as relates to the removal of slaves from State to State, and prohibits the action of this House, and every petition, memorial, resolution, or paper touching the same be, and hereby is, rescinded.

And on the question shall the rules be suspended for the purpose aforesaid, it passed in the negative—yeas 56, nays 147.

Here are the yeas and nays, as recorded. Among the yeas there are but three solitary Democrats, of 56, leaving 53, then, a majority of the whole Whig party, who voted in favor of Mr. SLADE's resolution.

Here, sir, is a fact more striking than any heretofore referred to. Here is a vote upon a proposition direct—coming, too, from the leader of the party, whose Abolitionism no one will doubt, but a Southern Whig, whose object is to throw dust in the eyes of his own constituents, and to keep them blinded to the arts of the enemy, who seek to despoil them. Yes, sir; upon this vote every "dough faced Democrat" from the North, that voted, (except three,) is recorded with the South, against this Abolition resolution, offered by WILLIAM SLADE, of Vermont, one of the most renowned Abolitionists in America. Will it be contended that there was no Abolitionism in that resolution? Was it not as fair a test question as could well have been made in this House.

And strange, strange to tell, we have seen and heard denounced, in the vilest and bitterest terms, by a Southern man, these very "dough-faced Democrats" who had the patriotism and firmness to come up and vote down this resolution to rescue their country from the vortex of revolution and civil war. Will the South believe it, that there are men here, sent by herself to represent her interests, who are the first to rise in their places to denounce those who have dared to come forward to lend and rest their all, and give her their aid in rejecting these most obnoxious measures, while those that have brought forward and sustained these measures by their votes, receive daily their most fulsome compliments? Sir, this is no fancy—it is history. They are facts recorded, and subject to be seen by all who will examine. Is there nothing wrong in this? Is there in it nothing that should haunt the consciences of men? But upon this it is not my province to decide; it belongs to the people of the South, and to them I most cheerfully submit it.

We have at length travelled through your journals up to the present first session of the Twenty-sixth Congress, to the records of which I refer for the evidence I propose to exhibit to prove that the majority, not of the Northern wing of the Whig party only, but a majority of that party in this House, in spite of their assertions that they are no Abolitionists, have invariably acted, and do now act, with them on this floor, either as principals accessaries, or coadjutors. I find the following record of the proceedings on Monday, 13th of January, 1840. An Abolition petition being presented by Governor LINCOLN of Massachusetts, and the question of its reception being raised:

The question was then taken on Mr. CAVE JOHNSON's motion to lay the question of reception on the table, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 131, nays 68.

I will not read the yeas, as it is my purpose to show only the course of that party that has invariably favored the views of the Abolitionists here, and opposed the South upon every occasion. This is the first question on which the parties divided, in which the sixty-eight took their stand for the Abolitionists, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Barnard, Biddle, Briggs, Brockway, Ansen Brown, Calhoun, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Corwin, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Davee, Edward Davies, Edwards, Ely, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fletcher, Gates, Giddings, Goode, Granger, Grinnell, Hall, W. S. Hastings, Henry, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, Lawrence, Lincoln, Lowell, Marvin Mitchell, Morgan, Naylor, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Parmenter, Peck, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Reed, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Simonton, Slade, John Smith, Truman Smith, Storrs, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, T. W. Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—68.

Of this number there is but one Southern man, (a Whig,) and only six Northern Democrats, leaving sixty-one good honest Whigs, well known to be a considerable majority of their whole party united in the House.

The next day, sir, January the 14th, Mr. COLES of Virginia introduced his resolution, which is nearly a literal copy of that of Mr. PATTON of Virginia, which I have before re-ferred to, and which originated in an exclusive Southern meeting of members here, without distinction of parties, and which was introduced by Mr. PATTON under their special instruction, and which, on its presentation and adoption, there was not a single Southern man of either party to be found voting against, as is shown by the records containing the votes on its passage.

Mr. B. then read as follows:

Mr. COLES said he believed it was now in order for him to move an amendment to the 54th and 55th rules; and he would therefore submit the following, which he hoped would receive the favorable consideration of the House:

All petitions, memorials, and papers, touching the abolition of slavery, or the buying, selling, or the tranferring of slaves in any State, District, or Territory of the United States, shall, upon their presentation, be laid on the table, without being debated, printed, read, or referred, and no further action whatever shall be had thereon."

This resolution, originating in a Southern meeting exclusively, and introduced by Mr. PATTON under the instructions of that meeting, against which, on its adoption, not a Southern man voted, was now denounced by Southern Whigs, and on this floor, as hypocritical and treacherous, after, too, they had voted themselves for it.

I read from the proceedings of the House, said Mr. B.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina moved to lay the amendment on the table with a view of offering a substitute.

Mr. CROSS called for the yeas and nays.

And after the remarks of several members, and motions on order, calls of the House, the vote was taken on Mr. COLES's resolution, offered as an amendment to the rules of the House, and it was rejected by Mr. THOMPSON's (Whig) motion to lay on the table.

The votes are as follows—yeas 102, nays 98:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Black, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Sampson H. Butler, Calhoun, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Colquitt, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Davee, Edward Davies, Garrett Davis, Dawson, Dillett, Edwards, Ely, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fisher, Fletcher, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Gerry, Giddings, Goode, Granger, Graves, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, W. S. Hastings, Henry, Hillen, Hoffman, James, Charles Johnston, Wm C. Johnson, Kempshall, Lawrence, Lincoln, Lowell, Marvin, Mitchell, Morgan, C. Morris, Naylor, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Parmenter, Peck, Pickens, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Reed, Reynolds, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Sumter, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, John White, Thomas W. Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—102.

Of these 102 that voted down this resolution, the name of every Northern Whig is recorded who voted on the subject, making 63—9 Democrats, leaving out the State Rights men—and 30 Southerners; making 102 yeas. This resolution, then, it is seen, was voted down, at last, by an entire Abolition Whig vote, constituting, within a small fraction, two-thirds of those that opposed its passage.

Now, sir, let us examine the votes on the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina himself, (Mr. THOMPSON,) to see how many of his good Whig friends sustained him. I will read only the nays, to show the character of those whom the gentleman voted with, against Mr. COLE's resolution. Here they are:

Mr. Thompson of South Carolina handed to the Chair the following resolution, which was read for the information of the House, and moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to offer it:

Resolved, That upon the presentation of any memorial or petition praying for the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in any District, Territory, or State of the Union, and upon the presentation of any resolution or other paper touching that subject, the reception of such memorial, petition, resolution, or paper, shall be considered as objected to, and the question of its reception shall be laid upon the table, without debate, or further action thereon.

Mr. Everett asked for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. Adams moved the indefinite postponement of the motion to suspend the rules.

The CHAIR was of opinion that the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts was not in order, because, if it prevailed, the effect would be that no motion to suspend the rules would be in order for the remainder of the session.

Mr. BLACK asked if the motion of the gentlemen from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] to suspend the rules, should prevail, if it would be in order for him to offer an amendment to the resolution of that gentleman.

The CHAIR replied in the affirmative.

Mr. BLACK said, that in that case he would offer an amendment.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and it was lost, there not being two-thirds voting in the affirmative—yeas 128, nays 77, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Judson Allen, Simeon H. Anderson Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Black, Blackwell, Botts, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, S. H. Butler, Wm. O. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Carroll, Carter, Chapman, Chinn, Coles, Colquitt, Mark A. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Dana, John Davis, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dillett, Doig, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Fisher, Floyd, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gentry, Gerry, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Green, Griffin, Habersham, Hammond, John Hastings, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Holmes, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Wm. Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Pettikin, Pickens, Pope, Rayner, Rives, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Thomas Smith, Stanly, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Sumter, Sweeny, Taliaferro, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, W. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Warren, Watterson, Weller, Edward D. White, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Sherrod Williams, and Worthington—128.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Baker, Barnard, Biddle, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, Casey, Chittenden, Clark, Clifford, James Cooper, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Davee, Edward Davies, Doan, Edwards, Ely, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Gates, Giddings, Goode, Granger, Grinnell, Hand, William S. Hastings, Henry, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Chas. Johnston, Kempshall, Lawrence, Lincoln, Lowell, Mallory, Marvin, Mitchell, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Parish, Parmenter, Peck, Prentiss, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Reed, Reynolds, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Simonton, Slade, Albert Smith, John Smith, Truman Smith, Storrs, Swearingen, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, P. J. Wagner, Thos. W. Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—77.

Here are 77 who voted to reject the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, of which there are 62 good and true Northern Whigs, and 14 Democrats; not one Northern Whig voting for the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina; while it is sustained by the entire Democratic party, except 14. One Whig from the South voted with the Whigs of the North.

This motion is from an enemy of the Democracy of both the North and South; and, sir, how do they vote on it? They have marched up in a solid phalanx to sustain the gentleman's proposition on the subject of slavery, when not a single friend of his Whig brethren of the North has voted for his proposition, and he has had to rely solely upon the votes of the Democrats to carry his own proposition on this subject. Every Northern Whig vote, that voted at all, is recorded against the motion of the member from South Carolina; while every Democrat, except 14, of both the North and South, is recorded in its favor, that voted on the subject. Mark, sir, the coincidence: against the resolution of Mr. COLES there were 63 Whigs from the North that voted; against the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina there are 62, and the other did not vote; the whole strength of the Northern Whig and Abolition party. Now, sir, can that gentleman want stronger evidence, or evidence more complete; that, though their bitter enemy, whenever he offers a proposition against the Abolitionists, he is compelled to rely for its support on the Democrats; yes, sir, and Northern Democrats too? There is the evidence before him; not one of his brother Whigs from the North has deigned to touch his proposition against the petitions of the Abolitionists, while the Democrats have come up like men, and sustained a proposition coming, as they knew it did, from their enemy. Had it come from a different source, my life on it, the proposition would have gotten a stronger vote. Will the gentleman communicate these facts to his constituents?

Now, sir, one word to that gentleman and his party to the South, who profess to be opposed to the movements of the Abolitionists. I ask them, if they are sincere in believing it a subject of vital interest to the South, paramount to all others, how can they longer, after the exhibition of such proofs, remain in the ranks of a party, a majority of which, it has been shown by the clearest and most incontestable evidence, is deadly hostile to the dearest interest of that people, whom they profess to represent here? Sir, I have shown the records; they do not lie. They will not, they dare not, be disputed. Then how can gentlemen get over them? What apology have they to make to their constituents of the South for acting with a party that has been so uniformly against them upon every question effecting so deeply their most vital interests, and would aid in the annihilation of the very institutions under which they live? What will that insulted people say to those who have stood up here, day after day, and abused, vilified, and denounced the only men from the North who had the courage to defy the Abolitionits, and come forward to rescue their country from revolution and civil war; while on the other hand, they were denounced here before our faces, when voting on Mr. COLE's resolutions, as white Southern slaves to the North, and were ordered to be brought in, and by an Abolitionist, too, sir, here, before our eyes, in the hearing of us all.

[Here a personal altercation took place between Messrs. BYNUM and PECK, out of which grew several motions and a debate, which several engaged in, as published before.]

After some further explanations by Mr. PECK, Mr. B. continued: I regret, exceedingly, having a personal difficulty with any gentleman; I had studiously avoided making a single personal allusion, until called on and forced into it by questions that had been propounded to me, and had hoped it had been put at rest, after what had transpired. Sir, the language upon which I had predicated my remarks which was taken to be offensive, I will read from the proceedings, as recorded in the reports of January 13th, and which has not been contradicted to this day: I find in them these words, viz:

Mr. PECK moved for a call of the House; there were some Northern slaves there, he said, whom he wanted to be emancipated. Mr. P. then called for the yeas and nays on his motion," &c.

Again:

Mr. PECK moved a call of the House, but subsequently withdrew it. We have, said he, some refugee slaves from the North, that I wish brought in.

Now, sir, can any man be at a loss to know to whom this language was applied? Was it not made directly to those patriotic Democrats, Mr. ATHERTON and others from the North, who had dared to vote with the South upon this great question of Abolition? and who have the moral courage to stand up against the denunciations of the Abolitionists, both on this floor and off of it?—stigmatized too, as they have been, by the most treacherous spirits of the South? Yes, sir, these are the men whom I have shown, by the votes of the House, that the South has ever had to rely on for support on this question, and who have come forward in a solid phalanx to our aid; while the entire vote of the Northern Whigs has been cast dead against us, without an exception, scarcely, on every occasion; without whose assistance (the Democrats, I mean,) the South could never have carried a single measure on this subject; and, sir, let the subject come up agan, in any form or shape, and, my life upon it, they will be the only support that we will get from the North. If they do not come to our rescue, the South is undone, so far as her rights are observed here; and a revolution, a bloody revolution will be inevitable. I then implore these gentlemen from the South to reflect upon the injustice they do their own section of country, in denouncing the only party in this House that they can expect the least assistance from; the want of gratitude that they are guilty of to them, and the treason that they commit by such conduct to the whole South; I will not say intentionally, but the ruinous and destructive effects of it will be identically the same.

Sir, the course pursued by the two parties on this momentous subject, is big with the fate of the Republic, and time, I fear, will but too soon demonstrate the fact. The great question at issue is beyond party catering, as its discussion is above all personalities; it looks to higher objects; and blink it as you may, if persisted in, must soon resolve itself into a question of peace or war—a war, perhaps, the most desolating that has ever afflicted the human race; and I now say to gentlemen, beware how you play with lighted torches over this magazine of gunpowder.

I have now shown, I think, to the satisfaction of every mind that is willing to be satisfied, that so far as the action of this House has taken place, the whole Whig party from the non-slaveholding States have acted and co-operated throughout, on every occasion, nearly, with the Abolitionists on this floor, and in fact, if they are not the Abolitionists or coadjutors of that party here, there are none such in existence; and if proofs plainer, more indisputable, more conclusive, are wanting to establish the fact, it is folly to attempt the production of further evidence to the human mind. Sir, I am ready to admit, I am unlike the honorable member from Virginia, who declared the other day that he did not believe that there were twenty Abolitionists on this floor, although it is a very different sentiment from what has heretofore fallen from that wing of the party. I am sorry to admit the fact, that my experience for years here has brought me to a very different conclusion. I am fully satisfied in my own mind, that in the Democratic party—and none are more sorry that it is so—there are from five to ten members here tinctured with Abolitionism, and from the same kind, though much stronger evidence, it is my conscientious and solemn conviction, that there are from 65 to 75 Abolitionists in the Whig party that now hold seats on this floor; and think I have shown, if deeds give character to men or parties, that a majority of that whole party in this House, from both South and North, if not open Abolitionists, covertly act with them upon every occasion. These are facts, I know, that are unpleasant to be known to some; but, sir, it is the duty of a faithful representative to make them known, and particularly at this time, to the Southern portion of the people of this country, who are alone so deeply interested in this subject. I should feel recreant, Mr. Speaker, and guilty of the highest treason to their interest, to conceal longer facts from them, so manifest, clear, and convincing to my mind, from any earthly considerations of a party nature. Hence it has been my sole purpose to present facts, and not arguments, that the people themselves might make their own commentary, and from which to draw their own conclusions. I now close the evidence founded upon the indisputable records of this House, and submit it to this House, the people of this country, and the world, to decide what party in this House, and how far they have identified themselves with the Abolitionists.

I will now proceed to show, from evidence external of this body, a further co-operation and identification of the Northern and Western branch of the Whig party with those of the Abolitionists, and will, in the first place, call the attention of the House to journals of the Senate, first session, Twenty-fourth Congress, page 266. It is well known that the grounds upon which the admission of Arkansas in the Union was opposed, was in consequence of her recognising the institution of slavery in her Constitution. I find, on this page, April 4th, the proceedings in that body, body follows:

The bill for the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union, and to provide for the execution of the laws of the United States within the same, and for other purposes, having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, was read a third time.

On the question, Shall this bill pass? It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 31, nays 6.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present, those who voted in the affirmative are:

Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Preston, Rives, Robison, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, Knight, Porter, Prentiss, Robins, Swift—all six Whigs.

The two Whig Senators from Massachusetts not voting—in fact, not a Whig Senator from New England voting for it, while every Democratic Senator from New England voted for the bill. Do these votes not import something of the character of parties more potent than arguments or professions? Sir, they are matters of record not to be denied; or shall we be told it was all the result of accident merely? No, sir; no sir; it is not the character of accidents to occur with such systematic uniformity. Hence, then, you find in both bodies a systematic co-operation of one party with all the plans and objects of the Abolitionists; and as systematic co-operation of the other party of the North with the South in opposition to them and their fanatic, ruinous, and destructive schemes. It is well known what interest the Abolitionists took, at that time, in having the admission of the State of Arkansas rejected, on account of its being a slaveholding State.

A corresponding move to this was made in the House of Representatives, June 13th, journals same date, page 1003, after a motion was made by Mr. LINCOLN of Massachusetts, May 26th, page 886, to amend a motion of Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia, in these words: "and to receive memorials relating to the admission of Arkansas into the Union."

The bill passed, however, on the 13th of June, page 1002, by the following vote: yeas 143, nays 52. The nays, for the information of the House and the country, I will read, to demonstrate, if possible, still more conclusively, the uniform, systematic, co-operation and identification of that branch of the Whig party with the Abolitionists in all their combined attacks upon Southern institutions.

Those who voted against the bill are:

Messrs. John Q. Adams, Heman Allen, Joseph Anthony, Jeremiah Bailey, William K. Bond, Nathaniel B. Borden, George Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Timothy Childs, William Clark, Joseph H. Crane, Samuel Mason, Jonathan McCarty, Thomas M. T. McKennan, Mathias Morris, James Parker, Dutee J. Pearce, Caleb Cushing, Edward Darlington, Harmer Denny, George Evans, Horace Everett, Philo C. Fuller, George Grinnell, jr. Hiland Hall, Gideon Hard, James Harper, Abner Hazeltine, Stephen C. Philips, David Potts, jr. John Reed, David Russell, William Shinn, William Slade, Joseph Henderson, William Heister, Samuel Hoar, William Jackson, Henry F. Jones, Benjamin Jones, John Laporte, ABBOT LAWRENCE, George W. Lay, Levi Lincoln, Thomas C. Love, John Thomson, Joseph R. Underwood, Samuel F. Vinton, Elisha Whitlesey, Lewis Williams.*

Of the fifty-two who voted in the negative, there are but six Democrats, the remainder, forty-six Whigs, a majority of the whole party then in Congress, that voted. Upon the character of the parties in relation to this measure, of this and the other House, upon this evidence, I leave the country to judge.

I would now refer the House, in further corroboration of that for which I have contended, to the Senate journals of the first session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, page 400, June 3. It is well known that General Jackson, at the commencement of that session, in his message, called the attention of Congress to the circulation of incendiary publications through the mails. In accordance with which, Mr. GRUNDY, then Senator from Tennessee, brought in his famous bill to prevent the circulation of those incendiary publications, &c.; which, on the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time," it was decided in the affirmative—it being a tie vote, 18 to 18, Mr. VAN BUREN, the then Vice President, voting in favor of the bill. Against this bill, be it known, every single Whig Senator from the non-slaveholding States voted, who voted on the question.

Page 416, June the 9th, this bill was taken up again, and put upon its final passage, and rejected by two Southern votes, (Whigs,) coming in and voting against it, (Messrs. Crittenden and Leigh,) and Mr. Goldsborough, (Whig,) who had voted for it before, changing his vote against it, who, with Mr. Clay, made four Whig votes from the slaveholding States that voted against the bill—enough to have carried it by a triumphant majority, had they voted with the South, notwithstanding there was not a Whig Senator from the North that voted for the bill. To these facts I earnestly call the most serious attention of every Southern man, whether he be Whig or Democrat.

Now, sir, if the South, which has been most egregiously abused by dissimulation and various misrepresentations on this subject, will but examine these facts, and weigh them, as it is their most solemn duty to do, it is impossible that they can be longer deceived. Here, but for the desertion in a certain quarter of the Southern representation, they could have obtained all the security they asked against the efforts of these incendiary fanatics, and the facts upon the records that I hold in my hand, must ever establish it, so long as the history of this glorious Republic is preserved. But I forbear a further commentary, as my object is the presentation of the facts, and leave it to the people, the country, the world, to make their own commentaries; and here will I leave the scenes and doings of the Senatorial chamber, however much more might be said in confirmation of the positions I have taken.

Mr. Speaker, it may be seen by the recent votes of this body how steadily the ranks of those who act against us here, in co-operation with the Abolitionists, have been increased, and I feel it my duty to ask your attention for a few moments to that part of this subject. Its history, sir, is perfectly clear and intelligible; and no man has marked its progress more than I have. Let it not be forgotten, when the House first took its stand upon this question, and there was a test made with those gentlemen who co-operated here with the Abolitionists, their numbers ranged from forty to forty-five. This number was about their vote on Mr. Pinckney's resolutions. The next session their vote on Mr. Patton's resolution was sixty. This increase was the result of Whig victories in Ohio, Indiana, New Jersey. Mr. Atherton's resolutions were decided on, by the same Congress, and with the same result, or thereabouts. In the present, which is the Twenty-sixth Congress, by the success of the Whig party in New York and Connecticut, by which they have gained seventeen members, notwithstanding their loss in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, amounting to some eight or ten, they have, by these Whig successes, increased their number in this Congress up to about seventy votes. Sir, it cannot be denied that the strength of the Abolitionists, or those that sustain them, has been increased precisely in proportion to the increase of the Whig party in the non-slaveholding States. Look, sir, at the votes already of the eleven additional Whigs from New York? Look at the six additional Whig votes from Connecticut? Have they been with us on a single occasion? No, sir, no; and, my life upon it, there is not one of them that will vote against your Abolition petitions in any shape or form. As yet, not one has attempted it.

Sir, this is the true and infallible history of this subject, that must and will be known to the people of the South. This is the secret that should alarm every man to the South or North, who can be alarmed, in relation to the course that may be pursued here on this subject. This it is that must give alarm to every man to the North, that has one sacred spark of love remaining in his breast for the holy union of these States, and the liberties of our people. This it is, and you can conceal it no longer with false professions here, that stimulates and gives encouragement to those fanatic spirits, to go on and persevere in their unholy crusade against the peace, the safety, and rights of our people.

Sir, I ask, and demand to know, what one Whig victory has taken place in any of the non-slaveholding States within the last six or eight years, that has not enured to the benefit of the Abolitionist? Not one—not one can be shown or pointed to: and can it be possible that any man can believe that the Abolitionists are not aware of these facts?

Every man, every American, should know immediately, and without delay, from what source this excitement is kept up by these fanatics—from what party their expectations emanate, and are cherished. It is due to all sections of the country that this thing should be known, and that these men should be exposed from the housetops, in the streets, and on the public highways. The question is assuming an attitude too awful longer to be dallied with, for the gratification, in the promotion of artful, designing, and treacherous politicians, and the creatures of men, who cannot look to results beyond an only petty personal aggrandisement.

But, sir, we have been told, and our understandings insulted, if the authors themselves knew better, that all this struggle is for the right of petition, and for the want of their being replied to. But for personal respect towards those honorable gentlemen who use such, I would say, how ridiculous the idea! when you take a view of the facts in relation to the whole subject! We are further told that they want reasons advanced to them, and they demand that their petitions be replied to. Sir, to a novice, such idle assertions might bear with them a faint plausibility, which must disappear instantly before the approach of the facts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what are the facts in relation to such excuses for the requirement of the Abolitionists? Had we not an able and voluminous report made on this subject, under the celebrated resolutions of Mr. Pinckney? Had this House not that report published for the benefit of the country, and circulated by the members, who desired to arrest the progress of the incendiaries? Were not reasons and arguments set forth in those documents the most forcible and convincing, endorsed, too, sir, by a most overwhelming majority of Congress? Have I not shown, sir, the various votes upon the resolutions with which that report terminated? How, then, does this fact tally with the complaint that they have not been argued with and reasoned with, as a rational people? Sir, the whole complaint, let me tell gentlemen, is a mere fabrication, and is false in point of fact, as has been shown by your journals. The luminous and able report of Mr. Pinckney was made May 18th, 1836, of the first session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, report No. 691, which dispels at once the idle pretence that Abolitionists only want to be reasoned with to be satisfied of the enormity of their projects.

Again, sir, the speech of Mr. Calhoun, in the Senate, made April 12th, 1836, was replete with the most powerful arguments and reasons, setting forth the injustice and utter impracticability of the execution of the designs of these deluded fanatics.

Again: he made a report on the same topic, embracing the whole grounds of Abolitionism, and expostulated upon the madness and folly of their attempts—a report now to be found in Senate document 118, first session Twenty-fourth Congress, vol. 2.

How now stand the grounds taken here by the honorable gentlemen from Massachusetts and New York, [Messrs. ADAMS, MONROE, GRANGER, and HUNT?] How square their arguments with the facts that have occurred in relation to this matter? Not less baseless than a vision Sir, they have been argued with, remonstrated with, entreated and implored, to cease their unwarrantable and impracticable, though fiendish schemes against the peace and Union of these States; and no man can be guiltless, in fact, of the atrocity of their crimes, who would act here the part of their apologists. But it may be said that these arguments emanated from a source in which they had no confidence. Then, sir, I refer you to another, from a source in which, for many years, they have pro fessed to have had the greatest confidence. Have gentlemen forgotten the speech of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, made during the last session of Congress, and which was pronounced by his partisans to have been the most masterly effort of his life, which was published and republished in nearly every State in the Union? Will those who apologize and co-operate here with the Abolitionists, now say that there were no arguments nor reasons contained and set forth in that speech to them * Why, sir, to what have we arrived? In the very face of these most lucid and convincing arguments and addresses, which have not been attempted to be answered nor refuted, (for they are truly unanswerable and irrefutable,) gentlemen are found here, yes, sir, with courage, too, have they, of a kind, to tell us that the Abolitionists only want reasoning and arguing with; as yet they have not had arguments and reasons in answer to their petitions. Sir, can credulity itself confide in such declarations? Do gentlemen, who make them, believe in them? Or is it intended merely to soothe the way for the Abolitionists to screen them from the obloquy that attaches itself to their real designs? Or is it intended to lull to sleep those innocent men and women to the South, who have so much at stake in the issue now pending, not only before us, but the world.

But what to my mind is most singular, those who would apologize for the Abolitionists, advance reasons in extenuation of their conduct, the Abolitionists contradict by their own showing. While their friends here are trying to beguile the public, and get up a panic about the right of petition, (a thing about which I do not imagine any two men in the House differ in the main,) the Abolitionists themselves are putting forth very different doctrines at home Not a word about the right of petition do they speak; they know too well it is used only as an auxiliary, not as a principal object with them.

I hold in my hand the annual report of the Anti-slavery Society in Maine. I read from their proceedings. Hear them, and learn what they say they are contending for. They say:

Numerous petitions are now flowing in, praying the Legislature to pass resolutions, affirming the right of Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade in the District and in Florida, and to prohibit the slave trade between the States; also, against the annexation of Texas or the admission of any new slave State into the Union.

The evils of slavery in a political and economical point of view, enormous as they are, are utterly insignificant, when compared with those of a moral and religious nature. The committee cannot, therefore, but regard with deep interest the movements of the different religious bodies in relation to the cause of the slave.

It cannot far a moment be doubted, that it is in the power of the Southern church, understanding by this profession the great body of professed Christians at the South, to bring about the speedy termination of slavery. We speak not in exaggerated terms when we say, that the Southern church holds in her hands the keys of the great prison house of American bondage. She may, when she pleases, open the doors, and break the chains of the captives.

As a general fact, Southern church members are holders of slaves. Yea, even from their own brethren in Christ, they withhold the lamp of life, deny them marriage as a legal right, consign them over to concubinage or indiscriminate prostitution, sell for gain the image of their Lord, and make merchandise of the purchase of His blood.

Southern Christians and Christian ministers stand in the front rank of the apologists of slavery, side by side with the Calhouns, Harpers, and McDuffies of the South. They come out, with their Bibles in their hands, for its defence. They torture the writings of the prophets and apostles in its support.

The solitary individual, who may, at the South, bear his testimony against its giant iniquity, may be laughed down as a poor deluded fanatic, as a miserable specimen of moon-struck humanity; or he may be subjected to the inflictions of the code Lynch, or, in accordance with Senator Preston's murderous threat, be hung upon the gallows. But this cannot be done with the whole church.

Here, sir, are some of their resolutions. See, sir, how much they complain of the right of petition, or of any trespass thereon:

1. Whereas God has said, loose the bands of wickedness, undo the heavy burdens, break every yoke, and let the oppressed go free; and whereas the chains which American slavery has forged, are bands of wickedness, the burdens this system has bound on men's necks are heavy, and the yoke it has put on men's necks is grievous to be borne; and as the Christian church is deeply stained with the blood of souls murdered by the demon of slavery,

Resolved, That it is the duty of the Christian church to purify herself from this foul blot, by discussing the subject, by petitioning Congress for its abolition, by praying fervently to the Father of mercies to crown these labors with success, by a firm, unyielding zeal, in every constitutional manner, to endeavor to correct public sentiment at the North, and convince the South of the evil of slavery, and the safety of immediate and entire abolition of this cruel system.

2. Whereas the Christian church constitutes that organized body, through which the light of heaven is reflected upon this dark world; Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the solemn duty of all its members, and especially of all its ministers, to cry aloud and spare not against the system of slavery as existing in the United States, a system of legalized theft, robbery, adultery, and murder; and that they should never hold their peace, till this foul blot is washed out of our American soil.

3. Resolved, That the house of God is a suitable and very appropriate place for the friends of weeping humanity to speak out for the dumb, and plead the cause of the oppressed; Therefore, we consider it anti-Republican and anti-Christian for any religious society or church to close their house of worship against the discussion of the heaven daring sin of slavery.

I pray those peace-loving gentlemen to give me their attention, while I read the following, and say whether, and how far, they are the coadjutors of those who put forth these doctrines. To this I invoke, too, the attention of the whole South, and ask them to weigh it. Says this report:

Whether the volcanic fires over which the South is now slumbering shall be quenched, the elements of a convulsion which may, at any moment, shake our social fabric to its foundations, be removed, the overflowing fountain of disunion and civil discord dried up—whether at the North we shall be released from our obligations to fight the battle of despotism at the South, and pour out our hearts's blood in a controversy, in which, in the language of Jefferson, the Almighty has no attribute that can take part with us—whether, as a nation, we shall be exalted by righteousness in the emancipation of our three millions of slaves, or presevering in oppression, perish, under plagues more intolerable than those that laid waste slaveholding Egypt, the star of our country's glory going down in oceans of blood—compared with this, the question of Bank or no Bank, Sub-Treasury or no Sub-Treasury, dwindles into utter insignificance.

What is mentioned about the right of petition in all this? These are declarations of the Abolitionists themselves, more honest even than their apologists here, who fabricate excuses for their conduct, that they make not themselves. Here they have told, in no equivocal terms, what they aim at, what they desire, and what they are determined to effect with their blood, their treasure, their all—and he who would longer conceal these facts from the South, is traitorous to every interest that she holds sacred upon this earth. Let all men look at his. This is the first declaration of their war. Let no man be deceived; it is in their own language, which admits of no equivocation or palliation.

But again hear them, in which they speak of the action of this House and its members, and how they speak of the right of petitition—not, however, as an object in view:

The evident failure of the, justly so called, infamous resolution of Mr. Patton, to effect the objects proposed in its adoption, had led to the hope, that a similar outrage upon the humanity of the country, and the sacred right of petition, would not again be repeated in Congress. This hope, however, has failed. On the 12th of December last, a series of resolutions were presented in the House of Representatives by Mr. Atherton, a Northern man with Southern principles, from New Hampshire, embodying some of the most objectionable principles of the pro-slavery resolutions adopted by the Senate at its session the preceding year, and terminating with a repetition of the gag resolution of Mr. Patton.

* * * * *

Up to this period, the South had been content herself to furnish the leaders, in the infamous war upon the Constitution and the rights of the citizens of the free States, in support of her peculiar institution. At the present session of Congress, however, her tactics were changed. Instead of her own Pinckneys, and Hawses, and Pattons, she pushed forward, as the ostensible leader in her nefarious enterprise, one of her white servants of the North, the dough-faced representative from New Hampshire.

Here is where the epithets of the dough-faced Representative from New Hampshire had its origin, which has been used so much to effect a common purpose by certain individuals to the South, to aid in killing off, by degrading them, the only friends that the South has had, who dare come forward from the North and take an open and bold stand in favor of the peace, the union of the States, and the rights of the South. This is the language of the Abolitionists, that Southern men have ever ventured to use here; losing sight of all respect for the South, by mouthing the language of her vilest enemies in denunciation of those who had dared to step forward in her defence, in common with our whole country.

In alluding to the resolutions of Mr. Atherton, here is what the Abolitionists themselves say. I commend it to Southern ears, who have denounced them in such bitter terms, and their authors:

The fifth resolution, to which others are merely preliminary, is the gag; and is substantially the same with the corresponding one of Mr. Patton. It declares that every petition, memorial, resolution, proposition, or paper, touching or relating, in any way or to any extent whatever, to slavery or the abolition thereof, shall, on presentation thereof, WITHOUT ANY FURTHER ACTION THEREON, BE LAID ON THE TABLE, WITHOUT BEING PRINTED, DEBATED OR REFERRED.

Yes, sir, this is what the Abolitionists themselves say of the resolutions introduced into this House, the last session, by Mr. Atherton, and which have been denounced as Abolition dough-faced resolutions by other gentlemen of the South, enough, sir, to make any Southern man blush, who has thus adopted the language of these Abolitionists.

But let us hear more from this source. Says that report, alluding to Mr. Atherton, and those Northern Democrats that voted with him:

The names of the recreant sons of New England, who responded "aye" to this infamous resolution, will be had in lasting remembrance—they will be remembered with the contempt due to their base servility, and violation of Republican principles, in the insane and wicked effort to prop up, for a little longer, the falling fabric of Southern despotism. Verily, they shall have their reward.

Such, sir, is the manner in which these men have been assailed by the Abolitionists, who have dared to step forward and save your Constitution—preserve your Union, and avert from your nation the heavy curse of a civil and desolating war.

Hear again their avowals:

It is due to the slave, that we sever at once this link of his chain; that we give to his cause all the benefit which may accrue from a free, unrestricted commercial intercourse with Hayti. It is due to ourselves, to spare no effort to prevent the powers of Congress from being longer perverted to the support of a system, which is at once our curse and our reproach.

The matchless resolution of Mr. Atherton failed to reach the petitions for the recognition of Haytian independence. This year, they are referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to be respectfully laid up in "monumental security." They will see the light at the next session of Congress, if Abolitionists are faithful to their high trust.

No occurrence in the history of the anti-slavery enterprise, has produced a deeper sensation, or sent more consternation into the ranks of our enemies, than the determination recently evinced by Abolitionists to carry their principles to the polls.

The effort to sustain slavery is the same, at the North and at the South. It is an effort to shut out light; to silence reason; to stifle conscience; to quench the living fire of sympathy in the human soul. It is an effort to stay the onward march of liberty, to arrest the progress of civilization, to frustate the plans and purposes of Jehovah for the intellectual and moral elevation of the whole great family of man.

In such a contest, who can doubt which way the victory will turn? Whatever advantages the slaveholding power may occasionally gain, its destruction is sure. The days of slavery, with its chains, its whips, its tears of blood, are numbered. To hasten its downfall, is worthy our highest efforts as men, as patriots, as Christians. Let us then consecrate ourselves anew to this great work.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how different are these sentiments coming from the Abolitionists themselves; from those that we hear on this floor; from their friends? What little is said, or seems to have been thought by them, of the danger of the right of petition?

They do not intimate even a design to confine their efforts to the District of Columbia. No: they take bolder ground; they strike at once at the States and their institutions, in defiance of your Constitution or your Union. Why, then, amuse us about your right of petion? Why this shallow pretence, this idle artifice, but to deceive and dupe the South, until you gain more strength to take higher grounds? Sir, I protest against your whole batch of false issues, either here or before the people of the North or the South. The whole object of the incendiaries is unconstitutional abolition, and which can be effected only by waging the most bloody civil war that the world ever saw. It cannot be done by deception or tricks practised on us by the priesthood. The age is too enlightened to yield to such arts; and to carry out their projects, men must cast up the costs, and prepare at once to meet it—the number of lives, the millions upon millions of treasures to be spent, and the rivers of blood that must flow before its accomplishment. But I will not indulge farther in calamities no less prospective than disastrous.

I now read from the same document a revelation that is portentous, to which I call the particular attention of Kentuckians, and which is as follows:

The effort of Mr. Van Buren to conciliate, by bowing down to the spirit of slavery, the vote of the South, has been met by the speech of Mr. Clay, delivered in the United States Senate since the presentation of this report. In this speech, Mr. Clay denounces the Abolitionists in severe terms; brings forward, in his peculiar and forcible language, the stereotyped objections against the antislavery movement, lays down the monstrous principle that "that is property which the law makes property," and upon the ground of necessity, the tyrant's plea, defends the eternal enslavement of the colored race in our land. On sitting down, after this effort for the perpetuation of a system of outrage and wrong, the most inexcusable, as well as the most detestable that the sun has yet shone upon, Mr. Clay reaived the congratulations of the arch Nullifier and defender of "the most glorious institution," John C. Calhoun, for having given the deathblow to Abolition. If judgment is not turned backward, the blow will be death to his own prospects of winning the splendid prize at which he is aiming; and to secure which he has, in this pro-slavery effort, fixed an indelible stigma upon his own reputation. One thing is now certain, if there could have been a doubt before—the sacred cause of impartial liberty, the cause of three millions of the enslaved in our country, has nothing to hope from Henry Clay. He stands before the world its unblushing, uncompromising opponent.

*See, also, an able report of Col. Young, in the New York Legislature, February 26, 1839.

Here, sir, is the clue to the late results at Harrisburg. Here, sir, is the delaration in advance, of the doom of that distinguished man of the West. Here is the prophecy—here the sentence passed; and has not the execution been inflicted? I am no partisan of Henry Clay, and have no complaints to make of any injustice that may have been done him as a politician—I myself am not aggrieved by it; but as a matter of history, connected with important events, I have a right, in common with all mankind, to speak of it in illustration of whatever facts may be connected with the transactions of the times, which I do in despite of the snarlings of the envious, or of the approbation or disapprobation of the treacherous.

But, I have said that the facts revealed by what I have just read, were portentous.

Mark, Mr. Speaker, this prophecy from this Abolition paper in alluding to Mr. Clay's speech against Abolition—"the blow will be death to his own prospects of winning the splendid prize at which he is aiming." Sir, what prize is here alluded to but the Presidency? Does any deny it? And why was this "death blow to his prospects of winning the splendid prize"—can there be a mistake in it? Because he was against Abolition. Let it be remembered that this declaration and prediction was made but a few weeks after the delivery of this speech. What has been the history of that sect since? Have they not persevered in the most systematic manner to bring about this "death blow to the prospects of winning the splendid prize?" Have you not seen them nominating their delegates to the Harrisburg Convention from every part of the country where a man of them is to be found? Have you not seen, in that convention, one of their leaders (James Wilson of New Hampshire) sitting as vice president to that convention? Is it not known that in that convention, then and there, through the instrumentality of the Abolition strength and influence, that this "death blow to the prospects of winning the splendid prize" was struck—most fatally and truly struck? By them it was inflicted with a premeditated design; for not one vote was thrown against Mr. Clay from a slaveholding State at first. And, sir, is there no moral to be drawn from all this? I entreat gentlemen to reflect on it; it alone is pregnant with a volume of commentary. I ask the members from Kentucky particularly to give their attention. I believe Kentucky is sound upon the subject of Abolition. She cannot be otherwise, from the nature of her institutions and her descent. I believe if her Representatives were even to give way here, that her people would still be sound on this subject. The last message of the immortal Governor Clark that I read with peculiar delight, which was placed in my hands by an honorable member from that State, [Mr. SHERROD WILLIAMS,] if not before, most satisfactorily convinced me of that fact; and but for one man, for whom she has seemed disposed to sacrifice her all, I believe, still, she would this day occupy a proud position in the front ranks of her Democratic brethren to whom she is so closely connected by nature and necessity. But I have digressed from my subject. Yes, sir, Henry Clay of Kentucky was rejected as the nominee for the Presidency of 1841, because he made a speech in the Senate of the United States adverse to the pretensions of the Abolitionists. That that speech sealed his fate with the Abolitionists no man of intelligence can, for a moment, entertain a rational doubt.

Hear what the leading papers of that party say of the result of this famous convention, immediately after the nomination of William Henry Harrison over Henry Clay of Kentucky was announced, and observe its regular correspondence with that prophecy and prediction that I have just referred to.

From Garrison's Liberator.

NOMINATION OF GENERAL HARRISON.—The National Whig Convention, assembled at Harrisburg on the 6th instant, nominated William Henry Harrison for the office of President of the United States. On the first and second ballot, the vote stood for Henry Clay, 103; for Harrison, 94; for Winfield Scott, 57. On the third ballot, the vote was for Harrison, 148; for Clay, 90; for Scott, 16. All the slave States went for Clay. We regard this as another important sign of the times—as a signal defeat of the slaveholding power in this country. Had it not been for Abolitionism, Henry Clay would undoubtedly have been nominated. We have faith to believe that no slaveholder will ever again be permitted to fill the Presidential office in this Republic.

Hear with what further acclamation it was hailed by the Emancipator, the organ of the Abolitionists in New York.

THE HARRISBURG CONVENTION.—Well, the agony is over, and Henry Clay is—laid upon the shelf. And no man of ordinary intelligence can doubt or deny that it is the antislavery feeling of the North which has done it, in connection with his own ostentatious and infamous pro-slavery demonstrations in Congress. Praise to God for a great antislavery victory. A man of high talents, of great distinction, of long political services, of boundless personal popularity, has been openly rejected for the Presidency of this great Republic, on account of his devotion to slavery. Set up a monument of progress there. Let the winds tell the tale—let the slaveholders hear the news—let foreign nations hear it—let O'Connell hear it—let the slaves hear it—a slaveholder is incapacitated for the Presidency of the United States. The reign of slavocracy is hastening to a close. The rejection of Henry Clay by the Whig convention, taken in connection with all the circumstances, is one of the heaviest blows the monster slavery has received in this country.

From the Le Roy Gazette

Very much like indeed! The editor of the Ohio paper abandoned the Whigs becaus they nominated the Abolitionists, and joined the Loco Focos because they went for the dough-faces; while we left the Jackson party because it adhered to slavery, and united with the Whigs, because they supported abolition!

This paper had been edited by Mr. GATES,* now a member on this floor.

Now, if Kentucky is true to her elf, true to her own institutions, and is unwilling to sacrifice her principles, her natural interests and relations, all, all, sir, at the shrine of party feelings, can she approbate and give her countenance to results brough about by influences that ninety-nine of every hundred of her citizens despise? Will she ever be whipped into measures, and yoked into the support of them, by party discipline, either here or elsewhere? Sir, in my opinion, she has long occupied an unnatural position towards those who were identified with her by natural affinities. I believe an overwhelming majority of her population are essentially Democratic; but they have been led by unnatural alliances and extraordinary influences of particular individuals, in direct opposition to both her real principles and natural interests. She is, from the nature of her position, from the character of her institutions, from the character of all her intercourse and commercial relations, bound eventually to act with the South and West. Even now, one single individual out of the way, and she would be foremost in this House in advocating and supporting, by her eloquence and her votes, those great measures of the Democracy with which her future destinies are so essentially identified.

The results of the last few months, brought about by the united action of the fanatics, is enough to open the eyes of the most blind, and make the dumb speak out. The triumph of such influences is enough to arouse and awaken every man in this Union, who is resolved to resist them.

Sir, it is idle, worse than useless, to attempt longer to conceal the perilous influence of Abolitionists, their designs, their strength, or preponderance. I have proved from the documents of this House that a majority of the whole Whig party (proper) of this House have, for the last six years, acted with the Abolitionists. I have produced names and dates, and referred to the pages, where all can examine for themselves; information, that I know, will be found most unwelcome to many; but it was due that the country should know it; and, sir, had this been the only evidence, there might have been some room left for doubt; yet how completely is this most important fact corroborated, if not most satisfactorily established, by the results at Harrisburg? Was it not proved there? Does not the result prove it beyond the power of contradiction? Prove that the Abolition influence did, and has, effectually preponderated in that body, composed, as it was, of the whole Whig party of the United States? How perfectly has it tallied and corresponded with the preponderating influence of that party in this House?

I knew that when I first ventured to assert the fact that a majority of the whole Whig party were acting with the Abolitionists here, that I was single and alone in the idea, and I confess I made it with some precaution and trepidation; but, sir, so powerful and irresistible are these facts that have proved it, that I am emboldened, the more and more I reflect on them, or refer to them. For, to me, the more I review them, the more conclusive and irresistible they appear.

How awful, then, must be the position of that wing of the party, from the South and Southwest, who represent slaveholding interests here! How perfectly at the mercy of their Abolition friends who now, in this House, constitute near two-thirds of their whole party! Take this fact, together with the fact of their having the preponderance in the Harrisburg convention, and does it not prove that they have attached themselves to a party who, if not Abolitionists themselves, have, and are now acting with them? That the Southern wing of that party is left (whom I accuse not themselves of being Abolitionists) in a small minority of the whole Whig party, it has been most conclusively shown, both from the votes of this House and the results of the Harrisburg convention. Now, sir, what have the people of the South to expect from the action of those who co-operate here with their worst of all political enemies at this time? Suppose they meet in caucus to determine on the selection of officers to this House who control, in a measure, the entire business of the nation, with little more than one-third of the whole number of that party, in which caucus the majority is to govern: can they expect to control that majority with their one-third? Do they suppose, for a moment, that so large a majority would be dictated to a moment, by such a minority? Sir, the idea is ridiculous. Let them read their fate in the result of the Harrisburg Convention, in which they can never have stronger claims to a preference? Or, do they think their feeble voice would ever be once heard amid the enthusiasm of the fanatics? Is it by the support of the Whigs of the South, then, that that party is to gain the ascendency in this House, and, consequently, in this Government? I conjure the Whig party from that section to pause long before they consummate the bans further by such an unholy, unnatural alliance! Let every man, woman, and child of the South, rise and forbid it! I ask them, in the name of our common country, to look at the character of the votes of this House, whether on a proposition coming from a Southern Whig, or Democrat, that conflicts in the least with the pretensions of the Abolitionists, and say, if their brother Whigs of the North have not in solid columns gone dead against them; and whether or not they have not themselves been compelled to rely for the support of their own measures (I mean those introduced by Southern Whigs upon that subject,) upon the votes of the Northern Democrats to carry them through; notwithstanding the efforts made here by Southern men to drive them into the ranks of the Whig Abolitionists? These facts cannot escape, sir, the discerning eye of the intelligent practical men of this country; and I entreat gentlemen after the flood of evidence that has been exhibited recently, both in and out of Congress, to weigh well these facts before they return again to their constituents of the South, to whom, and with whom, I now leave them to settle that question.

Mr. Speaker, said Mr. B. I will now notice some remarks that have fallen from different gentlemen who have addressed the House on this subject, who have taken the liberty to refer to the action of parties in this body to prove that the Democratic party, in a body, co-operated with the Abolitionists of the North; and as this seems to have been done for the purpose of imposing on the people of the South, whom, in part, I represent, I beg the further indulgence of this House while I present to their consideration some facts that have an immediate bearing on this case. If we look, sir, at the action of State Legislatures, we find where the Democrats have had the control, they have, in no instance, countenanced the Abolitionists.

*And is now edited, I am informed, by his friend and successor.

In Maine, sir, her present Governor Fairfield was one of those who sustained what Abolitionists called "Atherton's gag," which was used against him in the election for Governor of that State, and in which he was sustained triumphantly by the Democrats. That Legislature, whenever it has referred to the subject, has discountenanced the projects of the fanatics.

Sir, that little granite State, New Hampshire, the residence of "the dough-faced Democrats," as they have been denominated by Southern Whigs and Northern Abolitionists, as early as January 13th, 1837, passed in her Legislature the following resolutions, to which I solicit the particular attention of those Southern gentlemen who have been so bitter in their denunciation of the "dough-faces of New Hampshire:" laws of New Hampshire, page 288:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, in General Court convened, That we recognise the constitutional right of the several States of the Union to exercise exclusive jurisdiction within their own limits, on the subject of slavery.

Be it resolved, That Congress cannot, without a violation of the public faith, abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, unless upon the request of the citizens of that District, and by the States by whom that territory was ceded to the General Government.

Be it further resolved, That the union of the States can only be maintained by abstaining from all interference with the laws, domestic policy, and peculiar interests of every other State. The conduct of those who would coerce our fellow-citizens in other States into the abolition of slavery by the inflammatory appeals addressed to the fears of the masters and the passions of the slaves, is in the highest degree censurable, as tending to alienate one portion of our countrymen from another, and to introduce discord into our sister States, and as a violation of that spirit of compromise in which the Constitution was framed, and a due observance of which is necessary to the safety of the Union.

At the last session, the Legislature of the same State adopted, in addition to what I have read above, the following:

Resolved, That the relation of master and slave, as established by law within the jurisdiction of any of the States, is an institution for which the State, within which it is established, is alone responsible, and with which neither this Legislature, nor the Legislature of any other State, can rightfully interfere.

Resolved, That the adoption and prosecution of measures by individuals residing within one State, with the avowed design of overthrowing the institution of another State, by sending emissaries, scattering documents, pamphlets or papers, within that State, against the declared will of the same, as a disregard of that comity, and mutual respect, which should ever be cultivated among the States.

Resolved, That Congress ought not to interdict the slave trade between the States, or to abolish slavery within the District of Columbia, or the Territories of the United States.

Resolved, That the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, by which all memorials relating to the abolition of slavery, upon the presentation of the same, were ordered to lie on the table, without any further action thereon, was not an infringement of the right of petition.

Resolved, That the immediate abolition of slavery, by whatever means effected, without expatriation of the slaves, would be productive of calamities, moral and political, such as should be deprecated by every friend of humanity.

Yet, sir, these resolutions were passed by the party called and stigmatized here, and by Southern men, as "dough-faced" Democrats. Sir, I could not do it myself, without feeling my face crimson with shame, and blushing for the ingratitude, the unfeeling ingratitude, that I was subject to being charged with, by the whole section of country from which I come.

But the election for Governor, that has recently taken place in Massachusetts, has been alluded to. We have heard much about Governor Morton's being an Abolitionists. Now, sir, supposing it true, (which I am informed is very far otherwise,) what were the Democrats to do in choosing between him and Governor Everett? Of course, to select the least evil.

Here is the endorsement of Governor Everett's Abolitionism, by one whose authority I presume none will deny here. Here, sir, it is:

TO ABOLITIONISTS!

We recommend to the attention of our Abolition brethren the following paragraph, which is a literal copy of the whole of an editorial paragraph in the last Liberator, written by Mr. Garrison:

EDWARD EVERETT.

The Governor of this Commonwealth has answered unequivocally in the AFFIRMATIVE to the question, whether he is favor of the immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and the slave trade between the several States. Edward Everett now speaks the language of a patriot, a Republican, and a Christian. We believe it is the real language of his soul. When, a few years since, he took opposite ground, he did violence to his convictions of right, and committed a grievous error. We are disposed to obliterate all that has gone before, and to commend him for his present honorable course. To refer invidiously to what he said when public sentiment was deeply corrupt, would be ungenerous: to charge him with being insincere at the present time, would be unjust: to accuse him of seeking popularity, would be equally uncharitable. It is not yet a popular thing for the Chief Magistrate of this Commonwealth to avow himself in favor of immediate emancipation; and until he shall prove recreant to his present professions, it is to be taken for granted that he means just what he says. In our opinion, he ought to receive the undivided support of the Anti-slavery voters of this Commonwealth; nay, they have pledged to him their support, inasmuch as he has declared himself to be in favor of their principles and measures.

We likewise recommend to the attention of our Abolition brethren the following unmutilated and literal extract of a communication in the same paper, by "A Member of the Massachusetts Anti-slavery Board:"

GOV. EVERETT'S LETTER IS SATISFACTORY. His endorsing Mr. Alvord's report does not weaken his answer, but strengthens it, for that report was full of the soundest Abolition doctrines. THE GOVERNOR SHOULD RECEIVE THE VOTE OF EVERY ABOLITIONIST. Some, who call themselves such, but whose hearts are more with their party than with the slave, may still go back to Edward Everett's old misdeeds. Let me tell them this is unfair. In the circumstances of the case, it is almost treacherous. Mr. Borden asked Governor Everett's opinions, not as an individual, but as representing the Abolitionists generally. The Governor answers at once and unequivocally. Is it for us to turn round and charge him with insincerity? This would be a gross outrage. Why did we ask him if we did not mean to judge him by his answer.

Judge Morton's and Mr. Willis's letters are very much alike. They give no information. They do not answer the simplest of all possible questions, so that a plain man can tell what they mean. Judge Morton refers to a letter written two years ago, which, when you look at it, is no more of a reply than the present. That letter contained some very handsome and flowing periods about his detestation of slavery, &c. It, perhaps, served its purpose pretty well in its day; what would do for 1837, will not do for 1839. These vague professions of Judge Morton amount to just nothing at all. There is nothing in them you can put your finger on. If the Abolitionists are to be satisfied with such unmeaning generalities, let me tell you, the politicians will never give them any thing else.

I hope, sir, this will forever set that question at rest, and that the South will no longer be amused with the presentation of individual instances, as set-offs to bodies, societies and communities, even where they are ever so true.

Let us now look at Vermont, that purely Whig State. What has she done?

STATE OF VERMONT,
JANUARY 21, 1839.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their utmost efforts to prevent the annexation of Texas to the United States, and to procure the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and the slave trade between the several States and Territories of the Union.

Resolved, That the adoption by the House of Representatives of the United States on the 21st December last, 1837, of the resolution by which "all petitions, memorials, and papers, touching the abolition of slavery, or the buying, selling, or transferring of slaves in any State, District or Territory of the United States, were laid upon the table without being debated, printed, read, or referred," was a daring infringement of the right of the people to petition, and a flagrant violation of the Constitution of the United States; and we do, in the name of the people of Vermont, protest against the passage of the same, or any similar resolution, by the present or any future Congress of the United States.

Sir, what is she now doing? Has she not forwarded resolutions to this Congress from her Legislature nearly every session since this agitation commenced, in favor of the Abolitionists, and against the action of this House, whenever it has attempted to oppose their views? Is there not now a memorial and resolutions either before this or the other branch of Congress to that effect? There is! What a contrast, sir, not between two individuals, but between two sovereign States—one Whig, the other Democratic.

But, sir, I pass to New York, about which so much has been said here and elsewhere. I will not dwell upon the election of Bradish (a most celebrated Abolitionist) Lieutenant Governor by a union of the Whigs and Abolitionists, and seven Whigs to Congress, who have voted, on every occasion since they have been here, against every measure that in the slightest degree conflicted with the rights of the Abolitionists, supposing all of whom nearly voted against us on the e measures. I rely upon still higher evidence. Here it is:

POLITICAL ABOLITIONISM.

The following document shows that the Abolitionists are in the field as a political party:

CIRCULAR.

TO THE ANTISLAVERY ELECTORS
OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

We ask the privilege of brethren to set forth briefly, but frankly, the reasons which constrain us to cast our votes for William H. Seward, for Governor.

1st. Mr. Seward is the candidate of the party which, on the floor of Congress, nobly vindicates the inestimable right of petition, and as nobly asserts the freedom of debate; of the party also that sustains John Quincy Adams, and William Slade; of a party whose views are liberal and tolerant.

2d. Mr. Seward is the candidate of the party which, in our last Legislature, passed resolutions against the admission of Texas into the Union; against Patton's gag resolutions; in favor of the right of petition; in favor of granting trial by jury to persons claimed as fugitive slaves. Instead of the denunciations and revilings with which our petitions were treated in years past—instead of threatening us with penal enactments, the Whigs received and treated petitions and remonstrances with that respect and comity due to their constituents.

3d. Mr. Seward is the candidate of the party that opposes the re election of a President who stands pledged to veto any bill abolishing slavary in the District of Columbia.

4th. Mr. Seward is the candidate opposed to Governor Marcy—who, in his messages to the Legislature, has manifested, in sentiment and sympathy, the bitterest hostility to our cause, and who, as the presiding officer of a public meeting, while he was Governor of the State, recommended the passage of laws authorizing a violation of the mails, and inflicting pains and penalties upon those who were disseminating intelligence and truth.

5th. The re-election of Governor Marcy would go very far toward the re-election of Martin Van Buren, whose measures and policy are so hostile to the cause of human liberty.

And finally, because our knowledge of Mr. Seward leads us to confide in the general soundness and integrity of his principles. We view the great question of a Sub-Treasury, a National Bank, or the currency, of minor importance, compared with the great subject of human liberty; and believing that the election of Mr. Seward, and the defeat of Governor Marcy, will best promote the great cause of universal emancipation, we shall vote for him ourselves, and recommend our Abolition friends to do the same.

We are, respectfully, your fellow citizens,
JEFFERSON MAYELL,
President Albany Young Men's Anti-slavery Society.
CALVIN PEPPER, jr.
Vice President Albany Anti-slavery Society.
JOHN WILSON,
Corresponding Secretary Anti-slavery Society.

Men of the South, I now ask you to pause and reflect on this? Here is no individual case. It is a proposition made and accepted by a multitude. The deed was done—the act consummated—the bitter fruits of which we are about now to reap from the frightful contest now going on between Governor Campbell of the State of Virginia, and Governor Seward of New York, involving this identical subject of Abolition.

Sir, we have already done great injustice to this peaceable honest people of this country, as well to the East, North, and West, as to the South. The people of neither section have been made acquainted with the awful explosion that these parties are preparing, to blow into fragments the best Government that ever was conceived, heard of, or framed by the hands of man. No, sir, in my judgment, they are not prepared for the event—they do not, they can not, desire it, and little, as yet, have they dreamed of the plot that is on foot to drench our mother country with the blood of her own offspring.

Another of the results of this extraordinary combination, was the passage, in the lower House of Assembly of the State of New York, as soon as the Whigs and Abolitionists got the ascendency in it, of certain resolutions against those passed by Congress against the action of the Abolitionists and their petitions. The Senate, however, which still retained a majority of Democrats, rejected them, after presenting a most able, lucid, and voluminous report through its chairman, Col. S. Young, an extract from which I will now read to the House.

Report of Mr. Young, to the Senate of New York, on certain resolutions of the House of Assembly of that State, touching the subject of the right of petition, &c. made February 26, 1839.

The preamble and resolutions of the Assembly recites the substance of the resolutions of the House of Representatives of the United States adopted in December last, on the motion of Mr. Atherton, one of its members, by which the House of Representatives, by a very large majority, decided that every petition, memorial, &c. touching or relating to slavery, or to the abolition thereof, should, on presentation thereof, without any further action thereon, be laid on the table without being referred, printed, or debated; and the preamble and the resolutions of the Assembly pronounce that, by enforcing such resolution, the said House of Representatives have infringed upon the rights of the people of the State of New York.

The first resolution of the Assembly discloses that the resolution above referred to is a violation of the rights of the people of this State.

The third resolution of the Assembly solemnly protests against the resolution above referred to, and requests the Representatives in Congress from this State to use their best exertions to to cause the same to be rescinded.

After a most powerful, convincing, and irresistible argument in their report against the course of the Abolitionists and Whigs in the Assembly, Mr. Young continues:

If the committee have not deceived themselves, it will appear manifest to every reflecting mind, that the right of petition, as secured by the Constitution, cannot be infringed by Government, except by a law of Congress, and consequently the Atherton resolutions cannot be tortured into such infringement.

That a long and elaborate report having been made three years ago, under the direction of the House of Representatives, on the subject of Abolition petitions and Abolitionism, that House is not bound, nor ought it to make another reference, and cause another report to be made on the same subject.

And this able and masterly report then concludes with the following resolution, which was sustained entirely by the Democracy of that body:

Resolved, That the preamble and resolutions of the Assembly be, and they are hereby, rejected.

All which is respectfully submitted.

S. YOUNG, Chairman.

Here, again, I have presented, not individual cases, but the records of the proceedings of bodies of men, and that of the Legislature of the greatest State in your Union. What a striking contrast does it present to the declarations made here! This, sir, has been one of the fruits of the Whig victories in New York.

Here is an article from the pen of a Whig member of this House, from New York. It is from an Abolition paper, called the Leroy Gazette. It is in these words:

With very great unanimity, Abolitionists in the West, and we apprehend throughout the States, have conscientiously considered they were discharging their solemn duty to their country, and directly advancing the cause of human rights, by casting their votes for William H. Seward for Governor; a man and a candidate of a party who have ever treated the advocates of emancipation with consideration and respect, and standing opposed also to a candidate and a party who have not failed to treat them with hostility and the most supercilious contempt. This almost unanimous support of some 15,000 Whig Abolitionists of the State, despite the hypocritical cant of a prostituted, grovelling party press, and your own well intended warning, has overthrown a knot of aristocrats who have for years dictated the creed and faith of the State, and whose high behest has been law and gospel to hundreds of their adherents.

Mr. B. continued: hear, sir, again from the same,

On the one hand, therefore, our Whig friends would do well not to be so much elated with success, and to feel so confident of their power hereafter, as to attempt a warfare against Abolition, for they should remember that it is the fairness and liberality, with which as a party they have heretofore treated the Abolitionists, which has secured their general support, even despite the warnings of some of the principal Abolitionists in the State; and should they now be so foolish as to commence an attack on them, and change their course of conduct towards them, they will find to their sorrow that they will arouse an opposition which no party cords can control, and it will be the last election in the State they will carry.

Now, if that gentleman is present, I wonder if he will deny, too, that these are his sentiments, and that he is an Abolitionist.

[Here Mr. GATES from New York rose, and asked the gentleman from North Carolina if he alluded to him.

Mr. BYNUM said he did not know that gentleman by person, but if it was one Seth Gates from New York, he did allude to him.

Mr. GATES then said that he would answer the member from North Carolina, that the language he had read was his, and that he did not deny being an Abolitionist]

Then, said Mr. B. that member is the first who has had the candor to own his being an Abolitionist in this debate; and although I detest his principles, I cannot but admire his candor as a man; for, of all things, I have always been taught mostly to abhor a hypocrite, who would do me an injury while he proclaimed himself my friend.

While on this subject, he asked to be permitted to read another extract, from another distinguished Whig candidate for Governor of New Hampshire; it is in a part of the reply of General James Wilson, late one of the distinguished vice presidents of the convention at Harrisburg which nominated William Henry Harrison for the next President of these United States, and which is as follows:

Opposed as I am to slavery in all its forms, and believing that its continued existence in the District of Columbia and the Territories, and the slave trade there and between the States involves a national responsibility, I am of opinion that Congress ought, without delay, to exercise the power that body has over the subject.

The reply was to questions put by one of the Abolition societies of that State.

Now, sir, here is the reply of a Democrat, nearly at the same time, from the same State, who was then a candidate for Congress. It is the reply of the honorable gentleman who sits to my left, Mr. BURKE, of New Hampshire, in answer to similar questions from the same source. Yet, sir, we have heard him, too, denounced here as an Abolition Democrat. Here is the reply—

From the above you will be likely to come to the conclusion that I do not deem it necessary to give precise responses to the questions which you have propounded; but lest there may be a disposition to charge me with a design to evade responsibility by declining to give the specific answers required, I now, after full and mature deliberation, declare my unqualified opposition to modern Abolitionism, in all its measures, phases, and policy. I look upon it as a scheme fraught with incalculable mischief and peril to the union of the States and consequently to the best interests of the people of the republic; and as demanding the firm and decided, but moderate and lawful opposition of every true patriot and friend to our civil and political institutions.

What a contrast between the answers of these two individuals! Can there longer be a doubt as to the position assumed by these two parties in the breast of a rational man in existence? Sir, it is impossible!

I pass over the resolutions of the Whig Legislature of Rhode Island against the action of Congress relative to Abolition petitions, and come over to Pennsylvania. What has been the character of the parties in that State? Will any man deny, that Governor Ritner was an Abolitionist, who denounced with such bitterness, "the black spirit of slavery," as he chose to call it? None have, nor will deny it.

I will now, Mr. Speaker, refer to an extract from an address delivered by Governor Porter, the late Democratic Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, and successful candidate over Ritner, the Antimason Abolition Whig candidate of that State.

[Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania here rose and asked Mr. B. when that speech or address was delivered.]

Mr. B. said he would refer the gentleman to his remarks when published, in which he would then specify both time and place.

Such was the language put forth then by Governor Porter in that address. Said he—

When the infant States of the Union united together in the Revolution, for the common defence, under the feeble bonds of the old Confederation: and when necessity drove us to form something more definite and binding, which brought about the Constitution of 1788, involuntary servitude was the subject of much discussion, arrangement, and concession. It was finally disposed of in the manner pointed out in the latter instrment. To agitate the question anew, when it was thus satisfactorily settled, is not only unwise and impolitic, but is a virtual breach of good faith to our brethren of the South; an unwarrantable interference with their domestic relations and institutions, and is calculated to do positive injury to the African race there held in servitude, for whom in her policy, and within her own borders, Pennsylvania has always shown a becoming sympathy. I can never, in the official station which I occupy, consent to countenance a course which may jeopard the peace and harmony of the Union, without answering any good purpose in the end. It shall meet with no encouragement at my hands.*

Such are the opinions of the Democratic Governor of that great and patriotic State, which has been so justly denominated the "keystone" in the arch of the temple of our republican States. Such sentiments are truly worthy of the Governor of a great State, who looked to the Union of our States, and peace of the country, and the prosperity of this united people, more than to the interest of a faction.

Here is another evidence of the feelings of the two great parties of that State: In the late convention to remodel its Constitution, on motion of Mr. Martin to insert, as one of the amendments, the word "white," so as to restrict the right of suffrage to the free white men of that State, which was supported by the Democrats, with a solitary exception, 77 in number, and was opposed by a vote of 45, 44 of whom, were Whigs. Now, sir, what higher evidence can be desired, as to the position of the parties in that State?

Let us now turn our eyes to the mighty West, and examine for a few moments what has transpired there in addition to the noble stand that her distinguished members have taken in both branches of Congress Ohio, that proud "buckeye" State, has taken the lead upon this subject. Her Democracy there have taken it in hand and spoken in a voice of thunder to the fanatics. (Well may they despise the Democracy.) Sir, she has spoken in a language truly worthy of the empress State of the Valley of the Mississippi.

Here are the resolutions recently passed by one of the largest and most numerous Democratic meetings ever held in that State, assembled from all sections thereof, preceded by a most powerful and unanswerable argument. This, sir, is the language of the Democratic party of the State of Ohio:

Resolved, That slavery being a domestic institution, recognised by the Constitution of the United States, we, as citizens of a free State, have no right to interfere with it, and that the organizing of societies and associations in free States, in opposition to the institutions of sister States, while productive of no good, may be the cause of much mischief, and while such associations for political purposes ought to be discountenanced by every lover of peace and concord, no sound Democrat will have part or lot with them.

Resolved, That political Abolitionism is but ancient Federalism under a new guise, and that the political action of Anti-slavery societies, is only a device for the overthrow of Democracy.

Resolved, That should there be any members of this Convention who do not subscribe to the principles contained in those resolutions relating to the subject of Abolition, they be hereby requested to leave their names with the publishing committee, to be published with the proceedings of this Convention.

Mr. B. continued: Sir, I have been informed, such was the unanimity of the Democratic party on this subject, that not a single name was left with the committee, to be published. In addition to this, the last papers from the Legislature of that magnanimous State, bring us the following accounts:

OHIO LEGISLATURE.

[Reported for the Ohio Statesman.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Tuesday, Jan. 14, 1840.

On motion of Mr. Flood, the House took up the resolutions relative to the subject of slavery.

Mr. Waddle called for the question to be taken on each resolution separately.

The first resolution was then adopted—yeas 48, nays 2, which reads as follows:

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That the subject of slavery, as it exists in particular portions of the United States, was settled and adjusted at the formation of the Federal Constitution.

The question then being on the adoption of the second resolution, which is as follows:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this General Assembly, the interference of citizens of our State in the internal regulations of another, is highly censurable and improper, and that we view the unlawful, unwise, and unconstitutional interference of the fanatical Abolitionists of the North, with the domestic institutions of the Southern States, as highly criminal, and that it is the duty, obligatory on all good citizens, to discountenance the Abolitionists in their mad, fanatical, and revolutionary schemes.

Let it not be forgotten, Mr. Speaker, that the Legislature of this State is now overwhelmingly Democratic, and let it be understood that these resolutions (unlike those of the Whig Legislature of New York) are "the fruits of the last Democratic victory" in the State of Ohio.

With this exhibition of evidence, showing the position and inclination of the present parties of this country, I shall remain content to abide the future decision of the people of this nation, with but a single reference more; which, sir, is to the petitions that have been introduced into this House in favor of the abolition of slavery.

It will, Mr. Speaker, astonish the people of the Whig party, who have confessed their opposition to Abolitionism, to learn that more than nine-tenths of these petitions have been introduced into the American Congress by members of the Whig party.

[Mr. GIDDINGS from Ohio (Whig) was understood to ask Mr. B. for his authority.]

Mr. BYNUM. The journals of your House, sir. I speak from an estimate made by your Clerk the session before the last; and, if my recollection serves me rightly, the disparity was greater than I have stated.

Now, sir, I should like to know if such a mass of evidence, as has been elicited upon this subject, during this debate, has ever been known before to be brought to bear upon any given question about which there did exist, in reality, a rational doubt; and if any man of the most ordinary mind, after reviewing these facts, can longer entertain one doubt as to what party has, or is, at this time, favoring the Abolitionists, that are threatening the dissolution of the fairest portion of this glorious Republic with fire and sword No, sir; none sir, none, except he who is wilfully blind or wilfully corrupt, and who would sacrifice our holy Union, the peace, safety, and prosperity of the fairest portion of our country, to the malignant, though blind, demon of party spirit.

* Inaugural address of David Porter, Governor of Pennsylvania, delivered in the hall of the House of Representatives, that State,) January 15, 1839.

But I will not delay the House further with any comment of mine on the evidence I have exhibited. I have offered it for the consideration of the House and the people of my country, hoping that they will adjudge its merits, without regard to the humble source from which it comes, or the party from which it may have emanated, asking, as I do, for it only an impartial examination of the facts, by all parties, before they presume to pronounce their condemnation.

I will now, Mr. Speaker, address myself more particularly to those gentlemen of the North who have reflected so much upon the wisdom of the South in relation to the matter before us, and will endeavor to show them and the world their greatest want of sagacity and statesmanship, in every step they have taken upon this momentous question. I say momentous, because it involves the very existence of our present Government; and in nothing more than this, is evinced their profunnd want of that knowledge of this great subject, that should characterize the statesman. Yes, sir, amid the agitation and excitement of fanaticism, they seem to have lost all sight of consequent events that must flow from their course here, and that of the Abolitionists, as certain as a cause precedes its effects, or as the light precedes the approach of that vertical sun. What! sir, they speak of statesmanship? Their very discourse here proves conclusively how far they are behind the time. I do not deny their learning and philosophy, and theory, if you please; but, in practical knowledge of man, of human nature, as it is now, and must exist under similar circumstances, they are at fault, and are falling more and more behindhand daily. It is that class of statesmen, throughout the world, that you now see falling into disrepute, and behind the age in which they live. To demonstrate this, I will not fly to Europe, when the most striking examples are here in my own country before me.

Sir, let us look to the East, and see what has been going on there for years? Let us look now at old Massachusetts, and see the bursting of fetters that has recently taken place there in the last elections of that State. Witness the flying fragments of antiquated and exploded systems, imposed on the herculean intellects of that people, by the antiquated theories of their priests, bookmen, and scholars, that are wont to ransack their ingenuity, to forge manacles of superstitious invention, to bind down and hold in subjection the enlightened practical mind of that enterprising people.

Sir, the whole contest that is going on there has been between practical and theoretical man. And in what age or nation, I ask, has this contest ever taken place, in which the former have not eventually and effectually overcome the latter. Upon this, history records but one decision: it is in favor of practical men, throughout the world. You may, sir, for a while, by inculcating and cherishing your superstition under the garb of religion, and your reverence for forms and theories unnecessary, and often mischievous and ruinous, keep in absolute subjection the most active, enterprising intellect; which, in all free Governments, will ever, sooner or later, be broken through by the free, unrestrained intercourse of man with his fellow man. Perhaps no State in the Union has had such means, or made such efforts, to bind down her people with superstitious observances, as that of Massachusetts—her presses, her wealth, both being in the hands of the few, backed by the superstition inculcated by her priests; upon whose heads will rest every drop of blood that must flow from the prosecution of this unholy crusade of Abolition, and who are, and should be, held responsible for every loss that is sustained by the honest, peace-loving people of the East, North, or West. Yes, sir, their handwriting is legible in every movement that has been made on this subject, from its commencement to its present stage. They seem envious of the infamous distinction of the "crusaders of the East," who depopulated Europe, and drenched a nation in blood; while they mean not to fight themselves, it is theirs to drum on others, but never to meet danger. By their statesmanship, and that of their coadjutors, they are now laying the foundation for the speedy dissolution of this Government; and for whose benefit? Sir, execute the first object of your shortsighted, unholy design, and that moment the cord that now binds us as a nation is broken into atoms. Have you any interest at stake? Do you anticipate no loss by this? Are your people prepared to abandon our entire Southern cost, and part forever with your trade and intercourse with us? Who consumes the products of your manufacturers? Your arts and every species of your mechanism? What becomes of your trade and commercial intercourse with the South? Your shipping, employment for your dense population, with whose weight in many places, the very earth groans as they move? Are you prepared to do all this? Have you honestly asked your people, if they are prepared for it? No, sirs, no sirs, you have deceived them! You and your priests, Stuarts, Garrisons and Tappans, have told them it all could be affected without. Oh! ignorant, shortsighted men!

But, sir, Boston, bound down as she is, and has been, from the influences I have stated, must awaken, from necessity, and shake off that gloom that binds her to the destinies of a short-sighted, ignorant priesthood and closetted book-men that she has taken for politicians, unpractised in the world, as it is, and as it moves onward. She, too, must meet this question practically in its face—whose very existence depends, and must of necessity depend, upon her trade and her commerce for her stores and supplies, and the returning equivalents for the products of her arts and manufactories. These are the questions that practical statesmen will look to; and, for the want of a proper knowledge, or a proper regard for which, in the present dynasty, that has so long ruled that State, the great revolution that is now going on there has been put in motion. Thay see, as all must see, to follow them longer in their projects of dissolution of the Government, it must result in the sacrifice of the greatest boons given them by Providence, arising from an association with their Southern brethren, and, in a return again to their old impoverished mother, England, to reconnect themselves again with the sterile barrens, snow-capped mountains and icy cliffs of Canada.

New York, too, must make up her mind to meet the consequences of this momentous question before the first blow is struck, for there is no State nor city in the Union that has so great a pecuniary interest at stake. She, too, in my honest judgment, has been deceived and imposed on in relation to this subject.

The mass of the people, I cannot be persuaded, are prepared for the consequences of the course of some of their Representatives here, and at home. Sir, they and their co-operators have studiously concealed from that honest people the fact, that the immediate question that they are now making with us, is a question (blink it as they may) of peace or war—a result as inevitable as that the light of Heaven falls from a cloudless sun!

Sir, have they told that people this, and of its train of disastrous consequences, the end of which no man here is young enough to see? No, sir: they and their Abolition comrades at home, my life upon it, have ever kept this result closely concealed from the poor objects upon whom they operate.

Let New York, I would say, beyond all other States and cities, pause and reflect upon these awful consequences, ere the hour be too late to apply the soothing remedy. Sir, let her read her fate in that of Tyre, Bagdad, and Babylon. Dissolve your Union, as a civil war must do, as it inevitably will do, and what becomes of the pride, the wealth, and grandeur, of the Empire city? Your magnificent buildings, your splendid domes, must in a few short years lie in one common pile of ruins, the mere haunts of the scorpion, the streaked lizard, and the hooting owl. Your trade broken up, your commerce abandoned, who will you find else to inhabit these piles of rotten ruins, but the crawling reptile, and the fowls and beasts of prey that prowl by midnight, to entrap their game, and to procure their food. Sad reflections, but not less true than sad, if history is a faithful chronicler of events, and cause and effect. Your shipping rotting in your ports—your seamen out of employment—your manufactories annihilated, and your trade and commerce destroyed, would present a scene of misery and pauperism perhaps without a parallel in the modern world. In such an event, who cannot see that the monumental city (Baltimore) or Charleston, if you please, would soon become the New York of the South and emporiums of the Southern world, and of that universal trade now supplied by the arts and labor of your people. Your manufacturing capitalists, sir, would take flight from the North to Richmond and Petersburg of Virginia; to Salisbury, Raleigh, Fayetteville, North Carolina; Camden, Columbia, York, and Edgefield, of South Carolina; Augusta, Milledgeville, Macon, and Columbus, Georgia, and other places equally and eligibly situated. And; do your politicians not see something in all this, to admonish them of the self-immolating course that they have pursued in uniting with the Abolitionists? But, sir, more to these shortsighted priest-ridden and priest-terrified politicians, who by such acts are calling down the vengeance of Heaven upon their own devoted land. Let me, sir, here make a suggestion to them, if they cannot see, nor will not take a hint. Do they know that there is a certain line called "Mason and Dixon's line?" Do they know that it extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean? Have they heard of a certain Sabine river, and a new Republic recently called Texas? Do they know of a certain place called Mexico? Have they ever heard of a certain isthmus, called Darien? Do they not know that by drawing one breath—the utterance of one word to Texas—that country is ours, by alliance or by conquest, uniting us as one people, from the line of "Mason and Dixon," to the isthmus of Darien?

Yea, more: can they, Mr. Speaker, I mean the Abolitionists and their friends, present and absent, expect the co-operation of the great West, especially of those States of the valley, united to us in the indissoluble bonds of nature, by the great waters of the Mississippi? No, sir, this identity of interest and alliance has been formed by "nature and nature's God," which no man, nor set of men, can put asunder.

But, sir, in this severance and sectioning, what would Pennsylvania, that "arch-stone" State, say? the waters of whose Delaware wash the shores of a slaveholding State; on the one side, the waters of her Mononghahela is poured into the Ohio on the other, commingling with the Mississippi, that passes through the very heart of six slaveholding States, carrying with it, from her Pittsburgh, the richest freights of her manufacturers, industry and labor, to the ports of New Orleans, the great emporium of the South and Western world. Sir, have these mighty statesmen, (Lilliputian I should say,) or have their minds been so engrossed with their tender inward consciences as not to look abroad to those outward and external circumstances that are going on in this vast Republic? Have they condescended to trace from causes their inevitable effects? No, sir, absorbed in their moon-sickened philanthropy, they are perfectly blind to the commotions that must result from the folly and madness of their course.

Mr. Speaker, the South does not wish to assume the position that her Northern enemies seem determined to force her to take; she would greatly prefer continuing in the Union, enjoying the mutual blessings that it has so long bestowed on all; she has no desire to separate from her Northern brethren, and, when she is driven to it, it will be a matter of necessity, and not of choice: although I now say to all she would scorn to remain one hour longer in that Union than the sacred obligations are strictly observed, entered into by that sacred compact with our fathers. If, however, such an event should occur, let gentlemen not deceive themselves in believing, for a moment, that she has not every thing to hope, and but little to fear, upon this subject; they are perfectly prepared for the crisis, and, I am sorry to say, that there are thousands, from considerations I have before mentioned, who would court rather than avoid it.

Let me then, sir, again intreat those gentlemen, who are forcing upon us these sad alternatives, to pause and reflect once more upon the awful consequences that the continuation of their visionary and mad schemes must bring down upon their country?

Let me conjure them to cease their mockery about the right of petition, which can deceive no longer any but the most ignorant; and return to their deluded, imposed on, and abused constituents. Speak to them in practicable and intelligible language, and tell them, though truly, plainly, the facts as they exist, as the God of nature has determined them—tell them honestly, tell them that the isfue that they are now making with their Southern brethren, involves nothing short of "the question of peace or war." That to effect their object, will cost the lives of one-third of their entire popoulation, and an amount of treasure beyond that which now can be commanded by both the powers of England and America. Tell them the ruin, the desolation, the misery, the pauperism, and universal havoc, that must overspread the land, before their designs can be accomplished. Point them to the fate of "the Crusaders to the East," who undertook a similar expedition, to take possession of the Holy Land. Let them learn in their fate the destiny that awaits them. Go home, gentlemen, and be honest with your constituents; put the question fairly to them, whether they are for "peace or war" with us? Whether they are prepared to encounter these awful disasters, sufferings, and privations; to make the attempt to effect their object—accomplish it they cannot. And tell them, also, that he who would deny these facts, and almost inevitable consequences, is too ignorant to represent a just and a virtuous people, and would be a ready and fit instrument to bring down upon the human family, a greater curse than ever emerged from the box of Pandora—a measure to be spurned, as more loathsome than the leper, whose pestiferous breath even, is not less contaminated with rottenness and death.

I have now, Mr. Speaker, concluded my remarks upon many of the most important subjects alluded to in this discussion, and shall feel perfectly satisfied for an impartial people to make up their decision upon the evidence and facts that have been brought forward by the contending parties. I have done only my duty to my constituents and my country, so far as my feeble capacity has enabled me to discharge it. I have passed over, unnoticed, the remarks of certain gentlemen from the South who made war upon me a few days ago for presuming to speak of the interests of the South, in opposition to Abolitionism; for I cannot consider him a good general, or a faithful soldier, who makes war upon his own army, and kills off his own men, when upon the eve of battle with a fearful foreign enemy.

Before concluding, I wish to make but a few remarks upon a subject that, in my opinion, has been unnecessarily drawn in this debate. This, sir, is no place to canvass Presidential qualifications; that belongs to the people whom we represent, and it is our duty simply to carry out their decree, not for them to be dictated to, to execute and carry out our decrees. Much has been said about the military fame of one of the Presidential candidates at this time. Now, sir, I do not believe in any man's fame which is derived from the puffs of Congressional partisans, and more particularly in the fame of a "military chieftain" which is given him, not at the field of battle, but by the eloquence of his learned Congressional friends; by documents, and speeches, and short histories of his life. When was it ever known before, that the fame of a great general had to be taught to the people twenty or thirty years after the great deeds he had performed had been passed over, and unheard of before? Sir, the idea, I will not say is contemptible, but is superlatively ridiculous. I have evidence here in my hand to show what General Harrison has been. I will show that he was denied the honors of a General or soldier, in the Senate of the United States, indirectly, and that he was pronounced a Federalist, once, by John Randolph, and a defender of the alien and sedition laws, and he did not deny it.

[The SPEAKER here said it was out of order to discuss the character of General Harrison in that debate, as it was not applicable to the subject before the House.]

Mr. B. said, sir, I am well aware of that; but as others have done it, I felt as though I possessed the same right, and was only disposed to exercise it. I am willing to pass it over, but give notice that I shall append as much as I see proper to the remarks I have made, if they are thought worthy of publication. One word, however, I will say, that does not apply exclusely to General Harrison. It is this: there is no inducement that shall ever make me, as a Southern man, the advocate or defender of Southern rights and Southern institutions, support directly or indirectly for any important office in the country, one who is so dependent, directly or indirectly, upon the party of Abolitionists for his election. Why, sir, if dependent on them for his election, would he not be equally dependent on them here to sustain him after that election in the station in which they had placed him? And could he do that, except by conciliating, yielding to them, and giving them a part in his Administration? Sir, would not they be one of the very pillars upon which his Administration would rest for its support? without which support, such an Administration could not sustain itself a twelvemonth, a month, a week, scarcely a day. Do not all see, then, the indispensable necessity there would be for such a President to court such an interest, and which can never be done without the most deleterious and pernicious results to every slaveholding State in this Republic? Should Martin Van Buren be placed in such a situation tomorrow, without reflecting on the course of others, I, sir, should feel myself guilty of nothing short of high treason to my country not to proclaim my implacable and uncompromising opposition to him and his Administration, from the housetops, and on every public highway in the country, if necessary. But in this there may be, with some, an honest difference of opinion existsting. May it be so.

But, sir, I have done, never, I hope, to address this House again upon the same subject, or upon one fraught with as much mischief.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding my remarks, I must here take the liberty of saying that I rose with a predetermined resolution not to let a personal reflection escape me; and whatever may have happened to induce me to depart from such a resolve, I assure you, sir, it has been done with no ordinary reluctance on my part, and nothing but a sense of self-defence could have ever prompted such a course. I am aware, sir, too, of the time that I have consumed in this elaborate discourse, which, I readily acknowledge, nothing would have justified, but the immense magnitude and thrilling interest taken in the subjects involved. The task that I assigned myself, in presenting these facts to you and my country, I have discharged, though feebly, faithfully. I ask no further boon from the people of my country, than an impartial verdict upon the facts and circumstances I have exhibited.

In conclusion, I must say to a part of the House that I feel most grateful for the kindness, indulgence, and attention, with which they have been pleased to honor me during the time I have consumed in trespassing thus long upon their patience.

Sir, I shall vote for the resolution of the member from South Carolina, to arrest the progress of this disastrous agitation, and to avoid the execution of those horrid consequences I have felt it my duty to portray.

APPENDIX.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON succeeded in reply:

Mr. J. on concluding, offered the following amendment to the amendment of Mr. Adams, striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting as a substitute:

That no petition, memorial, resolution, or other paper, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or any State or Territory, or the slave trade between the States or Territories of the United States in which it now exists, shall be received by this House, or entertained in any way whatever."

Which Mr. Thompson then accepted for his.

This resolution passed by a vote of 114 to 108.

Of those who voted for it:

Southern Democrats, - - -	47
Southern Whigs, - - -	39
Northern Democrats, - - -	27
Northern Whig, - - -	1
	114

Against this resolution:

Southern Democrats—none.
Southern Whigs, - - -	4
Northern Democrats, - - -	39
Northern Whigs, (all but one) -	65
	108

Now, if the Northern Democrats had voted with the Northern Whigs, we would, by taking 27 from the 114, have been left with only 87 for the resolution, which, added to 108 against it, would have made 135; from which taking the 87, leaves a majority of 48 against the resolution of Mr. JOHNSON. The vote was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Andrews, Atherton, Linn Banks, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Botts, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Carroll, Chapman, Coles, Colquitt, Conner, Mark A. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crockett, Cross, John Davis, John W. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Simeon H. Anderson, Baker, Barnard, Beatty, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, Carr, Casey, Chittenden, Clark, Clifford, James Cooper, Cranston, Crary, Curtis, Cushing, Dana, Davee, Edward Davies, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Edwards, Ely, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fletcher, Floyd, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goode, Granger, Grinnell, Hook, Howard, Hunt, Hall, Hand, Wm. On this subject the Southern Whig members speak here, and have written to the South that the "Whigs have gained a great victory:" mark the word; "it was a test question." Their victory. Heaven! Out of 114 votes, by which the resolution passed, there are but 40 Whigs, all told; leaving 74 Democrats, by whose votes it passed—still their victory—leaving voting against the resolution, 68 Whigs, all good and true; an overwhelming majority of their party in the House of Representatives. Their candidates have blinded the people to the South heretofore, by the most positive statements that the Democrats were to the North and West, as much Abolitionists as the Whigs were, yea more; this vote, then, proves that statement only one-twenty-seventh part true.

On the arrival of the news of the passage of the resolution, JOHN A. KING (Whig) immediately offered a resolution, condemning in the bitterest terms, (in the House of Assembly of New York,) the resolution that we had just passed here against the Abolitionists, and which passed that body, forcing, by connecting it with other matters, many Democrats to go for it. Mr. MANN, (Democrat,) then offered this resolution to expose them, and which effectually did it:

Resolved, (if the Senate concur,) That this Legislature has seen with deep regret, and decidedly disapproves and condemns, the efforts of many misguided individuals in the Northern States, to interfere without right, and in violation of the principles on which the Constitution of the United States was established, with the domestic institutions of our sister States at the South; thereby disturbing the domestic peace of the States, weakening the bonds of our Union, and sowing the seeds of its dissolution.

The motion was seconded, the main question ordered, and, after a call of the House, the resolution was REJECTED by a party vote—ayes 41, (Democrats,) noes 57, (Whigs, all.)

So much for Whig Abolition.

As to General Harrison, to whose conduct I alluded in my remarks, I only intended to have referred to the following facts, to prevent a wanton abuse of truth and history for political effect, which I have seen published, and is yet without contradiction. In the Senate of the United States, John Randolph of Roanoke thus spoke of Gen. Harrison:

Now, sir, the only difference between the gentleman from Ohio and myself is this—and it is vital: that gentleman and myself differ fundamentally and totally, and did differ when we first took our seats in Congress—he as a Delegate from the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, I as a member of the other House, from the State of Virginia. He was an open, zealous, frank supporter of the sedition law and black cockade Administration; and I was as zealous, frank, and open an opponent of the black cockade and sedition law Administration. We differ fundamentally and totally—we never agree about measures or about men—I do not mean to dictate to the gentlemen—let us agree to differ as gentlemen ought to do, especially natives of the same State, who are antipodes to each other in politics. He, I acknowledge, just now the zenith and I the nadir; but unless there is something false in the philosophy of the schools, in the course of time even these will change their places.

To which General Harrison replied, and acknowledged his support of the Administration of the elder Adams, thus:

He has been pleased to say, that under the administration of Mr. Adams, I was a Federalist, and he comes to that conclusion from the course pursued by me in the session of 1799—1800.

The gentleman had no means of knowing my political principles unless he obtained them in private conversation. As I was on terms of intimacy with the gentleman, it is very probable that he might have heard me express sentiments favorable to the then Administration. I certainly felt them, &c.

In an address to the people of Ohio, he says—

I have thus, fellow-citizens, endeavored to explain to you the principles upon which our Union is formed. I RECOMMEND TO YOU, HOWEVER, THE PROCLAMATION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, ISSUED ON THE TENTH OF DECEMBER LAST, AND THE SPEECHES OF MR. WEBSTER, DELIVERED IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE LAST SESSION OF CONGRESS, IN ANSWER TO THE ARGUMENTS OF MR. CALHOUN, AS CONTAINING THE MOST ELOQUENT AND SATISFACTORY EXPOSITION OF THOSE PRINCIPLES THAT HAVE RECENTLY BEEN PUBLISHED. BY ISSUING THAT PROCLAMATION, I THINK GENERAL JACKSON HAS RENDERED A SERVICE TO HIS COUNTRY OF GREATER MAGNITUDE THAN HIS SPLENDID VICTORY AT NEW ORLEANS.

Head Quarters, Cincinnati, May 11, 1813.

I have the honor, through you, to request the President to accept my resignation of the appointment of Major General in the army, with which he was pleased to honor me. Lest the public service should suffer before a successor can be nominated, I shall continue to act until the 31st instant, by which time I hope to be relieved.

Having some reason to believe that the most malicious insinuations had been made against me at Washington, it was my intention to have requested an inquiry into my conduct from the commencement of my command. Further reflection has, however, determiued me to decline the application, because, from the proud consciousness of having palpably done my duty, I cannot believe that it is necessary, either for the satisfaction of the Government or the people, that I should pay so much respect to the suggestions of malice and envy.

In the tenth volume of Niles's Register, page 125, we read the following as a part of the proceedings in the United States Senate, to wit:

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution directing medals to be struck, and together with the thanks of Congress, presented to Major General Harrison and Governor Shelby, and for other purposes. After some discussion, Mr. Lacock moved to amend the resolution, by striking therefrom Major General Harrison. This motion was determined in the affirmative, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Galliard, Gore, Hunter, King, Lacock, Mason, Roberts, Thompson, Tait, Jackson, Turner, and Varnum—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Barber, Barry, Condict, Horsey, Macon, Morrow, Ruggles, Talbot, Wells, and Williams—10.

What do we make of this? Was not this a most pointed rebuke of Gen. Harrison? His name had been presented with Shelby's. A motion was made and carried to strike his name out. Could disrespect have been more strongly marked? Was it not singularly invidious? We will not say that it was a mark of indelible disgrace of Harrison as a military man—but we will give Gen. Harrison's own opinion of it. In the 10th volume of Niles's Register, on the 424th page, is a letter over Gen. Harrison's own signature, dated July 16, 1816, from which the following is an extract:

"A vote of the Senate of the United States has attached to my name a disgrace which I am convinced no time or efforts of mine will ever be able to efface. Their censure is indeed negative, but it is not on that account the less severe."

Now, we do hope that our political opponents will not accuse us of publishing General Harrison as a disgraced man, for we only quote his own words. It must be borne in mind that General Harrison resigned his commission in May, 1814, having lost the confidence of the whole army. Let it also be remembered that this was the most gloomy period of the war, when the country required the services of every man of military talents and firmness. The subsequent services of General Jackson and the unprecedented and brilliant victory of New Orleans, shows that there was work enough, and peril enough, for all in prospect, yet General Harrison retired to North Bend. The country got along without his services then and closed the war in a triumph of glory, and she needs not his services now.

Think of it, fellow-citizens, the Senate of the United States did not think that General Harrison merited a sword or the thanks of Congress for his military services!—Hamilton Telegraph.

REMARKS OF MR. PICKENS,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, March 27, 1840—In the debate upon the Treasury note bill, after Mr. GRAVES concluded his speech at large, and Mr. BLACK had responded to some remarks made by Mr. GRAVES in the course of his speech,

Mr. PICKENS rose and said:

MR. CHAIRMAN: Why the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GRAVES] should have held me up as a point upon which to make his attack, I am at a loss to discover; but I will commence the very few remarks I intend to make by repeating the language of that gentleman, used in reference to myself, "that I mean nothing disrespectful or personal" in the short reply I shall make.

I understood the gentleman to commence his remarks in a manner rather complimentary. In this supposition, I believe I am not mistaken. [Mr. GRAVES nodded assent.] I understood him to put his attack upon public grounds, because of the position which I happen to occupy before the country. Upon these grounds I will meet him. The indication of such an attack was given last night it was heralded with a flourish of trumpets, and I was challenged to be in my seat. Sir, I remained here. I have waited this attack upon my public position—for I confine it to that—and I must say that amidst all this consequential air of mock dignity, and flourish, and fury, and noise, we have witnessed in the accouchment literally nothing more than the illustration of the old saying, "Parturiunt montes, nascitur ridiculus mus." Yes, sir, and if the gentleman from Kentucky had in view the scenes which have passed upon certain memorable occasions, for two years past, in the other branch of Congress, and intended to hold them up that he might imitate the example and follow in the footsteps of others, I can only say that he reminds me too much of the fable of the toad and the ox, where the former attempted to swell himself out to the noble dimensions of the latter, and literally burst with his own inflation. Sir, when the gentleman undertook to arraign my course upon public grounds, I expected to have heard something serious; but when he attempted to discourse upon great principles, he reminded me strongly of Chief Justice Shallow in the play, who, when he was dealing with principles which he had not the ability to comprehend, always ended his disquisitions by exclaiming to his admiring audience, horum scorum rattlebangdorum, with a slapdashibus—there, haint I proved it?

Yes, sir, and what does the gentleman prove? What were the principles upon which I stood at the time to which he alludes? Is he aware that, in the session of 1834 and 1835, when the leaders of the then Administration party introduced into this House the famous pet bank system, and organized a league of banks from one end of the Union to the other to be connected with the Government by political principles, and for political purposes, I stood then precisely where I have ever stood, in opposition to it. And, at the same period, when a distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BINNEY,] distinguished alike for his talents and the integrity of his character, introduced his amendments on the other side, referring to the restoration of the deposites, and looking to the establishment of a National Bank, I stood between the two parties then, precisely upon the principles where I stood in the year 1837, at the extra session. A proposition was introduced in the form of a bill, in February, 1835, by a distinguished friend of mine from Virginia, (General Gordon,) which embraced precisely the Independent Treasury bill under which parties were organized at the extra session of 1837, upon the same principles which I believe to be identified with the best interests and the dearest rights of my country.

Yes, sir, I voted in the session of 1834 and 1835, upon the very same measure, almost verbatim, on which I voted in 1837. I then stood between the two great parties, in a minority of thirty-three. Where then is this change of principles? In a free country, it is upon the fiscal action of Government that all parties permanently divide; and am I to leave a position, embracing, as it does, fundamental principles in Government, because others choose to rally on it? It is true, I entered Congress while very young, with the deepest and most uncompromising hostility to the principles of the Force Bill and the Proclamation, and the measures and principles that followed them. Hannibal, at the age of nine years, is said to have been led to the altar of his country, and made to swear eternal enmity to Rome. Sir, at the threshold of early public life, I laid my hand upon the altar of my country, and swore eternal enmity to the principles of the Proclamation and the Force Bill. My State had been reviled and oppressed. It was under this feeling, and entertaining such sentiments, that I entered Congress, and delived the speeches from which the gentleman from Kentucky has thought proper to quote so liberally. In public life measures constitute one thing, and men another. Have I changed as to measures? No. And I now proclaim to him, and to this House, that, if I live long enough, and remain a member of this body, I shall, at a proper time, introduce a bill to repeal the odious measure to which I have alluded. I will make it a test question. I will demand its repeal as due to the country, and due to the Constitution. Sir, I defy the gentleman from Kentucky to point to the retraction of a principle I have ever sustained, or to the support of a measure I have ever opposed.

It is known to be the habit of my life to disguise no sentiment I entertain; but I should not have spoken thus of myself, if the gentleman had not asked me, if I could, to satisfy my God and my country as to the course I have taken. Sir, I can do so. I know where I stand. I stand upon the principles of the State Rights party. They need no defence from me. Go to the convention that framed your Constitution, and from that day to this their principles and their acts stand out as landmarks by which to bound and define Republican liberty. I know full well that the party to which the gentleman from Kentucky is allied, and with which he sympathizes, is deeply hostile to these principles—hostile, because they stand in the way to the attainment of the dearest objects of power. I stand with these principles—I intend to stand with them. I fight under their banner, and I belong to no man, or set of men, living. Here we have been for years a small, proscribed band upon this floor, and throughout this land; but, thank God, we stand upon the Constitution, and upon the rights of the country; and I hope and trust that the day is coming when our principles are about to be recognised. Under that banner I march. Our object is straightforward and onward—we turn neither to the right nor the left. When gentlemen choose to desert that standard, they will find in me a sworn opponent. We have hung our banner on the "outer wall!" We intend to plant it on the battlements of our country, and to triumph under it, or to perish in the conflict.

As to the position which I occupy as the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which the gentleman has thought proper to allude, as evidence of a disposition to court power, I owe that to no Executive favor. It was given to me freely, and without any previous solicitation that I know of, by the dearest public friend I have, the Speaker of this House, whose head I respect, and whose heart commands my deepest attachment. He gave it to me, I suppose, out of the esteem and friendship he entertained for me, and from my public position. I return him my thanks; but I owe no obligations to any other power on earth for it. Besides, it was from a Speaker chosen in part by the votes of the gentleman and his friends. If this is a crime, be it so; and if this is to furnish the groundwork of a charge against me, that I am pursuing the path of ambition—as was intimated, though not expressed, by the gentleman—let the country take it, and make the most of it.

One word, Mr. Chairman, upon another point, to which reference has been made by the gentleman from Kentucky, though rather by the way of supposition or inference. I allude to the charge that I had taken the course I have taken for the purpose of obtaining power, or with reference to the Speakership of this House. Sir, as it has been brought up, I take occasion to say here that I never sought that position, directly or indirectly, from any human being whatever. My name was placed before the public without consultation, and without my knowledge or consent. I can proudly say there are a hundred gentlemen on this floor who know that I never deviated to the right or the left to seek that office. When, at the commencement of this session, I was asked to be silent from policy upon some questions deeply agitating and dividing parties in this House, did I follow the advice? While others were silent, did I suffer my mouth to be closed? No. I trampled upon the advice. Was there a question upon which I did not utter my sentiments openly? Who placed my name up for that office? I defy any man to point to a single condition that I ever made, in private or public, for it. I will not say what I could not, perhaps, with propriety say; but if the secret transactions in relation to that matter should ever be published to the world, I will say, at all events they will do me at least no discredit.

Sir, I scorn to ask any thing of any man, or any set of men, except my own constituents. I speak what many around me know to be the facts; and, so far from this being the basis of a charge, or rather intimation, against me, that I had deserted my principles and gone over to an Administration which promised me power by bending for it, I repel it as beneath my nature If I stand before the country upon certain great principles, which the Administration have thought proper to place themselves upon, be it so. They shall not be trammelled by any solicitations for favors on my part, but shall receive from me, on those measures, a cordial and disinterested support.

Mr. Chairman, I have to apologize for having trespassed even for so short a time on the patience of this committee. I intend only to repel the idea that I had ever changed a principle which I ever avowed. I stand now, where I have always stood, under the State Rights banner, and no other banner hall ever wave over my head.

SPEECH OF MR. CALHOUN,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

In Senate, March 13, 1840. The following resolutions submitted by Mr. CALHOUN on the 4th inst. were taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That a ship or a vessel on the high seas, in time of peace, engaged in a lawful voyage, is, according to the laws of nations, under the exclusive jurisdiction of the State to which her flag belongs; as much so as if constituting a part of its own domain.

Resolved, That if such ship or vessel should be forced by stress of weather, or other unavoidable cause, into the port of a friendly power, she would, under the same laws, lose none of the rights appertaining to her on the high seas; but, on the contrary, she and her cargo and persons on board, with their property, and all the rights belonging to their personal relations, as established by the laws of the State to which they belong, would be placed under the protection which the laws of nations extend to the unfortunate under such circumstances.

Resolved, That the brig Enterprise, which was forced unavoidably by stress of weather into Port Hamilton, Bermuda island, while on a lawful voyage on the high seas from one port of the Union to another, comes within the principles embraced in the foregoing resolutions; and that the seizure and detention of the negroes on board by the local authority of the island, was an act in violation of the laws of nations, and highly unjust to our own citizens to whom they belong.

The resolutions having been read,

Mr. CALHOUN said: The case referred to in these resolutions is one of the three which has been for so long a period a subject of negotiation between our Government and that of Great Britain, without, however, receiving the attention which, in my opinion, is due to the importance of the principle involved. The other two were those of the Comet and Encomium. In order to have a clear understanding of the bearing of these resolutions, and the principles they embrace, it will be necessary to give a brief narrative of each of these cases.

The Comet is the first in order of time. She sailed from this District in the latter part of the year 1830, destined for New Orleans, having, among other things, a number of negroes on board. Her papers were regular, and the voyage in all respects lawful. She was stranded on one of the false keys of the Bahama island, opposite to the coast of Florida, and almost in sight of our own shores. The persons on board, including the negroes, were taken by the wreckers, against the remonstrance of the captain and owners, into Nassau, New Providence, where the negroes were forcibly seized and detained by the local authorities.

The case of the Encomium is in almost every particular similar. It occurred in 1834. She sailed from Charleston, destined, also, to New Orleans, with negroes on board, on a voyage, in like manner lawful, was stranded near the same place, taken in the same way, into the same port, where the negroes were also forcibly seized and detained by the local authorities. It so happens that I am personally acquainted with the owners of the negroes in this case. They were citizens of North Carolina, of high respectability, one of them recently President of the State Senate, and their negroes were shipped for New Orleans, with the view of emigration and permanent settlement in one of the Southwestern States.

The other is the case of the Enterprise, referred to in the resolutions. She sailed, in 1835, from this District, destined for Charleston, South Carolina, and, like the others, on a lawful voyage, with regular papers. She was forced, unavoidably, by stress of weather, into Port Hamilton, Bermuda island, where the negroes on board were, in like manner, forcibly seized and detained by the local authorities.

The owners of the negroes, after applying in vain to the local authorities for their surrender, made application to the Government for redress of injury: and the result, after ten years' negotiation, is, that the British Government has agreed to compensate the owners of the Comet and Encomium, on the ground that these cases occurred before the act for the abolition of slavery in her colonies had gone into operation, and refused compensation in the case of the Enterprise because it occurred afterwards.

Such are the material facts, drawn from the correspondence itself, and admitted in the course of the negotiation. What I propose, in the first place, is to show that the principle, on which compensation was allowed in the cases of the Comet and Encomium, embraces also that of the Enterprise; that no discrimination whatever can be made between them; and that in attempting to make a discrimination, the British Minister has assumed the very point in controversy, or, to express it in more familiar language, has begged the question. I shall rest my argument exclusively on the admissions necessarily involved in the two cases, without looking to any other authority. They will be found, if I do not greatly mistake, ample of themselves for my purpose.

What, then, is the principle necessarily involved, in allowing compensation in those cases? It will not be necessary to show that the allowance was not a mere act of gratuity to our citizens. No one will suspect that. It was, on the contrary, reluctantly yielded, after years of negotiation, only on the conviction that the rights of our citizens in the negroes could no longer be disputed, and, of course, the injustice of their seizure and detention. This brings me to a question of vital importance in this discussion, to which I must ask the Senate to give me its fixed attention; and that is, on what did this right of our citizens to the negroes rest? Not certainly on the British laws, either expressed or implied. So far otherwise, they expressly prohibited, in the broadest and most unqualified terms, persons from being brought in, or retained as slaves, under heavy penalty and forfeiture of property; declared the persons offending to be felons, and subjected them to be transported beyond sea, or to be confined and kept at hard labor for a term of years.* But one answer can be given to the question: that it rested on the laws of their own country. It was only by them they could possibly have a right to the negroes. And here we meet the vital question—how is it that a right resting on our laws should be valid and respected within the limits of the British dominion, against the express prohibition of an act of Parliament?

The answer can only be found in the principles embraced in the first and second of these resolutions. The former affirms the acknowledged principle that a ship or vessel, on the high seas, in time of peace, and engaged in a lawful voyage, is, by the law of nations, under the exclusive jurisdiction of the State to which her flag belongs; and the second, that if forced by stress of weather, or other unavoidable cause, into a port of a friendly power, she would lose none of the rights appertaining to her on the high seas; but, on the contrary, she, with her cargo and persons on board, including their property and all the rights belonging to their personal relations, would be placed under the protection which the law of nations extends to the unfortunate in such cases.

It is on this solid basis that the rights of our citizens rested. The laws of nations, by their paramount authority, overruled, in those cases, the municipal laws of Great Britain, even within her territorial limits; and it was to their authoritative voice that her Government yielded obedience in compensating our citizens for the violation of rights placed under their sacred protection.

Having now established the principle necessarily implied in the allowance of compensation in the cases of the Comet and Encomium, it will be an easy task to show that it equally embraces the case of the Enterprise. It is admitted by the British Minister, that there is no other distinction between it and the other two, except that it occurred before, and the others after, the act abolishing slavery in the colonies went into operation; and it must, of course, be equally comprehended in the principles embraced in the first and second resolutions, in virtue of which compensation was made, as has been shown; unless indeed that act had the effect of preventing it, which I shall now show it could not, according to the law of nations.

A simple but decisive view will be sufficient for this purpose. I have just shown that the act of Parliament, for abolishing the slave trade, although it expressly prohibited the introduction of slaves within the limits of the British territory, or detaining them in that condition, when brought in, so far from overruling, were overruled by the principles embraced in these resolutions. If that act did not overrule the laws of nations in those cases, how, I ask, could the act for the abolition of slavery in the colonies overrule them in a case in every essential circumstance acknowledged to be the same? Can a possible reason be assigned? The authority by which the two were enacted is the same, and the one as directly applicable to the case as the other. If, indeed, there be a difference, the one for the abolition of the slave trade is, of the two, the most applicable. That act directly prohibits the introduction of slaves within the British dominion, in the most unqualified manner, or the retaining them, when introduced in that condition; while the object of the act for the abolition of slavery in the colonies, was to emancipate those who were such under the authority of the British laws. It is true, it abolishes slavery in the British dominions, but that is no more than had previously been done, as far as slaves brought into her dominions were concerned, by the act for abolishing the slave trade. And yet we see that act was overruled by the law of nations, in the case of the Comet and Encomium. How, then, is it possible that of two laws, enacted by the same authority, both being equally applicable, the one, when applied to the same case, should be overruled by the law of nations, and the other overrule it? It is clear that it is impossible; and that if the one cannot divest the rights of our citizens, neither can the other; and, of course, that the principle on which compensation was allowed in the cases of the Encomium and the Comet, equally embraces that of the Enterprise. Both acts were, in truth, but municipal laws; and, as such, neither could overrule the laws of nations, nor divest our citizens of their rights in the case under consideration. In the nature of things, the laws of nations, which have for their object the regulation of the intercourse of States, must be paramount to municipal laws, where their provisions happen to come into conflict. If not, they would be without authority. If this be so, there can be no discrimination between the three cases, and all ought to be allowed; or, if not, none; and, in that case, our citizens would have no just claim for compensation in either. It follows, that the principle which embraces one embraces all. There can be no just distinction between them; and I shall next proceed to show, that, in attempting to make a distinction where there is no difference, the British negotiator has been compelled to assume the very point in controversy between the two Governments. In doing this, I propose to follow his argument, step by step, and prove the truth of my assertion at each step.

He sets out with laying down the rule, by which he asserts that those claims should be decided, which, he says, "is, that those claimants must be considered entitled to compensation, who were lawfully in possession of their slaves within the British territory, and who were disturbed in their legal possession of those slaves by functionaries of the British Government." I object not to the rule. If our citizens had no right to their slaves, at any time after they entered the British territory—that is, if the mere fact of entering extinguished all right to them, (for that is the amount of the rule,)—they could of course have no claim on the British Government, for the plain reason that the local authority, in seizing and detaining the negroes, seized and detained what, by supposition, did not belong to them. That is clear enough; but let us see the application: it is given in a few words. He says: "Now the owners of the slaves on board the Enterprise never were lawfully in possession of those slaves within the British territory;" assigning for reason, "that before the Enterprise arrived at Bermuda, slavery had been abolished in the British Empire"—an assertion which I shall show, in a subsequent part of my remarks, to be erroneous. From that, and that alone, he comes to the conclusion, "that the negroes on board the Enterprise had, by entering within the British jurisdiction, acquired rights which the local courts were bound to protect." Such certainly would have been the case if they had been brought in, or entered voluntarily. He who enters voluntarily the territory of another State, tacitly submits himself, with all his rights, to its laws, and is as much bound to submit to them as its citizens or subjects. No one denies that; but that is not the present case. They entered not voluntarily, but from necessity; and the very point at issue is, whether the British municipal laws could divest their owners of property in their slaves on entering British territory, in cases such as the Enterprise, when the vessel has been forced into their territory by necessity, through an act of Providence, to save the lives of those on board. We deny they can, and maintain the opposite ground:—that the law of nations in such cases interposes and protects the vessel and those on board, with their rights, against the municipal laws of the State, to which they have never submitted, and to which it would be cruel and inhuman, as well as unjust, to subject them. Such is clearly the point at issue between the two Governments; and it is not less clear, that it is the very point assumed by the British negotiator in the controversy.

He felt, in assuming his ground, that the general principle was against him, according to which, the municipal laws yield to the laws of nations in such cases; and in order to take himself out of its operation, he attempted to make a distinction equally novel and untenable. He asserts "that there is a distinction between laws bearing on the personal liberty of man, and laws bearing upon the property which man may claim in irrational animals or inanimate things;" and concedes "that if a ship, containing such animals or things, were driven by stress of weather into a foreign port, it would be highly unjust that the owner should be stripped of what belongs to him, through the application of the municipal law of the State to which he had not voluntary submitted himself." Yes, it would be both unjust and inhuman; and because it would be so, it is contrary to the law of nations, which is but the rules of justice and humanity applied to the intercourse of nations; and therefore it is that it interposes in cases like the present, and places under its protection the rights of the unfortunate, even against the municipal laws of the place.

But he asserts that the principle does not extend to the cases in which rights of property in persons are concerned, (for such must be the meaning, or it is wholly irrelevant to the question at issue,) because "there are three parties to the transaction; the owner of the cargo, the local authority, and the alleged slave; and the third party is no less entitled than the first to appeal to the local authority for such protection as the law of the land may afford him." This is the position on which the British negotiator mainly rests his argument; and if this fails, the whole must fall to the ground. It is not difficult to see, from what he says of two parties appealing to the local authority, that he tacitly puts aside the law of nations, and assumes the parties to be under the municipal law of the place; and, also, that those laws, and not the law of nations, are the standard by which their rights are to be judged; but is it not manifest this is an assumption, in another form, of the point in controversy? Against it, unsustained and unsustainable, by authority or reason, I shall oppose what, to him, must be the highest authority—that of the British Government itself—in the cases of the Comet and Encomium, backed by unanswerable reasons.

If the distinction be true at all, between property in persons and property in things, or irrational animals, it was, to the full, as applicable to those cases as it is to that of the Enterprise. In them the right of property in persons was involved, and the three parties included, to the same extent, as in that. Nor was personal liberty less concerned. As far as British laws could affect the rights of our citizens, the negroes belonging to the Comet and Encomium were as free as those belonging to the Enterprise. An act of Parliament, as has been shown, forbade their introduction, and forfeited the rights of their owners, thereby making them free, with rights to maintain, as far as British legislation could make them so; and yet, after full and mature investigation and reflection for the space of ten years, it was admitted that the same rule applied to them, which, it is conceded, would apply in similar cases to property in things, or irrational animals. Now, I ask, if the act for the abolition of the slave trade, which directly forbids the introduction of negroes as slaves, and forfeits the rights of their owners, did not, as we have seen, justify the distinction in the cases of the Comet and Encomium, now attempted to be made between the two descriptions of property, how could the act for the abolition of slavery justify it in the case of the Enterprise? In the former, there were all the parties, with their respective rights, just the same as in the latter; and if the local authorities were not bound to recognise and protect the negroes in the one case, why, I ask, were they in the other? Can a satisfactory answer be given? And, if not, what becomes of the distinction, with all its consequences, attempted to be deduced from it?

The British negotiator, as if conscious of the weakness of the position, attempts immediately to fortify it. He says: "If, indeed, a municipal law be made, which violates the laws of nations, a question of another kind may arise. But the municipal law which forbids slavery, is no violation of the laws of nations. It is, on the contrary, in strict harmony with the laws of nations; and, therefore, when slaves are liberated, according to such municipal law, there is no wrong done, and there can be no compensation granted;" a position pregnant with meaning, as will hereafter appear, but I must say, like all his others, a mere assumption of the point at issue, expressed in vague and indefinite language.

If, in asserting that a municipal law abolishing slavery is not a violation of the laws of nations, it is meant that it is not a violation of those laws for a State to abolish slavery which exists under its authority, it may be readily admitted, without prejudice to the rights of our citizens in the case in question, though it is a little remarkable, that the British Government allowed compensation to their own subjects by this very act under which slavery was abolished—authority in direct contradiction to the assertion that no compensation can be granted, when the act is applied to the case of our citizens, forced, without their consent, into its territory.

But if, instead of that, it be meant that all municipal laws, not in violation of the laws of nations, are valid against those laws, when they come in conflict with them, how can the distinction, attempted to be drawn between the rights of property in things, or irrational animals, and in persons, be justified? or how can the allowance of compensation in the cases of the Comet and Encomium be explained? I put the question, Was the law for the abolition of the slave trade, a violation of the laws of nations? And if not a violation, as it certainly was not, how came compensation to be granted in those cases? Can an answer be given? And if not, what becomes of the distinction attempted to be taken?

But another meaning may be intended; that it was no violation of the law of nations to extend the act, for the abolition of slavery in the British territories, to cases such as the Enterprise. If that is intended, it would be like all the other distinctions which have been attempted—but an assumption of the point in controversy.

I have now stated, in his own words, every argument advanced by the British negotiator to sustain the distinction which he has attempted between the cases of the Comet and Encomium, and that of the Enterprise, and have, I trust, established, beyond controversy, that there is no rational ground whatever for the distinction. When again pressed on the subject by our Minister, who was not satisfied with his arguments, he assumed the broad ground that Great Britain had the right to forbid the recognition of slavery within her territory; and as our claim was inconsistent with such right, it could not be allowed, and on this closed the correspondence. It is easy to see, if she has such right, in the broad and unqualified sense in which it is laid down, and applied to the case in question, it extends to all rights whatever, whether it be right of property in things and irrational animals, or growing out of personal relations, whether founded in consent or not. All are either the creatures of positive enactments, or subject to be regulated and controlled by municipal laws; and she has just the same right to prohibit the recognition of any one or all of those rights within her territory, as the one in question. But who can doubt that such prohibition, if extended to cases of distress, such as the Enterprise, would be a most flagrant violation of the laws of nations, as understood and acted on by all civilized nations, and even as admitted and acted on by herself, in the cases of the Comet and Encomium?

To us this is not a mere abstract question, nor one simply relating to the free use of the high seas. It comes nearer home. It is one of free and safe passage from one port to another of our Union; as much so to us, as a question touching the free and safe use of the channels between England and Ireland on the one side, and the opposite coast of the continent on the other, would be to Great Britain. To understand its deep importance to us, it must be borne in mind, that the island of Bermuda lies but a short distance off our coast, and that the channel between the Bahama islands and Florida is not less than two hundred miles in length, and on an average not more than fifty wide; and that through this long, narrow and difficult channel, the immense trade between our ports on the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic coast must pass, which, at no distant period, will constitute more than half of the trade of the Union. The principle set up by the British Government, if carried out to its full extent, would do much to close this all-important channel, by rendering it too hazardous for use. She has only to give an indefinite extension to the principle applied to the case of the Enterprise, and the work would be done; and why has she not as good a right to apply it to a cargo of sugar or cotton, as to the slaves who produced it?

I have now, I trust, established, to the satisfaction of the Senate, what I proposed when I commenced; that the principle on which compensation was allowed in the cases of the Comet and Encomium, equally embraces that of the Enterprise; that no just distinction can be made between them; and that the British negotiator, in attempting to make a distinction, was forced to assume the point in controversy. And here I might conclude my remarks, as far as these resolutions are concerned; but there are other questions connected with this subject, not less important, which demand attention, and which I shall now proceed to consider.

It is impossible to read the correspondence between the two Governments without the impression that the question involved in the negotiation was one of deep embarrassment to the British ministry. The great length of the negotiation, considering the simplicity and paucity of the points involved, the long delay before an answer could be had at all, and the manifest embarrassment in making the distinction between the cases allowed and the one rejected, plainly indicate that there was some secret, unseen difficulty in the way, not directly belonging to the questions involved in the cases. What was that difficulty? If I mistake not, it will be found in the condition of things in England, and especially in reference to those in power. It is my wish to do the Ministry ample justice, as I believe they were desirous of doing us; but it is not to be disguised that there was no small difficulty in the way, from the state of things under which they acted, and which I shall next explain.

The present Whig ministry held, and still hold, their power, as is well known, by a precarious tenure. Their party is, in fact, in a minority, and can only support themselves against the powerful party in opposition, by such adventitious aid as can be conciliated. Among the subdivisions of party in Great Britain, the Abolition interest is one of no little power; and it will be seen at once, that the question involved in the negotiation is one in reference to which they would have no little sensibility. Like all other fanatics, they have little regard either to reason or justice, where the object of their enthusiasm is concerned. To do us justice, without offending such a party, in such a case, was no easy task; and to offend them, without losing the ascendency of their party, and the reins of Government, was almost impossible. The Ministry had to act under these conflicting considerations; and I intend no disrespect in saying that the desire of conciliating so strong a party, and thereby retaining place, when opposed to the demands of justice, could not be without its weight. The course, accordingly, taken, was such as might have been anticipated from these opposing motives. To satisfy our urgent claim for justice, compensation was allowed in two of the cases, and to avoid offending a powerful and zealous party, a distinction was taken between them and the other, the effects of which would be to close the door against future demands of the kind. I mean not to say, that deliberate and intentional injustice was done; but simply, that these conflicting causes, which it is obvious, from the circumstances of the case, must have been in operation, would, by a natural and an unseen bias, lead to that result.

But another question of far greater magnitude, growing out of the foregoing, presents itself for consideration: to what must that result finally lead, if Great Britain should persist in the decision which it has made? I hold it impossible for her to maintain the position she has taken. She must abandon it as untenable, and take one of two other positions: either that her municipal laws are paramount to the law of nations, when they come into conflict; or that slavery—the right of man to hold property in man—is against the law of nations. It is only on the one or other of these suppositions that the act for abolishing slavery can have the force she attributes to it.

The former she cannot take, without virtually abolishing the entire system of international laws. She could not think of assuming that her municipal laws were paramount, without admitting those of other States also to be so; which would be to annul the system, and substitute in its place universal violence, discord and conflict. This would force her on the other alternative, which, if it were true, would give her a solid foundation for the rejection of our claim, on the incontestable principle that the laws of nations would not enforce that which violates themselves. Nor are there wanting indications, in the correspondence, (to some of which I have alluded,) that the position she has taken in reference to the Enterprise, is but preliminary to the adoption of that alternative. There are, however, many difficulties to be got over, before she can openly take it.

It would require, in the first place, no small share of effrontery, for a nation which has been the greatest slave dealer on earth; a nation, which has dragged a greater number of Africans from their native shores to people her possessions, and to sell to others, and which forced our ancestors to purchase slaves from her against their remonstrance, while colonies, (not improbably the ancestors of the owners of those slaves to purchase the ancestors of the slaves, for which she now refuses compensation,)—it would, I repeat, require no small effrontery to turn round and declare that she neither had, nor could have, the right to the property she sold us, nor could we, without deep crime, retain possession. We all know what such conduct would be called among individuals, without, indeed, followed by a tender back of the purchase money, with ample compensation for damages; and there is no good reason why it should be called by a less harsh epithet, when applied to the conduct of nations.

But there is another difficulty. The avowal of the principle would place her in conflict with all the authorities on the law of nations, and the custom of all ages, past and present; and would bring her into collision with all nations whose institutions would be outlawed by the avowal, and what, perhaps, she would most regard, it would put her in conflict with herself. Yes, she who refused to compensate our citizens for property unjustly seized and detained under her authority, on the ground that she had forbade the recognition of slavery in her territory, had then, and has, at this day, hundreds of thousands of slaves in the most wretched condition, held by her subjects in her Eastern possessions; and worse, by herself. With all her boast, she is a slave holder, and hires out and receives hire for slaves. I speak on high authority—the Asiatic Journal for 1838, printed in her own metropolis.

Here the SECRETARY read the following extracts from pages 221:

"GOVERNMENT OF SLAVES IN MALABAR.—We know that there is not a servant of Government, in the south of India, who is not intimately acquainted with the alarming fact, that hundreds of thousands of his fellow-creatures are fettered down for life to the degraded destiny of slavery. We know that these unfortunate beings are not, as is the case in other countries, serfs of the soil, and incapable of being transferred, at the pleasure of their owners, from one estate to another. No they are daily sold, like cattle, by one proprietor to another; the husband is separated from the wife, and the parent from the child. They are loaded with every indignity; the utmost possible quantity of labor is exacted from them, and the most meagre fare that human nature can possibly subsist on is doled out to support them. The slave population is composed of a great variety of classes: the descendants of those who have been taken prisoners in time of war, persons who have been kidnappad from the neighboring States, people who have been born under such circumstances as that they are considered without the pale of the ordinary castes; and others who have been smuggled from the coast of Africa, torn from their country and their kindred, and destined to a more wretched lot, and, as will be seen, to a more enduriug cantivity than their brethren of the western world. Will it be believed, that Government itself participates in this description of property; that it actually holds possession of slaves, and lets them out for hire to the cultivators of the country, the rent of a whole family being two fanams, or half a rupee per annum"

But why dwell on these comparatively few slaves? The whole of Hindostan, with the adjacent possessions, is one magnificent plantation, peopled by more than one hundred millions of slaves, belonging to a company of gentlemen in England, called the East India Company, whose power is far more unlimited and despotic than that of any Southern planter over his slaves—a power upheld by the sword and bayonet, exacting more and leaving less by far of the product of their labor to the subject race, than is left under our own system, with much less regard to their comfort in sickness and age. This vast system of servitude carries with itself the elements of increase: not, it is true, by the African slave trade, but by means not less inhuman; that of organizing the subject race into armies, and exhausting their strength and life in reducing all around to the same state of servitude.

But it may be said, that the East India Company is but a department of the British Government, through which it exercises its control, and holds in subjection that vast region. Be it so. I stickle not for nice distinctions. But how stands the case under this aspect? If it be contrary to the laws of nature, or nations, for man to hold man in subjection individually, is it not equally contrary for a body of men to hold another in subjection? And if that be true, is it not as much so for one nation to hold another in subjection? If man individually has an absolute right to self-government, have not men aggregated into States, or nations, an equal right? If there be a difference, is not the right the more perfect in a people, or nation, than in the individuals who compose it? And is not the subjection of one people to another usually accompanied with, at least, as much abuse, cruelty, and oppression, as that of one individual to another? Is it possible to make a distinction which shall justify the one and condemn the other? And if not, what right, then, I ask, has Great Britain to hold India in subjection, if it be contrary to the laws of nature, or nations, for one man to hold another in subjection? Or, what right to hold Canada, or her numerous subject colonies, all over the globe? Or, to come nearer to the point, in what light does it place her boasted abolition of slavery in the West Indies? What has she, in reality, done there but to break the comparatively mild and guardian authority of the master, and to substitute in its place her own direct and unlimited power? What but to replace the overseer, by the army, the sheriff, the constable, and the tax collector? Has she made her slaves free? Given them the right of self-government! Is it not mockery to call their present subject condition freedom? What would she call it, if it were hers—if, by some calamity to her and the civilized world, she should fall under similar subjection to France, or some other power? Would she call that freedom, or the most galling and intolerable slavery?

But I approach near home. I cross the Atlantic, passing unnoticed subjugated Ireland, with her eight millions of people, and only ninety thousand voters, and placing myself on the boasted shores of England herself, I ask, how will the principle work there?

It was estimated by Burke, if my memory serves me, shortly before the beignning of this century, that the British public, estimating as such all who exercised influence over the Government, did not exceed 200,000 individuals. Since then it has, no doubt, greatly increased by the extension of the right of suffrage and other causes. Say that it has trebled or quadrupled, and, to be liberal, that it amounts to seven or eight hundred thousand. In this small portion, then, is vested the supreme control and dominion over the twenty-five millions, which constitute the population of the British isles. If, then, it be contrary to the laws of nature or nations for man to hold man in subjection, or one nation another, how can a small part or class of a community hold the rest? Or on what principle, according to that maxim, can these few hundred thousands hold so many millions? If the right of self government forbids the subjection of one man to another, does it not equally forbid that of a small portion of the community over the residue? And, if so, must not the maxim terminate in the utter overthrow of the present political and social system of Great Britain, and the rest of Europe?

What a picture is presented to the mind in contemplating the present state of things in England! We behold a small island, in the German ocean, under the absolute control of a few hundred thousand individuals, holding in unlimited subjection not less than one hundred and fifty millions of human beings, dispersed over every part of the globe, making not less than two hundred to each of the dominant class; and yet that class propagating a maxim, with more than missionary zeal, that strikes at the foundation of this mighty power! I would say to her and other powers impelled by like madness, You are attempting what will prove impossible. You lay down a maxim which you would limit in its application, so as to suit your own safety and convenience. Vain hope in this inquiring and investigating age. You cannot make a monopoly of a principle so as to vend it for your own benefit. It will be carried out to its ultimate results, when its reaction will be terrific on your social and political condition. Already it begins to show its fruits. The subject mass of your population, under the name of Chartists, are now clamoring for the benefit of the maxim, as applied to themselves. They demand practically, in their case, the benefit of the principle you propagate at a distance; and for so doing, are cut down without mercy. My object is not to censure the course adopted towards them. It is not for me to judge what your safety may require. I am simply showing that the maxim on which you profess to act in relation to the West India colonies, and which you must apply to our case, in order to sustain your decision, begins to be applied to your own at home. It is only the beginning. Already it is passing into a higher and more intellectual class, who are applying it to the present social and political condition of Europe. A body of men, not inconsiderable either for numbers or talents, on the continent of Europe, and particularly in France, are busy in making such application. They are men not of a character to stop short, or be intimidated by final results Already they proclaim that social or political slavery—that which results from the subjection of the great mass of society to the small governing class, is worse than domestic slavery—that which exists within the southern portion of our Union, in its mildest and most mitigated form. In illustration, I will read an extract from the Paris correspondent of the National Intelligencer, said to be Mr. Walsh, taken from the work of the Abbe Lamannais:

"The Abbe exclaims, 'In good sooth, I am not in the least astonished that so many, viewing only the material side of things, and the present separated from the future, should, in the midst of our boasted civilization, regret the ancient domestic slavery. Thirty-three millions of Frenchmen, true serfs of this era, crouch ignominiously under the domination of two hundred thousand privileged masters, and supreme dispensers of their lot. Such is the fruit of our struggles for half a century. Slaves, arise and break your chains! let them no longer degrade in you the name of man! Eighteen centuries of Christianity have elapsed, and we still live under the pagan system.' "

To this I add another extract, taken from another of the public journals, which will give some idea what are the fruits of slavery in the form so vehemently denounced by the Abbe:

"ENGLAND AND IRELAND.—It's enough to make one's heart bleed, if all were true, in the winter pictures drawn of the starved, suffering condition of the peasantry in the bogs—their cabins inundated with rains and mud—the bodies of the laborers saturated with wet, sleeping on fireless hearths, and peat at the exorbitant price of a penny a sod—too exorbitant to cook the very few potatoes they may have. Parallel to these scenes the English operatives are stated to be reduced to dire extremity, and around these dark and gloomy spots, we have narratives of the luxurious and voluptuous life led by the favored few of the gentry and nobility."

If such is the condition of what the Abbe calls "the serfs of this era" in the most civilized country in Europe, well may our domestic slave, in the midst of plenty, and under the guardian care of a master, identified with him in interest, rejoice at his comparative happy condition. The exaggerated picture, drawn by the most infuriated Abolitionist, can find nothing in the whole region of the South to equal this picture of misery and want; and yet it is Great Britain, wherein such a contrast of wretchedness and voluptuousness exists, that wages such unrelenting hostility against domestic slavery! She wars against herself. The maxim she now pushes against others, will, in turn, be pushed against her. She is preparing the way for universal discord, within and without. The movement began with Wilberforce, and other misguided men like him, who, although humane and benevolent, looked at the surface of things, with little knowledge of the springs of human action, or the principles on which the existing social and political fabric of Europe rests; and, I may add, like all other enthusiasts, without much regard, as to the means employed in accomplishing a favorite object.

There never before existed on this globe a nation that presented such a spectacle as Great Britain does at this moment. She seems to be actuated by the most opposite and conflicting motives. While apparently actuated by so much zeal, on this side of the Cape of Good Hope, in the cause of humanity and liberty, she appears to be actuated, on the other side, by a spirit of conquest and domination not surpassed by Rome, in the haughtiest days of the Republic. She has just subjected and added to her vast empire in the East, the country between India and Persia; and is at this moment, if we are to believe recent accounts, preparing an extensive expedition against the oldest of nations, containing a population not less than a fourth of the human race—a nation that has lived through generations of nations, and which was old and civilized before the Governments of Western Europe came into existence; I need scarcely say I refer to China. Let me add to her other claims to respect and veneration, that, of all despotic Governments, it seems to me, (judging from the scanty evidence we have of a people so secluded,) it is the wisest and most parental. And for what, if we may believe report, is Great Britain about to wage war against this venerable and peaceful people? To force on them the use of opium, the product of her slaves on her Hindu plantation, against the resistance of the Chinese Government. And what is the extent and character of this trade? It is calculated it would have reached, the last year, had it not been interrupted, forty thousand chests, or more than five millions of pounds, worth about twenty millions of dollars, sufficient, by estimate, to supply thirteen or fourteen millions of opium smokers, and to cause a greater destruction of life annually, than the aggregate number of negroes in the British West India colonies, whose condition has been the cause of so much morbid sympathy. It is against the trade in this pernicious and poisonous drug, carried on by fraud and smuggling, that the Chinese Government has taken the most energetic and decisive measures, as it was called to do by the highest consideration of policy and humanity. Of all deaths, none is more wretched than that occasioned by this seductive but fatal drug. The subject slowly expires, with all the powers and functions of mind and body completely exhausted, a spectacle odious to behold.

Such is the trade which, it is said, the expedition is intended to enforce, against the decrees of the Chinese Government. The rumor, I hope, is groundless. I hope, for the honor of England—for the honor of modern civilization, and the Christian name—that its object is far different; and that, instead of enforcing a traffic so abominable, it is intended to co-operate with the wise and humane policy of the Chinese Government in suppressing it; and that, so far from aiding smugglers and ruffians, it is intended to seize and punish them, as they deserve. If, however, rumor should prove true, what a contrast it would exhibit between the conduct of Great Britain in that and this quarter of the globe? There, we find her extending her power and dominion, regardless of justice or humanity; while here, we find her in the depth of sympathy for a band of negroes, brought into our ports under a suspicion of murder and piracy, intermeddling in their behalf with our own and the Spanish Governments—and that, too, at the solicitation of an Abolition society of her own subjects! Strange as this may seem, it is true. I hold in my hand evidence of the fact, which I request the Secretary to read.

The Secretary then read the following:

"FOREIGN OFFICE, London, Dec. 23, 1839.

"SIR: With reference to the memorial of the Glasgow Emancipation Society, dated the 25th of October last, on behalf of the negroes who took possession of the Amistad, and were subsequently carried to New London, in the United States of America, I am directed by Viscount Palmerston to state to you, for the information of the above mentioned society, that his lordship has directed her Majesty's Minister at Washington to interpose his good offices in their behalf, in order that they may be restored to liberty; and his lordship has further instructed her Majesty's Charge d'Affaires at Madrid to call upon the Spanish Government to issue, immediately, strict orders to the authorities of Cuba, that, if the request of the Spanish Minister at Washington is complied with, the negroes in question may be put in possession of their liberties.

"Her Majesty's Charge d'Affaires at Madrid has likewise been instructed to urge the Spanish Government to cause the laws against the slave trade to be enforced against Messrs. Ruiz and Montez, and against all other Spanish subjects concerned in the transaction in question.

"I am, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

"W. FOX STRANGWAYS.

"WM. P. PATTON, esq. &c. Glasgow."

Yes, strange ways, indeed, if it might be permitted, on so grave an occasion, to allude to a name. Strange ways—making millions of slaves in one hemisphere—forcing, by fire and sword, the poisonous product of their labor on an old and civilized people, while, in another, interposing, in a flood of sympathy, in behalf of a band of barbarous slaves, with hands imbrued with blood! I trust such officious intermedling will be met as it deserves. Has it come to this, that we cannot touch a subject connected with an African, without the interference of another Government, at the solicitation of a foreign society, instigated, no doubt, by a foreign faction among ourselves? I mean not a faction of foreigners, but of our own people, who, in their fanatical zeal, have lost every feeling belonging to an American, and transferred their allegiance to a foreign power.

In making these remarks, I have not been actuated by feelings of hostility towards Great Britain. My motive is far different. With all her faults I admire and esteem her for many and great qualities. My desire is peace. It is the wish of the civilized world; and I would regard war between the two kindred people as among the greatest of calamities. But justice is indispensable to peace among nations. Our maxim ought to be, neither to do, nor submit to, wrong—to ask for nothing but justice, and to accept nothing less; but never disturb peaceful relations till every means of obtaining justice has been tried in vain. I have, in this case, acted in that spirit. I believe, solemnly, that justice has been withheld. To prove that, has been my object. I trust I have done it to the satisfaction of the Senate. I also believe that justice has been withheld on grounds utterly untenable, and which, if persisted in, must lead, in the end, to the avowal of a principle, on the part of Great Britain, that must strike a fatal blow at the peace of the two countries; and, in its reaction, on the social and political condition of Great Britain and the rest of Europe. Thus believing, I have attempted to point to some of the disastrous consequences which must follow, with the view of rousing attention to the question at issue between the two Governments, in the case under consideration, in order to obtain redress of injury. If, in making my remarks, I have assailed her, it is because we have been assailed, as I conceive, in assuming the principle on which justice has been withheld.

The immediate object I had for introducing these resolutions was, to take the sense of the Senate on the subject to which they refer; and which embraces a principle vital to us of the South, and of deep interest to the rest of the Union. My conviction is strong, that we have justice on our side; and I wish to afford to our brethren in the other sections, an opportunity of exhibiting a proof of their attachment to the common interest, by sustaining a cause where we are particularly concerned, as we did, at the last session, by sustaining unanimously one where they were.*

I have no particular wish, as to the mode of disposing of the resolutions. All I desire is a direct vote on them; but I am indifferent, whether they shall be first referred and reported on, or be discussed and decided on without reference. I leave the Senate to decide which course shall be adopted.

Mr. GRUNDY said that as very important principles were involved in these resolutions, it would be proper that we should examine the whole ground before we vote upon them. He was himself prepared to vote now, having had occasion to examine the question some time since, but others very probably had not done so. The able speech of the Senator from South Carolina had thrown much light on the subject, and could not fail of attracting the attention of Senators to it. He would therefore prefer that it should be passed over informally for the present. As to the interference of the British Government in the matter of the Africans taken in the Amistad he thought it was decidedly wrong, and no good could result from it. It was a question which could only concern two Governments—the Spanish and American—both of which are perfectly competent to protect the rights of their citizens, and do justice in the premises. Under these circumstances he considered the unasked interference of a third power an intrusion. He wished to see what course the Executive would take in this matter, as in questions between foreign Governments and our own, he thought we should act nationally—that all the departments of our Government should act in harmony.

Mr. KING said he was fully impressed with the importance of the subject, as no one could fail of being who had investigated it, or who had listened to the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina. It was a question which, if not arrested and settled now, will lead to momentous and disastrous consequences hereafter. Viewing it in this light, and with a view to afford an opportunity for full investigation, he would, with the assent of his friend from South Carolina, move the reference of the resolutions to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CALHOUN assenting,

The resolutions were accordingly referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REMARKS OF MR. REYNOLDS OF ILLINOIS,

In the House of Representatives, March 28, 1840—On the bill appropriating money for the relief of Thomas Fillebrown, jr.

Mr. REYNOLDS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It is very seldom I address the House, and I would at no time attempt it, if I did not think it was my imperious duty to my constituents. I am clearly satisfied that a policy is about to be established in this House that will not be favorable to the interests of the people in "the far West," and particularly unfavorable to the district in the State of Illinois which I represent. And in order to try to convince this House that the non-appropriation policy is unjust and improper at this, or any other time, I came here into this part of the hall, among my political friends, and rise up in the midst of them to endeavor to convince them and others, that this is not the true policy of the country.

Every one who knows me, is satisfied I am not extravagant in my own case, and therefore would not wish the Government to be so. But it is better never to speak of one's self, and so I will decline any farther remarks on my private transactions.

The case now before the House is of the smallest consideration, and will consume more time in the discussion than the amount of money involved in it is worth.

It is not retrenchment or economy to delay the action of Congress from greater interests, and to prolong the session for months to come, by such discussion. When a committee have the subject before them, and give it, as they generally do, a full, fair, and impartial investigation, I generally acquiesce in this decision, and support it. Men must have, to some extent, confidence in one another, or the bonds of civil, as well as political, society, must be severed and destroyed. This would be ruinous to the peace and happiness of the people. We must, to some extent, confide in each other.

I know, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Public Lands, of which I am an humble member, investigate matters thoroughly. This is right. They give the subjects brought before them a fair, and impartial, and, I think at times, a rigorous investigation. They do nothing more than they conceive to be just and proper. But I can assure this House that any thing that comes out from that committee in relation to the public lands may be implicitly relied on. It will not need much more investigation; as every part of the public domain is measured over and over again, inch by inch, before any decision is given on it.

This, I suppose, is the case with other committees. I presume not to say that any one committee is better than another. I suppose the Committee of Claims give to the subjects before them such investigation as we may confide in.

I know not if the claim now before the House was investigated by the Hon. Mr. Whittlesey, the old chairman of the Committee of Claims. He is absent, and it will not be said to be flattery to his face, to say that he gave these claims that sober and searching investigation which resulted in the truth in almost every instance. There was no man in Congress, when I was a witness to his course, to whom was given more unlimited discretion in the adjustment of these claims. More money passed through his hands, on his own responsibility, than any other person in my knowledge. The present chairman is near me, and it is unbecoming, before him, to speak in his favor.

Politics have nothing to do in this matter. A Whig dollar is the same as a Democratic dollar. The only difference is, that sometimes the Whigs favor shinplasters more than the Democrats. But at this time shinplasters are not in fashion with either party. The conclusion I have come to in these small cases, is to pass them without losing too much time in their discussion. But it is the policy and course of action of both parties in this House, to prostrate and destroy certain measures and principles, that I rise to oppose, and throw my weight, no matter how small it may be, into the opposite scale. I do this at the expense of speaking a little out of order, and to the displeasure, in a small degree, of those who have commenced this crusade against necessary and proper appropriations. I do it for the sake of those whom I represent, and not for myself. Were I to remain silent and see this policy established, I would not be the representative of their interest, which they expected me to be. I would be derilect in my duty to my constituents.

The great and leading objections which are urged against these accustomed, and I think proper, appropriations, are the deranged state of the Treasury and the embarrassments of the country.

These are the grounds, first and last, and all the time, in the mouths of gentlemen that support this policy. Other gentlemen, who are opposed to some of these appropriations on constitutional grounds, think this a most favorable time to urge, with confident hopes of success, their principles and policy, and I am sorry to say, they seem to bid fair to obtain a complete triumph.

I deny not, that in some sections of the Union, money is scarce and difficult to obtain. The people may in some cases stand in need of money to satisfy old debts, and to relieve themselves from embarrassments of long standing; but I lay down this proposition, and will prove it—that the Government of the United States is at the present time in a more sound and solvent condition than it has ever been in since its formation. At no former period has it been so able to exercise such a vigorous and healthy action as it can at this time. If I do not prove this proposition to the satisfaction of all disinterested minds, I never will again address this House on this or any other subject.

The political axiom, "a poor Government and a wealthy people," will be denied by none, and recognised by all. That the Government is poor, is proved by the records, which, the lawyers and others would say, import "absolute verity." This is no disparagement to the Administration of the Government. It is in the situation all Republics should be—the Government poor, and the people in a sound and vigorous condition. I may also remark in this place, Mr. Speaker, that the Government is clear of any debt whatever, and is at peace with all nations. It must also be admitted that the population increases as heretofore, and that the great mass of people have turned their attention to business and habits of industry more than in former times.

I will freely admit that there is not near the quantity of bank paper in circulation in the Union as existed in 1834, '35, and '36.

Facts, "records," and the voice of the people, prove this assertion to the satisfaction of every one. And on this very consideration is the country in a better and more solvent condition than in those years.

If any great calamity had swept over the land; had we been visited by "war, pestilence, and famine," or any such disaster as to destroy the substance of the people, we would thereby be poor indeed. This is not the fact with us. The withdrawal of empty promises to pay will not injure the people. It is depriving them of no substantial wealth. The excess of bank issues is not the substance of the country, and it would be a blessing to the people if such excess would never again return among them.

These promises to pay are as light as chaff, and in many instances even want "a local habitation and a name." An excess of bank paper not only operates as an injury to the people, but is in fact a fraud practised upon the community. The quantity of bank paper in circulation, in 1836, was so great that the interest on it was twenty-eight or thirty millions of dollars per annum. This vast sum of money was paid as interest to the banks, for the use of their paper in circulation, and was a dead loss to the community. This amount of interest is surprising; but it is proved by correct calculations to be true. This sum would afford the annual support of the Government, and furnish means for the necessary appropriations to be made at each session of Congress.

It is not pretended that there is no interest paid at this time for the paper in circulation; but it is not near so much as heretofore. On this consideration, the Government is in a much better and more solvent condition, and better able to make appropriations than at any former period.

Giving this subject a candid and impartial investigation, we must recognise the principle, that it is a blessing to our country rather than an injury, that we have not, as heretofore, a great redundancy of bank paper in circulation. These empty promises are not a blessing, but rather a curse, to the community; and we ought to thank God and ourselves that we have got clear of the excess of paper circulation. The situation of the country is now of that sound and healthy character that induces the citizens to use reasonable exertions, and make corresponding expenditures. The people have abandoned all wild and chimerical speculations, and turned their whole energies to the ordinary and common avocations of life. We see no more wild and extravagant improvements commenced by State Governments, corporations, or individuals. The season of extravagance and speculation has, I hope, passed away forever, and the people again returned to their "sober second thoughts;" to useful and substantial improvement of the country, and other pursuits of equal and lasting benefit to themselves and the community.

Another advantage and great blessing we experience from this condition of the country is the failure to import into the United States the vast quantities of merchandise from foreign countries, as we did in the years of excessive paper circulation. We have, no doubt, a sufficient supply of the necessary articles from foreign markets, and of the surplus and extras, we are blessed to have none. This will teach the people economy, and at the same time urge the propriety to manufacture at home certain articles for themselves.

This course of policy will prevent the accumulation of a vast debt in foreign countries, with which we were heretofore embarrassed. If we collect no revenue from the importation of foreign goods, we are blessed with the exemption of any debt for them; and on this ground we are in a much better situation than we were in former times.

Our country is returning to the ways of economy and prudence, and doing without the useless articles from foreign countries, for which we have been cursed with a foreign debt. A considerable portion of the substance of the land was drained from the United States to foreign countries, to pay our debts. This policy was most ruinous and injurious to the people of the United States. I forced us to pay for useless articles—articles of luxury and extravagance—with our solid substance, which will never again return to us.

In this respect, our country is in a much better situation than in the years which were flooded with paper money. I do not pretent to say there is no individual embarrassment at this time in the United States. I know well there is, to a considerable extent, in some parts of the Union; but this is confined to a small number of individuals, and to particular sections of the country. It is not general throughout the country, so as to be sensibly felt in the operations of the General Government. These small embarrassments arise mostly from debts contracted in the years of paper excitement and speculation. It is the result of the bloated circulation, and of the intoxicated state of society at that time. We are now sobering down from it to labor and economy.

Mr. Speaker, the supposition must be admitted, that these debts were contracted for valuable considerations; and the party owing the debt had an equivalent for such debt, and should pay it. These debts are mostly due their neighbors, the citizens of the United States, and therefore the whole concern is with the Government. It matters not to the Government in whose hands the wealth and substance of the people are, if it be within the power of the Government either to levy a tax direct, or by way of tariff duties. This Government, like all free Governments should do, permits its citizens to carry on individual enterprise in the manner that may suit their own opinions of propriety; and if any should become embarrassed, he must lay the sin at his own door, and use the proper means to extricate himself from it. The General Government cannot interfere in individual cases.

The conclusion seems to me to be irresistible, that, although there may be some individual embarrassment, yet the nation—the aggregate whole—is not embarrassed. The wealth, the substance, and the vigorous enterprise of the people are better and greater than they have been in this Government at any time since its creation.

The real wealth and power of a nation is not alone its wealth on hand; it is not the substance in existence at the time; but it is the capacity of the people to produce, and not to consume more than necessary, that constitutes a vigorous and powerful Government. This is pre-eminently the fact with the American people.

Mr. Speaker, without pursuing this subject any farther, which might be carried down to a political demonstration, I will conclude with the utmost confidence, that the Government of the United States is, at this time, in a more sound, solvent, and vigorous condition than it has been in since its existence; and therefore more able and capable to make all necessary and customary appropriations of money for the necessary objects of Government.

[Mr. MARVIN of New York rose, and observed to the Speaker, that the gentleman from Illinois was out of order. At the same time many voices were heard in the hall, saying go on, go on.]

Mr. REYNOLDS, after a short pause, said, Mr. Speaker, it may be I am out of order; but the reason I have taken occasion, on this subject, to to address the House, is, that I had no opportunity before. I have the greatest respect for my friend, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and for the party with which I act, and as they were anxious that the Treasury Note bill would pass without delay, and without the friends of the Administration delaying it, I refrained from speaking on this subject, when that bill was in the Committee of the Whole. I did not wish to delay, but to expedite the legitimate operations of the Administration in this House. This is the reason I am now before you, Mr. Speaker. As I said before, I consider it my duty to throw my small drop into the bucket as soon as possible to arrest this non appropriation policy.

I am, Mr. Speaker, not at all for a wild and prodigal expenditure of the public money, nor for an extravagant and chimerical system of appropriations. This policy I conceive to be worse than too much retrenchment. I dislike the extremes in either case. A medium policy, which the Government has pursued since its creation, I think is the most wise and proper course to pursue at the present time. This is all I solicit for my constituents, for the Government to pursue the old beaten track, which it has been in since the first days of its existence. This seems to me to be so reasonable, that it is strange one would think to find a man against it.

Mr. Speaker, I have been frequently amused with the various opinions the State Rights party assume in this House. It seems to me that whenever any subject cannot easily be understood, or when it is necessary to have it misunderstood, the doctrine of State Rights is brought into requisition, and the question decided by the science of political abstractions.

As far as I can discover, almost every one in this House is of the State Rights party. There cannot be much difference of opinion amongst intelligent individuals on that plain common sense instrument, the Constitution of the United States If we had no written Constitution, we might honestly entertain a great difference of opinion; but it is impossible, in the case of our form of Government.

I am opposed to any latitudinous construction, which would give to the General Government more power and patronage than were intended by the Constitution; and I am friendly to a strict construction, confining the United States Government to national objects alone. I am a State Rights man, so far as to retain for the State Governments their legitimate power of action. But I am not for giving them all power, by construing the Constitution to death. I am utterly opposed to that construction which will destroy its efficacy and its usefulness, and place it, as a minor, in the cradle, under the exclusive guardianship of the State Rights party. Enlightened public opinion does not confirm this construction. For a series of years, the various tribunals of the country, composed of the first intelligence of the age, have given to this instrument a different construction, and such as will enable the Congress of the United States to make necessary appropriations to advance the commerce of the country, and to complete useful and important works. This construction is not of one or two years' standing; but for a long series, amounting to almost the whole time from the formation of our Government down to the present time. This would show a settled policy and construction, given by men the most wise and learned of that day. I might mention all the Presidents, from the beginning of the Government to the present time, and almost all mankind with them, who have given the power to the General Government, under the Constitution, to make these necessary appropriations. And, Mr. Speaker, will we now change that uniform decision, and abandon these appropriations? Are we become more wise and learned than our predecessors? I do not pretend to it, for my part.

Every individual who respects the peace and order of society, will be pleased at the stability and permanency of the laws, as it respects the right of private property. This is essential as to the value of property and the peace of society; but how much more important is it to have our political rights also made certain and permanent? The value and esteem we will entertain for our political rights will be very much impaired by changing them from time to time; we will be secure and certain in noting, and all things will be floating loose at the mercy of every popular breeze. This is not what the people contemplated, or expected, under a permanent and written Constitution, and a sound administration of it. And I hope they may not be disappointed in their views of a permanent Government.

Mr. Speaker, with this settled policy the country, for the last thirty or for years, has been identified, and has been interwoven with it for weal and for woe. All the political associations and feelings of the people in various sections of the Union have commenced with this policy, and have taken root in it, and have grown with it to the present time. Men have grown gray in the advocacy and support of these principles, and have witnessed the great prosperity of the country under the benign influence of this wise and constitutional policy. And are we, in the West, under our crippled condition, to raise a revenue, to be abandoned, our necessary and important works, to advance our commerce, to be forsaken, and left unfinished, to lose the money already expended on them? Is this the permanency we expected under a written Constitution and a wise administration of it? Are not the improvements of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers important and national works? Is it not important to the commerce of the Western country to purchase out for the Government, and make it free, the Portland and Louisville canal around the Falls of the Ohio? Is it not important to improve the Rapids on the Upper Mississippi, and remove the Red river raft? and many other necessary improvements in the West?

It was supposed to be good and wise policy to make and improve the harbors on the Northern Lakes. The Constitution is the same, and the necessity for the support of commerce is increased, and why not continue the work? The harbor at Chicago is of vital interest to the commerce on Lake Michigan, in the State of Illinois. The improvement has been commenced, and why abandon it? It is unwise and ruinous policy to arrest these useful and important works and let them moulder and decay, when the Government is more able to complete them than it was at any previous time since its creation.

The Cumberland road is also a work of this important character. It seems it was national and constitutional to make it while it was in the old States; but when it was carried west of the Ohio river, its constitutionality was suspected, and its parents are about to give it a stone, when its friends ask for bread to support it.

Mr. Speaker, will the people in the West be reconciled to this course of policy? Will they not expect the ordinary appropriations to complete these important works, as they have been accustomed to receive them for almost an age past? We have been led to believe that this course would be pursued, and have identified our notions and works with it.

I think it is unwise policy to indulge in this rabid and ultra retrenchment, to cripple and cradle the Constitution, and thereby to abandon the settled and wise policy of the country.

I think it my duty to my people, and to my political friends and others in this House, to present my views to them on this subject, and to know, in time to come, that I did my duty. I may again resume the subject at a proper time.

SPEECH OF MR. DUNCAN,

OF OHIO,

In the House of Representatives, March 26, 1840—In Committee of the Whole, on the bill to authorize the issue of Treasury notes.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It was my intention to have let the Opposition do all the talking on this measure, but such has been the spread of misrepresentation of facts, prejudicial to the Administration and all its measures, for political effect, that it becomes my duty, in justice to myself, to make a few remarks, by way of defence. When the Administration is badly and unqualifiedly denounced in every Federal Whig speech made here, as the most corrupt of corruptions, and all its measures as leading to the overthrow of this Government and the destruction of the people's best interests, it becomes a duty—which every member here owes to himself, who is a supporter of the Administration and its measures and principles—to repel such charges. It is in the exercise of this duty I will ask your attention for a short time, as well as to discharge an obligation I feel myself under to the Administration.

The bill now under consideration is one for the relief of the Government. Its very title and the necessity of its existence ought to rally every patriot to its support. What has superinduced its necessity? I answer, the unhappy connection of the Government with the banks. In May, 1837, the banks stopped payment with upwards of thirty millions of the public revenue in their possession, and left the Government without a dollar to perfom its fiscal operations. As a matter of necessity the President called Congress for the purpose of devising ways and means by which the wheels of Government might continue to roll. Congress met. What was to be done? The banks set the Government and all its laws at defiance. The Government held bonds against our importing merchants to the amount of fourteen millions; but no relief was found in this resource, for the banks owned the merchants. I say, what was to be done? Nothing but to use the credit of the Government. How was that to be used? But two plans presented themselves. The one was the issue of Treasury notes to the amount of the wants of the Government, or to apply to the moneyed aristocracy of Europe for a loan. The former was adopted—the entire Democracy voting for and sustaining it against the entire Federal party, who were in favor of the latter.

The act then passed to authorize the issue of Treasury notes, has once or twice been renewed since, from the same necessity, and that is the object of the present bill. I herewith submit an extract from the Treasurer's report, which will illustrate. The Treasurer says:

Thus, as to a permanent deficiency in 1840, the Secretary says:

"The efficient means in that year will then amount, in the aggregate, to	$20,156,385
If Congress should make appropriations to the extent desired by the different Departments, the expenditures for 1840, independent of the redemption of Treasury notes, are estimated at	20,000,000
Including all the Treasury notes to be redeemed, the aggregate expenditure would be about	22,759,000
This would leave a deficit in the Treasury, at the close of the year, amounting to	2,593,315

He then adds, that certain debts are due from the State banks and the United States Bank, which, if paid duly, will prevent a deficit; but that it is not prudent to rely exclusively on the payment of those debts, and hence that other modes of obviating or meeting it are proper. Thus he states:

But there will be due from the United States Bank, in September next, on its fourth bond, about	$2,526,576
The principal now due on the Treasurer's deposites in other banks, which suspended specie payments in 1837, is	1,149,904
Should all these claims be collected in 1840, they would prevent a deficiency, and leave an available balance in the Treasury of nearly	$1,082,865

It is not, however, considered prudent to reply exclusively on the collection of these debts.

One mode, then, of obviating any difficulty from that circumstance, will be to reduce the aggregate of law appropriations, by postponing some, and lessening others, so that the means probably available will be sufficient to meet all calls upon the Treasury, and leave in it an average balance of about two millions."

He then adds, afterwards:

"But, when acting on these or other cases, if Congress cannot, consistently with its views of duty to the country, adopt the course suggested, and restrict the amount of appropriations, whether ordinary or extraordinary, to the certain current revenue, the only remaining courses which seem defensible are these; either to provide for recalling portions of the public money now deposited with States, or establish an adequate system of direct taxation, or at once resort to the contingent power contemplated in the existing laws connerning the tariff, when changes become necessary for purposes of revenue, and restore the duty on several articles of luxury now free."

Thus the Secretary urges action on it in the first half of the year, and assigns his reasons for it:

"All these, and similar considerations in favor of some permanent provision on this subject, apply with still greater force than they have heretofore. The available balance in the Treasury, to facilitate its operations, is much smaller than has formerly been usual. The receipts on the debts still due from banks, after two previous disappointments as to some of them, must be regarded with increased doubt; and if they should be paid within the coming year, the outstanding Treasury notes become redeemable in the first half of it, and must be discharged some months before the bond of the Bank of the United States falls due in September."

In conclusion, he adds:

"The Department, therefore, is now without any resort, temporary or permanent, in case of ma erial deficiencies, and considering all the circumstances before mentioned, with the dangerous liability in law to have the whole outstanding Treasury notes paid in at any moment for public dues, without a power remaining to issue others in their stead; considering also the present revulsion in the commercial world, which affects so seriously the receipts from both duties and lands; considering the disasters which are befalling the banks, and rendering our collected funds in some cases wholly unavailable, and the advances necessary to be soon made for the large payment of pensions, and Treasury notes falling due in March, the earliest attention to new legislation on this subject seems highly prudent, if not indispensable, for the effectual security of the public credit."

But, sir, notwithstanding this plain, honest, and unsophisticated statement of the finances of the Government and the necessity of this measure, which is a part of the Secretary's report, and plainly hinted at in the President's message, the President and the Secretary have been charged, in the face of these facts, with attempting to gull and deceive the people by withholding, in the message and report, the real state of the finances. What is there too reckless for these modern Whigs to do? Sir, I have presented the expose of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is sufficient for my purpose to show the necessity of the issue of the amount of Treasury notes for which it provides. An intelligent community will appreciate the importance and necessity of the measure. It has been objected to on constitutional grounds. This objection I will leave to those who assume to themselves the peculiar and exclusive guardianship of the Constitution—to those whose political monomania is so well understood, that the Constitution has as little to fear from them as the community has to fear from the prophetic predictions of the lunatic pining in the last stages of refined metaphysical abstraction.

This bill has been in Committee of the Whole House for nearly two weeks. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, at its introduction, made a short explanatory speech. Another of the committee [Mr. VANDERPOEL] made a short speech of the same character. These are all the Democratic speeches that have been made in its behalf. The balance of the whole time has been consumed by the Whigs.

In the discussion, every measure of the Administration has been seized on and made the subject of unmeasured abuse; to all of which I will not now attempt to respond. I will wait for the action of the House upon another measure shortly to be before it, (I mean the Independent Treasury;) and I will now confine my remarks to the subject of the Florida war.

In the remarks which I am about to make, I may use language which may be considered unbecoming this place; if so, it must be charged to the unlimited abuse and reckless denunciations which we hear every day and every hour from the Opposition, and which we, the Administration, and the whole Democratic party, are the subjects of; and this is all the apology I have to make.

But to the Florida war.

Mr. Chairman, I take it for granted that an attempt will be made to convert every measure of the Administration, now before the country, of a general character, as well as those of a special nature, more immediately connected with the Administration of the Government, into political capital. This, the Opposition have a political right to do. I suppose if I were a Federalist, and as hard run as they are, I would do so too. At a time when the financial circumstances of Sparta were greatly embarrassed, a person offered Callicratidas (her principal commander) 50,000 crowns, under such circumstances as Callicratidas thought dishonorable to Sparta, and he refused to accept it; upon which Cleander, one of his officers, said, "I would accept the offer if I were in your place;" 'and so would I if I were in yours," said Callicratidas. I suppose if I possessed the same principles that govern them, I would take the same means which they do to carry them out. If the Federalists have a political right to thwart the Administration in all its measures, right or wrong, and to use all means, fair and foul, to bring it into disrepute with the people at home, and dishonor and disgrace abroad, such a right is not exercised in patriotism, nor is it founded in honor or justice; and while they are exercising, in base and unmanly abuse, a privilege which finds a political right in the free institutions of our country, rather than in the pure principles of justice or manly and honorable resistance, I hold the friends of this Administration will find an apology with the people who support it, in using a part of their time and means in repelling the charges which constitute the political capital of the Opposition. Among the many measures furnishing charges (as is pretended) of corruption and profligacy against the Administration, none seems to be more fruitful than the Florida war. Every Whig in the country, however unacquainted he may be with the Florida war, its causes, its progress, the difficulties attending its management, or the means the Administration have or have not had to terminate it, takes the cue from this Capitol, and yelps extravagance, disgrace, imbecility, and profligacy. Yes, sir, the veriest coxcomb that ever strutted in buckram, or represented the brainless dandy, who never heard a musket shot, or saw an Indian, can chatter the failures of the Florida war, and pronounce sentence upon the Administration and the War Department, with all the pertness of a well taught parrot; and from this Capitol proceeds their lessson.

Well, sir, while the Opposition are denouncing the Administration in broad and unqualified terms, without defining causes, or giving reasons for the procrastination of the war, for the benefit of those who may read me, I will ask your attention a short time, while I briefly trace some of the difficulties which the Administration have had to encounter in Florida.

Florida is situated between the 25th and 31st degrees of north latitude. It is bounded on the south and west in its whole extent by the Gulf of Mexico, and on the east by the Atlantic ocean, in its whole extent on that side. It is near four hundred miles in length, and its average breadth is near one hundred and fifty miles. It presents a surface nearly level, made up of everglades, lakes, swamps, barren pine lands, and hammocks, with some good and well situated land; of each of these varieties nearly an equal quantity. The swamps are almost impassable, and the hammocks almost impenetrable to any human being, except an Indian.

Within the half century of the time when all Europe was waked up by the discovery of the New World, and when men dreamed of nothing but carving out provinces by the sword, of dividing the spoils of empires, plundering temples of their riches, riding upon the billows with loads of enslaved captives, and despoiling nations of their wealth and Governments, or "to plunder the accumulated treasures of some ancient Indian dynasty." I say it was about this time, or in 1512, that Juan Ponce de Leon, an adventurer of Spain, discovered Florida, and, in the name of Ferdinand, made Spain its owner. Ponce, as a reward for his discovery, was made its Governor, on condition that he would colonize it. Some time after this dignity was conferred upon him, he repaired, with two ship loads, to take possession of his new province, and select a site for a colony. He had not more than landed, when his crew were attacked by the Florida Indians, many of his men killed, and himself mortally wounded. He and the remainder of his men hastened to the ships, and sailed to Cuba, where he died of his wounds.

The next attempt to colonize Florida was made in 1528, by Pamphelo de Navarez. He entered Florida with three hundred men, some of whom were mounted. He was attacked by the Indians, and but five escaped, all the rest of whom fell a sacrifice to the Indians, pestilence, or famine. The love of discovery, plunder, and wealth, still raged, nor did all these disasters prevent another attempt to seek fortunes in Florida. Ferdinand de Soto, an ambitious courtier, embarked with seven or eight hundred troops (some of whom were mounted) and emigrants. No sooner were they landed than the Indians made them a sacrifice to their cunning, by leading them through swamps, everglades, and hammocks, scarcely passable or penetrable, in search of gold, until they were sunk with fatigue, and lost in the wilderness; but, stimulated with prospects, they were led still further, until they were beyond the province, and yet no gold; but the Peruvian prospects led them high in the regions of the Red river, but famine and pestilence compelled them to retrace their march to the Mississippi, where, when they arrived, scarce one third of their number were alive, and, with some frail and temporary boats of hasty construction, they reached the Gulf of Mexico, where they were accidentally picked up, and taken to Cuba.

Another attempt was made, with more religious solemnity, to settle Florida, in 1547. Through the influence of Philip, then heir apparent to the crown of Spain, Louis Caneello, a missionary of the Dominican order, gained permission to visit Florida, and attempt the peaceful and Christian conversion of the natives. All the Governors of the Spanish colonies were directed to favor the undertaking. All means that were calculated to advance the measure were advised. The slaves that had been taken north of the Gulf of Mexico were manumitted and restored to their country. A ship was fitted out, and the holy crew dismissed with more than usual solemnity; but Louis had no sooner landed, than he and a fellow priest, with several of his crew, were slaughtered. Florida was abandoned. It seemed as if Death made the avenues of Florida his abode, and guarded its shores. While Victory perched upon the Castilian standard every where else, the sands of Florida were perpetually wet with Spanish blood.

The French turned their attention to Florida, and planted a colony, by a commission from Charles IX. The squadron which bore them was commanded by John Rebault, a brave man, of maritime experience. They were landed, but remained but a short time, and, in their retreat, came near famishing on the ocean. After the treacherous peace between Charles IX. and the Huguenots, Coligny pushed his solicitations for the colonization of Florida. The king gave his consent; three ships were conceded for the service, and Laudonniery, who had been on a former voyage on the American coast, was appointed to lead forth the colony. Sixty days of favorable wind landed them on the shores of Florida. The benefits of the new colony of Huguenots was enjoyed but a short time, when the jealousy of Spain was aroused. Melendez was appointed and commissioned by Philip II, king of Spain, to invade Florida, and dispossess the Huguenots—and himself made Governor of the territory. He was accordingly fitted out with the requisite force, munitions and supplies. A tempestuous voyage landed him, with most of his forces, at the harbor of St. Augustine. Soon the Huguenots were attacked and massacred in a manner of which I shall not now shock humanity with a description, but which, for barbarity and cold blooded inhumanity, has not its parallel in the annals of savage or civilized warfare, except in the heart-sickening scenes of blood and indiscriminate slaughter which have marked the Florida war. This last invasion secured Spain in the possession of Florida, and her blood-stained troops, who intermarried with the natives, became her occupants. Their blood now flows in the veins of those with whom we were battling. The French court paid but little attention to that brutal and inhuman slaughter of the Huguenots. But the French nation and the Huguenots of France did not share in the apathy of the court. Dominic de Gourgues, a bold solder of Gascony, by his own means and some contributions of his friends, fited out three vessels, and with a force of one hundred and fifty, sailed for Florida. He did not expect with this force to occupy the country permanently; his object was revenge. He surprised two forts and took a number of prisoners, but finding himself unable to maintain his position, he hung his prisoners upon the trees and placed over them the inscription: "I do not this as unto Spaniards and mariners, but as unto traitors, robbers and murderers;" and hastily sailed for Europe. Some short time before the commencement of the Revolutionary war, an Englishman by the name of Turnbull brought a vessel loaded with Greeks to Florida, under a promise that they should be provided with a home, but who, as soon as landed, were reduced to slavery, and consigned to the sugar farms. A part of them made their escape into the interior, and found a safe retreat among the Indians, with whom they intermarried. A part of them were restored to liberty by the interference of Pilican, whose name a creek now on the Atlantic side of Florida bears. Florida has long been the retreat and asylum of negro slaves; they have long found protection by the Indians, with whom they intermarry, and their offspring now make a part of the savages of that Territory.

Spain, it is well known, was largely indebted to the United States for spoliations committed upon American commerce. Our claims were liquidated by a cession of Florida, by what is known to be the Spanish treaty, signed and confirmed July 10th, 1821, which is recognised substantially as follows:

"Whereas, by the treaty concluded between the United States and Spain on the 22d day of February, 1819, and duly ratified, the provinces of the Floridas were ceded by Spain to the United States, and the possession of the said provinces is now in the United States."

By this treaty, I say, Florida became a Territory of the United States; and by the provisions of the treaty the Federal Government was, and is, the exclusive owner of the soil, and holds the same in fee simple, except such portions as were owned and occupied by citizens, pursuing civilized cultivation; and they, by that treaty, became citizens of the United States, and were bound and protected by their laws. The kingdom of Spain had a right to occupy Florida by the laws of nations: and, having the right to occupy, had the right to convey, and did convey. The United States, by the laws of nations, had the right to purchase, and did purchase. The conveyance was full and unconditional, as appears by the whole treaty, and every part thereof; in consequence of which the United States forthwith extended her jurisdiction over the whole territory. But it is said and asserted by the Indians that the Spanish agent assured them, through their chiefs, that it was not the intention of the Spanish Government to cede any portion of Florida to the United States, except what was then occupied by those pursuing the occupations of civilized life, nor one acre "on this side" of the furrow of the plough share. Such an exception may have been made with the Indians; if so, it was a fraud practised on them by the Spaniards, or their agent; but, as they were no party to the contract, and the United States having had no part in the promised reservation, consequently their right to the exclusive jurisdiction to the whole territory and their freehold in the soil is absolute.

But the right of the United States to the freehold of Florida does not depend upon the cession of Spain, the right of occupancy by conquest, nor the arbitrary laws of nations. The Federal Government purchased from the Florida Indians, in 1823, upwards of three millions of acres, for which the sum of one hundred and six thousand dollars was paid; and in 1834, four million thirty-two thousand six hundred and forty acres, for which the sum of two hundred and ninety-five thousand five hundred dollars was paid.

The possession of the United States to the territory, and jurisdiction over it, seemed to be undisputed until 1835, when the supposed claims of the Indians were asserted by some of those barbarous outrages and cold-blooded murders which have signalized the Florida war from its beginning to this time.

Now, sir, I am prepared to respond to some of the charges made against the Administration, and particularly against the War Department, for the manner in which this war has been conducted, its procrastination, the millions it has cost the Government, and the alleged imbecility of some of the officers who have had charge of it. I have before stated, and I now say, that all these charges are made for political effect—made to blast the reputation of the Administration, to sink the cause of Democracy, and advance the Federal cause; and in character and concert with the never-ceasing torrent of slander and reckless abuse which has been poured upon every Democratic Administration, from the days of Jefferson to this time, and will be continued, while the Democracy sways the Government. I mean what I say, and I say what I mean. I will now ask your attention, while I present the history and practical operations of the Florida war; the nature of the country, which is its theatre; the character of the enemy with whom we are contending, and the embarrassments under which the Executive and the War Department have had to labor.

I have stated that the Florida war broke out late in 1835. It will be remembered, at that time we were threatened with a war with France. The time had arrived when our claims upon France for spoliations could no longer be deferred, without subjecting ourselves to the charge of national degradation and submissive cowardice. General Jackson, who then administered the Government, was compelled, in his message on that subject, to recommend reprisals on French vessels and French property, as the only means of redress left. This was a virtual declaration of war; a reciprocal declaration of war on the part of France, or a liquidation of our claims, was the only alternative left her. To her national honor, and the cause of justice, she chose and fulfilled the latter; but while she was contemplating the course she should take, war hung over our heads, and at the same time the Indian war was raging in Florida. The Administration was denounced from Maine to Florida by every corrupt Federal sheet and every Federal strut in the land, for not subduing the enemy in Florida, and for not defending the poor Floridians from the merciless tomahawk and the torch of the Indian—when it was well known by every intelligent man in the Union, and acknowledged by every honest one, that the safety and the interest of the nation demanded that the whole force of the American troops should be kept on the seaboard so long as the French war threatened us. What was the trying situation of the Administration then, sir? While every Federal demagogue and every bank pensioned sheet was denouncing it for not sending troops to Florida, the safety and dignity of the nation forbade it. The candid, though honest, acknowledgment of its inability to do so, was prevented by a laudable and necessary national pride; and the Administration was prohibited the exercise of a just and what would have been a triumphant defence against the vile calumnies of the times; for, had the Administration, or its supporters, acknowledged its inability to withdraw troops from the seaboard to defend our frontier from the barbarity of the Indians, it would have been a virtual acknowledgment of our inability to contend with France in the war in which we were about to embark, and which we ourselves had virtually declared; and France would not have failed to have taken advantage of our acknowledged weakness. Sir, I say if such an acknowledgment had been made by the Administration, our claims on France would be now unliquidated, and we would, at this day, in all probability, be in the midst of a war with her. But an acknowledgment, which was due in justice to the Administration.

Our Government is one of limited powers. The Executive of our Government is an officer, bound by limitations. He is not a Russian autocrat, with a standing army of six hundred thousand regular troops, and with power to order as many more, and with power to raise the means to maintain them. No, sir, our Constitution provides "that the President be Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States." The power to declare war, raise armies, and to maintain them, belongs to Congress, and not to the President. So far as legislation is concerned, the President is but a co-ordinate branch of Congress, and his positive powers are confined to the signing of bills which may pass the Senate and House of Representatives—his negative powers consist in withholding his signature, and that power avails him nothing should a bill pass both popular branches of Congress by a vote of two-thirds of each branch. This is the amount of power the President has in raising and maintaining armies. What was the Administration to do at the time I am speaking? Threatened with war by France; actually involved in war in Florida, and the unstoyed tomahawk performing, in savage barbarity, the work of death; beset with slander and falsehood by every unprincipled, corrupt newspaper sheet, and every unprincipled Federal coxcomb demagogue in the land; without the power to preserve the country, or resist the enemy; and without the power (in prudent exercise) of justifying itself against the base slanders heaped upon it, by declaring its want of ability; what, I ask, was the Executive to do? Why, there was but one duty for him to perform; but one power for him to exercise; and that duty and that power was prescribed by the Constitution, as follows:

He (the President) shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

This duty and this power was exercised. The Executive, through the Secretary of War, early in 1835 made a communication to the Senate, in which he set forth the embarrassments of the country, with reference to our foreign dangers, and the war in Florida, and in which he urged upon Congress the importance and indispensable necessity of augmenting the army. This message was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, of which the honorable R. M. Johnson was chairman. The necessity of the measure was properly appreciated by the committee and the Senate, and a bill to increase the army was reported, and passed by the Senate It went to the House, but did not receive its action. The same measure was urged upon Congress by the Executive at its next session; it was again referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and a bill to augment the army reported; and passed by the Senate, but failed in the House. Thus was the Executive thwarted in obtaining the means by which the Florida war would, in all probability, have been instantly suppressed, and much innocent blood, and many millions of money been saved; and yet the reckless and demagogical cry of imbecility and extravagance is raised by one universal Federal yelp against the Administration, for that which Congress failed to put in its power to do.

I now proceed to expose the policy pursued in relation to the Florida war, which will account for the useless expenditure of millions, the procrastination of the war, and the heartsickening shed of blood, human slaughter, and destruction of property, and a policy, too at war, with every effort of the Executive and the War Department of this Government; an exposition which, I think, the intelligent reader will understand and appreciate, and will know where, and on whom, to lay the blame of all our failures and misfortunes in the Florida war.

As soon as our difficulties with France were settled, the United States troops were ordered to Florida, or so many of them as were not necessary to remain with our fortifications. But the number was insufficient. Congress had failed to augment the regular army. No other course was left for the Executive but to make drafts upon the militia for volunteers. This was done at a most frightful expense, and frequently resulted in little more than marching and countermarching—that is, marching to Florida and marching back again, such was the limited time for which they volunteered, and such the distance they had to march.

I will enumerate some of those marches.

In January, 1836, when the news of Dade's massacre reached New Orleans, General Gaines raised a corps of volunteers, and, united with a few regulars, marched them from Louisiana to Florida, where they served until the ensuing May, when they were marched back to their homes, and discharged.

In the month of February of that year, two armies of volunteers and militia, between three and four thousand strong, were raised by General Scott, one in South Carolina and Georgia, the other in Alabama, and marched to Florida, where they served about sixty days, and were then marched back and discharged.

In the month of June following, a brigade of mounted volunteers was organized in Tennessee, and put in march for Florida. It halted a while in the Creek country, and entered Florida late in September, where it served until December, when its term of service expired, and it then took up the line of march on its return to Tennessee, in the midst of the campaign then in progress.

The departure of the Tennessee volunteers for home at a critical period of the campaign, imposed upon the commanding General the necessity of calling upon Georgia and Alabama for another contribution; and accordingly, a corps of volunteers was again organized in each of those States, and marched from thence into Florida, where they served about three months, when they likewise commenced their return march to their homes.

In the fall of 1837, the Executive made a very energetic effort to close the war during the then approaching winter; and a large force of volunteers was drawn from Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, Louisiana, and Mississippi, in the hope of effecting that object. They arrived in December, and served through the winter, when they were marched back to their remote homes, and discharged.

From this brief review, it is seen that as many as five volunteer armies, from first to last, have been raised, organized, and marched from distant parts to Florida, to serve two or three months, and then marched back to their homes. I have no means of knowing the precise number thus mustered into service, and then mustered out again, but from what information I have been able to gather, the whole number was not less than twenty thousand, exclusive of the Florida militia who were in the country.

Now, sir, when we consider that the expenses of militia and volunteers commence under the law, (see act of 20th April, 1818,) the moment they leave their homes, even while marching to the rendezvous, and continue until they are marched back again to the same place, I ask, can there be any wonder with the honest and reflecting mind, that such operations as I have described should have been expensive, more especially when it is considered that scarcely any but mounted volunteers can be obtained, and these, including their horses and forage, cost, I am informed, near six times as much as regular foot soldiers.

The commanding general is responsible for the expenses incurred by the operations of the army, after it is placed in the field under his command. The Executive is responsible for the judicious application of the means placed at his disposal by Congress to carry on war. But Congress is clearly responsible for the inadequacy or unfitness of those means, and for all the consequences resulting therefrom, especially if the recommendations of the Executive have been disregarded or overruled, as they have been throughout the Florida war.

If, then, it be true, as I think it is, and as every man will think who will examine the subject, that the heavy expenses of the Florida war have resulted chiefly from the employment of volunteers and militia, instead of regular troops, the responsibility for those expenses clearly attaches to Congress, rather than to the Executive, or to the subordinate officers acting under the Executive authority.

The army was increased in July, 1838, since which, there have been but few volunteers or militia employed, and none drawn from a distance. The consequences have been, that the expenses of the war have been greatly reduced, as an examination will show. The expenses of the last campaign have been any thing but extravagant, the force being nearly all regulars.

Sir, I feel myself bound here to speak of the services of Colonel T. Cross, who has had charge of the quartermaster department in Florida during the last campaign. That officer has distinguished himself in that capacity as he has in every other official station which he has held under the Government. It is due to him to say that he has been the practical agent, by which the system of reform, regularity and retrenchment, has been adopted in the conduct of the army in Florida, by which not less than from two to three hundred thousand dollars have been saved to the Government within the last year. I submit his circular, which I ask may be read, and I regret that its length will preclude its admission in my printed remarks. The plan contained in this circular, was the plan of the Executive and of the War Department, but he was the active agent who produced its practical results, that have and will save to the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars. I hope this circular may find its way in the columns of every honest newspaper in the country. I think it would have the effect to stop the mouth of many a barking Whig whiffet. It will be seen by this circular, as well as by its results, that every means have been adopted that could be adopted without impairing the efficiency of the service, to retrench expenditures and secure economy. Sir, it is almost incredible to those unacquainted with the almost entire destitution of resources in Florida, the expenses that the Government has had to incur in the conduct of the war. At the commencement of the war, and for some time thereafter, the Government was compelled to pay for the hire of a steamboat, per day, from three to four hundred dollars—and, I believe, in many instances, defray the expenses of the boat—and, I think, in some instances, had to pay as high as forty-five dollars a cord for wood. Steamboats were not used for any other purpose than the transportation of troops and munitions of war, and never for that purpose when it could be avoided; still, such were the pressing necessities for a speedy transportation of troops, that such expenses had to be incurred, and such means of conveyance adopted. Provisions, forage, and labor of every description, bore an almost corresponding price. But these, sir, are only some of the difficulties and embarrassments with which the Government have had to contend. I have more and greater to speak of, but I must first respond to some of the more special charges made upon the Administration, both in this and the other branch of this Capitol. Emphatic complaints are made of the want of energy in the War Department; and it is now urged upon Congress to adopt some decisive action to bring this war to a close, and that some more efficient means than that adopted by the Executive should have been adopted by the last Congress. Sir, I will agree that Congress, long before this, should have adopted "some more efficient means." Congress should have, in compliance with the recommendation of the President in 1836, increased the number of the regular army; but it was enough that it was a measure of the Administration to enlist the whole Opposition against it. But, sir, Congress did do something "efficient," and so efficient as to thwart the whole operations of the War Department; for it is well known that the most active and efficient measures had been adopted and were in operation by the War Department, and were in progress of execution in Florida when they were arrested by the action of Congress * If Congress had not interfered and directed that renewed efforts to pacify that country, and to reconcile the Seminoles, should be made, the military operations would have been prosecuted with vigor, and in all probability the murders and depredations which were the fruits of that injudicious attempt at negotiation, would have been avoided, so that the bloodshed and treachery which is so often charged upon the War Department, were the work, not of that Department, but the work of Congress, or were occasioned by the fact that the attention of those who make these charges were unfortunately "directed" to the war in Florida. Sir, to the constant cry of the Opposition, that this war has continued so long, and that it will still continue, unless Congress give it their attention, I would say it will still continue, unless Congress cease to give it their attention, and cease to interfere with the military operations by efforts to make peace, which will ever prove abortive. A member of the Senate [Mr. PRESTON] says: "It was thought that the few straggling warriors would yield at once to the mere demonstration of force by the General Government. Under this delusion the late Administration terminated, and the present Administration came in." That was not so: when the late Administration came in, the commanding general believed the war to be over, and so informed the War Department. The commanding general had good reason to believe so, and was justifiable in so reporting, as I will show before I am done. But he was soon undeceived by one of those signal acts of treachery which have distinguished the conduct of the Indians in Florida throughout the whole progress of this war. Upon the receipt of this news, preparations upon an extensive scale were immediately made to renew the contest, with greater means and energy than had been before adopted, or ever exhibited in the warfare of this country. In short, nothing within the power and means of the Executive, or the power of the War Department, was left undone. And it is said "that the dilatory progress of the war, not to say the disgrace of it, was chiefly owing to the impotency of the head of the War Department" Sir, such a charge can only proceed from a shameful disregard of truth, or an unpardonable ignorance of the facts and history of the Florida war on the part of him who makes it; and nothing but the obligations of order and decorum that govern the conduct of one branch of this Legislature towards the other, prevents me from alluding, by name, to the individual who made it †

* When General Taylor was actively and successfully engaged in scouring the country, and driving the Indians from the swamps and hammocks where they had concealed themselves, defeating, killing, and taking them prisoners, or dispersing them, wherever he found them, Congress arrested his operations by providing that peaceable measures should be adopted by the War Department, and Gen. Macomb was directed to proceed to Florida to carry into effect the direction of Congress; all of which resulted in a complete failure.

Now, Sir, what are the facts? The officers who conducted the operations in Florida during the first and second campaigns, called, some for fifteen hundred, others for three thousand, men, as a force that would be required to finish the war; and General Scott thought it would require five thousand men, and he made his short campaign with that number; but when the War Department became aware that hostilities were to be renewed, the "impotent" head of that Department [Mr. Poinsett] thought it advisable to augment that force to ten thousand men. He never labored under the delusion "that the straggling warriors of Florida were to be subdued by a mere demonstration of force." He knew their strength, and was aware of the difficulties presented by the peculiar nature of the country, and of the climate. He at once determined to increase the forces to be employed in Florida above all former estimates. Ten thousand men were sent into Florida, and afterwards distributed by placing two thousand in posts, and eight thousand were employed in scouring the country; and no army in the world was ever better supplied and subsisted.

These were the the peculiar duties of "the head of the War Department," and they were most effectually performed on his part. It is said that the late President [General Jackson] would have dragged, as with a net, the Territory of Florida, if he had been been aware of the real state of affairs. General Jackson and all his measures, while he was in office, were as bitterly and as recklessly assailed, by the present Opposition, as Mr. Van Buren and his measures now are; and the compliment is only bestowed upon General Jackson for base and selfish party purposes, that Mr. Van Buren may be disgraced. The force which Mr. Poinsett put into Florida was not sufficient to drag a territory of more than forty-five thousand square miles, "as with a net;" but it proved sufficient to kill, capture, and send out of the country, more than three thousand of the enemy, and nearly all the negroes, who were the most active and formidable of their warriors.

The force sent to Florida that year by the Secretary of War, consisted of regulars, Indian warriors from the Northwest, hunters and guides, and the bravest of the brave from Missouri, Alabama, Georgia, and Tennessee, mounted men, the courage, activity, and chivalry of the country. They did their duty, and beat the enemy whenever they met them; and by the battle of Okochobee, totally changed the character of the contest. Since that action, the Indians have never made fight in masses. They were beaten and dispersed, and never again assembled in sufficient numbers to attack our troops. They continued, however, their murderous assaults upon our defenceless settlements; and, broken up into small parties, prowled over the country like beasts of prey, killing women and children, and destroying, by fire, houses and barns—marking their progress with devastation and desolation. In this stage of the contest, and in this state of the opposing forces, it is demanded by gentlemen here, in "powdered wigs," perfumed cologne, and white gloves, in the warm and secure halls of this Capitol, with the comfortable per diem of eight dollars, that "the war should be prosecuted effectually, and prosecuted at once;" and gentlemen here, who would, like Cleon, flee at the approach of the tomahawk, promise plans by which the Florida war may at "once be terminated." Well, sir, while gentlemen who are better qualified to stand by the toilet, or whirl the belle in the giddy waltz, than to stand by their country in danger, or perform the duties of a soldier in the swamps and hammocks of Florida, are preparing their plan, by which "an end may at once be put to the war." We will examine what has been done, and the probable reasons which induced the Secretary of War to change the manner of conducting the war, if war it can now be called.

From the opinion I entertain of the Secretary of War, and, I presume, the opinion generally entertained of him, from the distinguished manner in which he has discharged every official duty imposed upon him, if he supposed the war could be speedily terminated by bringing the whole force of the United States, he would have adopted that course, (did he control the means.) But he appears, on the contrary, to be convinced that to multiply the militia forces in that country, and to attempt to "drag it as with a net," would only result in exhausting the Treasury, (a much wished for event by some gentlemen here,) and entailing upon the Government interminable claims for losses and pensions. But it is said, "we owe it to humanity and civilization to close this war at once." None are more sensible of that than are the Executive and the head of the War Department; but they do not believe it is to be accomplished by covering the country with troops, unless every square mile were occupied, which would require over forty-five thousand troops. The Secretary of War believes it to be a work of time, and that it is to be wrought out by regulars, aided by a small militia force, and by a body of men trained as regulars and hunters. Every effort of the Executive and the head of the War Department has been marked with well directed judgment; and all the success that could be expected has been accomplished, from the means with which they had to act, the character of the enemy with which they have had to contend, and the face of the country which is the theatre of war. The Secretary of War, it will be seen, ordered General Taylor to direct all his efforts to protect the settlements in Middle Florida, and effectually clear the Indians out of that portion of the Territory, before he proceeded to scour the country south. General Taylor performed that duty; but it is thought he proceeded south too soon, and, on his march south, the Indians rose up, or passed into his rear, and committed murders and depredations there. He then returned, districted the country, and planted posts in each district, and was successfully prosecuting his operations, when Congress arrested them, as I have before described. The interference of Congress produced treachery and bloodshed, and paralyzed the movements of the army. After the interference of Congress proved abortive, that gallant army resumed, and is now engaged in hunting up the murderers, and driving them across the Suwanee, that the inhabitants of Middle Florida may cultivate their fields in peace. The country will then again be districted, posts again be established, and if the plan of the Secretary of War be adopted by Congress, one thousand men, armed, equipped, and drilled, for the express service, will be employed in scouring the swamps between the posts, and securing the settlers from invasion. In this manner, it is believed, the contest with these savages may be brought to a close. If unnecessary millions have been spent in this war, it has been done by attempting to carry out plans of Congress, both by its interference with the War Department, and by its failure to augment the regular army on the recommendation of the Executive, at a time when the Indians were strong in their own belief, when they were concentrated in large bodies, and when one or two battles, with an efficient force, would have decided the contest. But the policy of Congress has been otherwise, and the result as the Executive and the head of the War Department anticipated. There is no good reason why vast and expensive armies, to subdue what can now only be called an insurrection, should be raised, to subdue and conquer a few wild wandering savages, whom a single regiment could cut entirely off, in an open field fight, but whom to destroy at once, with their advantages of swamps, hamocks, everglades, and secret passes, in which they conceal themselves by day, but are almost inaccessible and impenetrable to civilized man, would require a force equal in number to every square mile of territory. The Secretary of War has discovered the errors in the plans suggested of bringing this contest to a close, and has wisely concluded that it can be better and more securely effected by the means he is now employing than by any other.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware in the coming political campaign, that every means will be used by the Opposition to turn what they please to call the failure of the Administration to terminate the Florida war, to overthrow the powers that be; misrepresentation and falsehood will be bandied by every Federal Whig, tapeseller, coxcomb, and pettifogger in the land; and every Bank pensioned sheet will teem with slander and abuse about the failure to put down the Indians in Florida. This must be expected. It is perfectly in character with the Federal party. It is the kind of game they have been playing ever since the commencement of the Government, to the end that Democracy may be prostrated, and its supporters put down, and Federalism established, and its advocates and supporters put into office. In this the Federalists of this country are not singular. It is the way with every faction in every country which has a Republican Government. Nor does the object of the Federal party here, differ from the enemies of human liberty elsewhere; the same motives govern them all over the world, and at all times. There is no course that the Administration could have taken, that would have saved it from the censure of a faction determined to be satisfied with nothing short of the downfall of the Democratic party, and the prostration of the Democratic institutions of our country. If the Administration had been successful in cutting off every Seminole murderer in Florida, and exterminating that barbarous race, whose whole course and conduct in this conflict have been marked in blood and indiscriminate slaughter, why, the Federal party would have instantly turned into a humane and "peace" party, as was the case in the last war with Great Britain, and the vengeance of God would have been invoked to avenge the blood that this Administration had brought upon this nation. If the Administration had been so successful as to have taken every Seminole Indian by capture, without shedding the blood of one, and transplanting them in the far West, why, sir, this land would now be filled with Federal tears and Federal mourning, at the sacrilegious crime of tearing the poor Indians from their native homes and their father's graves, as was the case when the Georgia Indians were moved west of the Mississippi, and many a fervent prayer would have ascended from the sacred altar to revenge the injuries and violence done the poor Seminoles. But as it is, there will not be a Federal parrot but will take its cue from the party orators here, and will be heard to prattle, "the Florida war was begun in extravagance, conducted in weakness, and must end in disgrace." But, sir, the Executive and the head of the War Department are not the only officers whose reputations are to be blighted by the sirocco breath of foul faction and polluted Federalism. The distinguished and gallant Jesup must be its victim also. Sir, if we could see some of the popinjay Federal dandies, who undertake to prescribe the "plans" by which the Florida war is to be terminated, enter the swamps of Florida, and face a group of Seminoles, I think it would be a Cleon affair. At a time when the Athenians were hard pressed by the enemy at home, with whom they were then engaged, in addition to difficulties from abroad, the domestic tranquillity of Greece was disturbed by the ambition of Cleon and Bracedes, who were both advocates of war, and the former never failed to do whatever could be done to foment it. Cleon was desirous of war, because it served to screen his base immoralities and corrupt vices; Bracides, because it added new lustre to his reputation, as no general was more successful than he.

Cleon, like some of the demagogues of our day, was constantly in the habit of denouncing the officers of state and of the army as impotent and unfit for the duties of the stations they held. All the failures in battle were attributed by him to imbecility and mismanagement; charges thus made against the commanding officers, brought upon him the indignation and contempt of many reflecting and valuable citizens, while it raised him in the estimation of others less reflecting. This difference of opinion of the character and conduct of Cleon, produced two parties. The friends of Cleon presented him as a candidate for General, to take charge of the troops. His party proved the strongest, and he was elected. He gained some credit soon after by taking Sphacteria, more by accident than either conduct or courage, which raised him prodigiously in his own estimation, and made him insupportably haughty. He was now to command the troops which were to oppose Brasidas, the Lacedemonian General, who commanded the city of Amphipolis. The time came when the city was to be attacked, and now the man was to be tried who had found the failure of every battle that the Atheneans had lost, in the weakness or cowardice of her generals. Cleon marched his troops near the city wall. Bracides neither showed himself nor did he even permit one of his sentinels to be seen. Cleon retired, exulting that Bracides was afraid to give him battle. The next day he marched his troops to the very gates of Amphipolis, when suddenly Bracides, with his troops, rushed upon the Athenean troops. Cleon took flight at the first approach of the enemy, and in his flight a soldier shot a dart into his back. He soon sunk and expired. Sir, I think if some of our modern Whig generals in buckram, were to go to Florida, we would hear of Cleons wounded in the back, if they should fail to have the heels of the Seminoles. But, sir, I will not ask my readers to take my word for the merits due to Gen. Jesup and others that I might name, for services in the Florida war. I have too much confidence in the intelligence and research of the American people to attempt naked assertions upon their credulity, without either reason, history, or facts. I know, sir, whole speeches are made up here of naked assertions and shameless exaggeration, and spread far and wide for political deception. Such a course may suit that class of politicians, one of whose fundamental principles is a denial of intelligence, stability, and virtue, to the mass of the people. Such efforts generally find their reward in the contempt of the public, whom it is intended to deceive.

I will, therefore, ask your attention while I specify some of the duties performed by some of the commanding officers who have had charge, from time to time, of the Florida war. This, I am aware, I shall do very imperfectly, for I am without the proper light upon the subject, there being no regular history of the Florida war. But while I know I shall fail to do justice to all, I will try to do injustice to none.

I have hinted at the cause of the Florida war. I have stated that it broke out some time at the close of 1835; or, this was about the time hostilities commenced.

General Clinch was ordered into service with a small force of two or three hundred regular troops, and four or five hundred volunteers. Major Dade marched from Tampa Bay to join General Clinch at Fort King with a small force, (something over one hundred and twenty men,) and was attacked by the Indians near the Wahoo swamp, defeated, and he and his men massacred near where there is now a fort called after that officer. In December, 1836, General Clinch marched from Fort Drane to attack the Indians with his regular forces and volunteers on the Withlacoochee river. At about thirty-five miles from his post, he met the Indians on crossing the river. The regular troops, and but 27 or 28 volunteers, had crossed the river with him. The time for which the volunteers had enlisted to serve had expired, and they refused, except the number I have stated. With this force he fought the Indians and drove them; but, not being sustained by the volunteers, he was forced to give back and recross the river, and he returned to Fort Drane.

At the time the news of Major Dade's massacre reached Mobile, where Major General Gaines then was, he with promptness repaired to New Orleans, where he, with creditable zeal, organized a force of regular and volunteer troops, amounting to about eleven hundred men, and proceeded, without delay, to Tampa Bay, where he arrived about the 10th of February, and, after making preparations for the field, marched on the Fort King road to Dade's battle ground, where he buried the meritorious dead with the honors of war, from which he marched to Fort King. He drew a small supply of subsistence from Fort Drane; he also received a small supply of ammunition, and immediately marched to the Withlacoochee river, where he arrived on the 27th, and encountered, the same day, the enemy across the river in a conflict of half an hour, when the troops withdrew for the night, after a loss of one killed and six or seven wounded. The next morning the troops marched down the river two or three miles, where it was supposed it could be crossed. There the advance of the army was fired upon, an action ensued, which lasted until the middle of the day, in which Lieut. Izard was mortally wounded. The troops kept their ground, encamped that night, and threw up a breastwork, and an express was despatched to General Clinch, or the officer commanding at Fort Drane. The next morning the enemy, in number between ten and fifteen hundred men, appeared and made an attack on three sides of the camp, which was kept up for more than two hours, when he withdrew, leaving one of his number dead on the field. Another despatch was sent to Fort Drane. From this time until the 5th of March, the enemy made several spirited attacks upon the camp, in which several conflicts the loss on the part of General Gaines's troops were, six or seven killed, and thirty-five or forty wounded.

On the night of the 5th March a proposition was heard from the woods by the enemy, and the next morning several Indians appeared at a distance with a white flag. Adjutant Barrow of the volunteers was sent to confer with them. They informed him that they did not wish to fight any more, but they wanted General Gaines to go away; upon which information General Gaines sent out Captain Hitchcock, with two or three other officers, to confer further with them. The Indians repeated to him their desire for peace, and stated that a great many of their men had been killed. While this conference was going on, the advance of General Clinch's troops fired on the Indians who were in the rear, when they, and the chiefs who were in council, fled and concealed themselves in the hammocks, and were no more seen until near the middle of March. The command of General Gaines's troops was turned over by him to General Clinch, who fell back upon Fort Drane, as I have before stated. This is a brief sketch of the part which General Gaines took in this war, in all of which he and his troops sustained themselves in a manner creditable to the American arms; I mean so far as their time and means would permit.

In January, 1836, General Scott was ordered to Florida to take charge of the war. He was unlimited as to means.—[See Senate doc. 224, pages 91 and 199.] He arrived in Florida soon after his order. He organized his force, and we find him at Fort Drane about the 14th of March, 1836. General Scott ordered one division of his army, (his left wing,) by the way of the St. Johns, to meet him on the Withlacoochee river, while he moved from Fort Drane, on the 26th of March, with a force of 1,968 men, regulars and volunteers, with eighteen days' provisions, as appears in Senate doc. page 97, and by his own statement. He arrived on the Withlacoochee on the morning of the 28th, and of course with subsistence for sixteen days, having been on the march but two days. He found the Indians embodied on the Withlacoochee; he attacked them and drove them into the swamp, but did not follow them more than four or five miles. It is believed no Indians were killed, nor were any prisoners taken. He then took up the line of march for Tampa Bay, where he arrived in eleven days from Fort Drane, and of course with seven days' subsistence. The left wing of his army, which had been sent to Volusia, on the St. Johns, moved from thence to Palaklekaha, where, according to General Scott's report, they found ponies and cattle in abundance, but were obliged to march to Tampa Bay for want of provisions. Where were the cattle which were in abundance? They arrived at Tampa Bay about the same time that General Scott, with his troops, arrived.

I wish it remembered that Gen. Scott was on the Withlacoochee, with sixteen days' provisions, where the enemy was embodied, with his right wing, consisting of nineteen hundred and sixty-eight troops, about the same time that the left wing of his army was at Palaklekaha, a distance of not more than thirty-five or forty miles from where Gen. Scott was on the Withlacoochee, and where the enemy was embodied. I wish it remembered, also, that there were abundance of cattle at Palaklekaha. Two days were sufficient to bring the whole force of the two wings of Gen. Scott's army, which would have amounted to near four thousand regulars and volunteers, to the spot where the almost entire Indians were embodied, and with subsistence (cattle) in abundance. These are facts which I wish remembered, as I will have to refer to them again. But, sir, we now find both wings of Gen. Scott's army at Tampa Bay, and with seven days' provisions, and not one Indian killed or taken prisoner, on the march that took them there. Gen Scott sent a detachment from Tampa Bay, under Gen. Smith, to Charlotte Harbor, south of Tampa Bay; but he found no Indians there. From this, Gen. Smith returned with his troops to New Orleans, at the expiration of their terms. Gen. Scott returned to St. Augustine, with his left division, by the way of Volusia. His right division returned to Fort Drane on nearly the same route by which it marched out; where, and when, the volunteers were discharged, and sent home, as also were the volunteers of the left wing at St. Augustine. Soon after Gen. Scott arrived at St. Augustine, he had leave to quit Florida, or remain, as he chose. He was directed, in case he should leave Florida, to proceed to the Creek country, to take charge of that war. He left Florida in May, 1836.

Thus ended General Scott's campaign in Florida, without killing half a dozen of Indians, and without taking a single prisoner, and left the Indians scattered over the country as hostile and untamed as when he found them, and with more confidence in their own strength, although his army was strong, his troops of the bravest character, and he unlimited by the War Department in his acquisition in means, with the Treasury open to his service.

I have collected most of the facts I have here stated, from Senate document No. 224, which is the journal and the report of the court of inquiry held at the city of Frederick, in Maryland—a court established to inquire into the causes of the signal failure of General Scott to bring the Florida war to an end; and all the evidence furnishing these facts is ex parte in its character, and furnished by General Scott himself. At the proper time I shall take some further notice of this gentleman and his conduct in the Creek war. At present I will leave him.

When General Scott left Florida, Governor Call had orders from the War Department to take charge of the Florida War. He took charge of the war. His forces at that time consisted of some regular troops and some volunteers; but what number of each, or what was the whole, I am unable to say; but I think not a very strong force, owing to the sickliness of the season. General Call spent the principal part of the sickly season in the defence of the frontiers. He killed some of the enemy, and took some prisoners. In November, 1836, it was understood that a part of the enemy were embodied in the Wahoo swamp, near the Withlacoochee. He marched from Fort Drane to that point, and arrived with five days' provisions. He attacked the enemy, had three successive battles, and defeated them in each—killed a number of them, and dispersed the remainder. His provisions being exhausted, and the enemy being dispersed, he marched to Volusia, where he turned over the command to General Jesup, who was ordered to receive it.

I will now leave Florida for a short time, to pay my addresses to General Scott, who is figuring in the Creek war, in Alabama, and on the western line of Georgia.

I have stated that General Scott had permission to leave Florida, and repair to Alabama, and take charge of the Creek war. The War Department had advice of his intention to leave Florida, but was also informed that his health was bad; and apprehensive that he might not be able to proceed to Alabama, or to take charge of the war, ordered Gen. Jesup (who was then in Washington city) to proceed to Alabama and take charge of the Creek war, should General Scott's health not permit him; or, if otherwise, to act under him. In compliance with this order, General Jesup proceeded to Alabama, and on his way met General Scott at Augusta, in Georgia, on the 30th of May, 1836, from which they proceeded to Columbus. General Scott directed General Jesup to the western side of the Creek country, in Alabama, or to the head quarters of Governor Clay, to take charge of the war in that quarter. I think the Alabama troops were quartered at Tuskegee. General Jesup's first exertions were directed to assembling the Indians who had not yet engaged with the hostile party, but were on a poise as to the side they should join. In this effort General Jesup was successful. He gained Opotheolo, the principal and most able chief of the Creek nation, and secured other chiefs, and about sixteen or seventeen hundred warriors. He then gave notice of his intention to move into the Indian country on the 12th June, and on the evening before, which was on the 11th, the principal hostile chief, Nekumeco, came in with about four hundred warriors, and surrendered. A part of General Scott's order to General Jesup was, after joining Governor Clay's head quarters, to move to Erwinton, south of the Creek country. From Tuskegee to Erwinton there were two roads; one that passed along the frontier of the white settlements, the other passed near the hostile camps. General Jesup took the latter, and arrived near the hostile camp on the night of the 17th, having on his way captured the chief who commanded it. The same night all the warriors of Opotheolo joined him. The next day he moved forward to the hostile camp with the volunteers, having previously sent the Indian warriors by a circuitous route on the other side of the camp, so as to prevent the flight or escape of the Indians. He then went forward, and entered the camp, but found it deserted; the Indians having fled a short distance at his approach. The Indian warriors made some prisoners, and prevented a general dispersion.

At this moment General Jesup received orders from General Scott to cease all hostile operations, and to march his troops, and encamp near Fort Mitchell, a distance of twenty-two or three miles.

General Jesup, unwilling to promptly disobey the orders of his superior officer, and more unwilling to permit the enemy to disperse, which he considered almost in his grasp, surrendered for the time his command to General Patterson, who commanded the division of Alabama volunteers, with orders to encamp the troops, and keep out strong detachments to prevent the enemy from escaping, and mounted his horse and repaired, with all possible speed, to Fort Mitchell, to report to General Scott the actual condition of the enemy, and to obtain his permission to go on and end the war, or to advise him (Scott) to take the command himself and finish it; but not finding General Scott at Fort Mitchell, he returned to the camp, determined to end the war. On his return to the army, he sent out some of the hostile chiefs, whom he had captured, to summon the hostiles to surrender. They did surrender; and, in place of sending to General Scott a notice of his compliance with his order to cease all hostile operations, &c. General Jesup sent him the following communication:

HEAD QUARTERS, June 23, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose copies of reports from Major General Patterson and Captain Parrot, by which you will observe that little remains to be done. Jim Henry is still out with about one hundred and fifty warriors; but my Indian warriors, who have halted and await my orders at the Big Spring, say they can take him. I have just received information that a Seminole chief, with a number of his warriors, is with Henry; the information comes from a negro taken last night.

I have the honor to be, General,
Your obedient servant,
THOS. S. JESUP
Major General Commanding.

Major General SCOTT,
Commanding Southern Army on the march.

See Senate document No. 224, 2d session 24th Congress, page 474, for this communication and others, showing the conclusion of the war by surrenders of the balance of the hostiles.

Here ended the Creek war, by the prompt and efficient conduct of General Jesup, in contradiction to the orders of General Scott. If the orders of General Scott had not been opposed by General Jesup, and at the precise time that they were, we would have had another Florida business of it: the Creek war, in all probability, would have remained undetermined for years, and would have cost the Government, like the Florida war, twenty or thirty millions—perhaps more. Had General Jesup complied with the order of General Scott, "ceased all operations, and marched his troops and encamped near Fort Mitchell," his volunteers would have abandoned him, and returned to their homes, cursing him for a coward. The warriors whom he had brought over would have dubbed him with the title of squaw, and would have dispersed and joined the hostiles. Yes, sir, all this would have been the result of obedience to General Scott's orders. But, I repeat, by the prompt, fearless and efficient discharge of his duty, an end was put to the war; more than a thousand prisoners were taken, and in a few days four or five hundred more surrendered, in all over fourteen hundred, who were, with many others that subsequently came in by the solicitations of the friendly chiefs, sent west of the Mississippi; I think near twenty thousand in all. I believe General Jesup had the superintendence of their removal. But, notwithstanding this gallant and successful conduct, General Scott severely censured General Jesup for disobeying his orders!!!

General Jesup's course met the entire approbation of the Executive, and the War Department. General Scott was recalled from Alabama, owing, I have little doubt, to the slowness of his movements and to a knowledge of the fact that General Scott's censure of General Jesup was unmerited. The Creek war being ended, General Jesup was ordered to proceed to Florida and take charge of the war. He proceeded some time in October, and to which we will now return with our history.

I believe General Jesup was directed to act with Governor Call, or to take charge of the war in chief, I do not know which I believe the latter. He went through a portion of Florida with a small detachment of mounted men, to join Governor Call; and on his way he surprised an Indian village, and took forty-two prisoners of Indians and negroes, from which he returned to Withlacoochee, and swept the swamps from the Fort King road to Fort Clinch, near the mouth of the river, in which he captured between eighty and a hundred of the enemy. But finding there was no body of the enemy in that section, he detached a part of his force, under Col. Foster and Major Nelson, of Georgia, to the swamps south of the Withlacoochee, on the Gulf of Mexico, and returned himself, with the remainder of his force, to Fort Armstrong, on the Fort King road. Soon after he pushed, with a force of one thousand troops, consisting of regulars, marines, Alabama volunteers, and Indian warriors, into the centre of the peninsula, where, it is said, a white man had never been before. On his way he sent a detachment against the village of Osuchee, which surprised the chief, Osuchee, killed him, his son, and two other chiefs, took a number of prisoners, (some of whom escaped,) after which the detachment returned and joined him. He proceeded with all his force to the neighborhood of the Lake Tohopkalegee. Here the advance of the army under Col. Henderson, came up with the enemy, attacked them, killed some, and took a number of prisoners. The result of this battle led to a conference with the Indian chiefs, and the conference to a suspension of hostilities. The chiefs agreed to, and did meet General Jesup a Fort Dade, and entered into a capitulation to leave the country and go west of the Mississippi. Two or three of the chiefs were retained as hostages for the fulfilment of the capitulation. Some time before this, General Jesup had ordered a detachment of troops, under the command of Colone's Fanning and Harney, with a quantity of provisions, up the St. Johns river to Lake Monroe, where they established a post. They were attacked by the Indians. The enemy, were repulsed, with the loss of twenty or thirty killed. Soon after this battle, the Indians heard of the suspension of hostilities, and a friendly intercourse was established. All this led to a general suspension of hostilities throughout the Territory, and a friendly intercourse with all; and, by an agreement entered into at Fort Dade, the chiefs being nearly all present, (and those who were not, sent in their adhesion.) The Indians were to assemble at Tampa Bay, in May, 1837, and, from there, start for the West. Here was a complete and successful termination of the Florida war, and it was accomplished in as short a time as any Indian war since the first settlement of our country.

In conformity with the stipulations, the Indians began to assemble in the latter part of May, and beginning of June, at Tampa Bay and Fort Mellon, to prepare for the West; but unfortunately the measles broke out among those at Tampa Bay. Safety to the army and humanity to the Indians required that they should be kept apart—to the army, that the contagion might not be spread in it, and humanity to the Indians, that they should be kept at a place, and in a situation, with respect to water and other advantages, to make the disease less fatal. The disease raged with great violence, and many whole families were swept off. The news of the disease reached Fort Mellon, where a large body had assembled, and many of them were furnished with provisions to take them to Tampa Bay. It was also reported at Fort Mellon that the smallpox raged among the Indians at Tampa Bay. All this prevented those at Fort Mellon, and many others, who had not yet assembled, from going to Tampa Bay. General Jesup was thus prevented by circumstances over which he had no control, from carrying the stipulations of the treaty into effect, by moving the Indians West, at the time when it was intended. While preparations were making to move the Indians from Fort Mellon to Tampa Bay, they became jealous of the intention of the army, and thought the object was to throw them all into a body where they might, or would, be swept off by the measles and smallpox—took the alarm, broke up, and dispersed in direct violation of the conditions of the capitulation.

It has been asked, why did General Jesup not retain and prevent the Indians from breaking up? why did he not pursue and overtake them, when broken up? The answer is, the efficiency of the army was greatly weakened by severe fatigue, long marches, and constant and severe exercise, and the horses were completely broken down. General Jesup did all that was in his power, and all that was left for him to do at that time. He called some fresh troops of Florida volunteers into action, the efficient troops which he had, and two volunteer companies from Georgia. They were put to the service of scouting and defending the frontier. This duty was continued until the following November, which may be regarded as the commencement of the next campaign.

The number of Indians killed or taken in the campaign which I have briefly described, by General Jesup, was over five hundred. I will not now detain the House with specific details of the military operations of General Jesup, for the balance of the time he had charge of the Florida war, but refer you to Senate document No. 507, second session of the Twenty fifth Congress, by which it will be seen he continued to defend the frontier, to scour the country far and wide, as his means and force would enable him, and to surprise, kill, and capture the enemy when and wherever he could find them; by which, also, it will be found that from the time he commenced operations, or took charge of the war in Florida, which was in December, 1836, until he withdrew in May, 1838, the number of Indians and negroes taken, with those who surrendered, amounted to near twenty-four hundred, over seven hundred of whom were warriors. Their villages were all destroyed—their cattle, horses, and other stock, with nearly all their other property, were taken or destroyed—the hammocks and swamps were every where penetrated, and the whole country was traversed from the Georgia line to the southern extremity of Florida. The small bands of the enemy which were left, were dispersed over that extensive region, with little left but their rifles. Such was the condition of the war, and such the situation of the enemy, when Gen. Jesup surrendered the command.

Mr. Chairman, I have traced up the principal operations of the Florida War. I have done so for the purpose of presenting to the country the prominent facts, in order that it may be known how far the Administration or the Executive, and the War Department, are chargeable with any misfortunes or delay attending the prosecution of that war I have also done so for the purpose of placing the officers, who were the immediate active operators in the war, in a proper manner before the public, to the end that justice may be awarded to whom justice is due.

In relation to the Executive and the War Department no blame can or will be attached, if blame there is at all, and such will be the decision of an intelligent and generous community. The Executive was thwarted in his efforts to augment the regular army; hence the War Department was driven to the necessity of carrying on the war with volunteer militia, a mode both expensive and uncertain. Vast expense and delay has been the consequence, but the Executive could do no better. He was compelled to use such means as Congress furnished him, and for these alone is he responsible. All responsibility and all consequences must rest with Congress for the insufficiency of those means. Congress is also responsible for all the unhappy consequences that resulted from the untimely interference to which I have alluded, for the purposes of pacification, and by which the whole operations of the War Department were checked and thrown into confusion. I repeat that nothing that was in the power of the Executive and the War Department to do, was left undone. The best judgment has been exercised, and the best direction has been given to that judgment. I repeat, whatever failures or delay are connected with the Florida war, so far as the Executive is concerned, resulted from the want of more efficient means. I also repeat, that whatever inefficiency may seem to attach to the Executive, has its origin in the want of proper means. Lastly, I repeat, whatever failures or delay are connected with the Florida war, have their founda ion in the want of more efficient means, and are chargeable to Congress and the character of the country. But, sir, speaking with reference to the means with which the Executive has been furnished, I ask to present some other causes which have operated unfavorably, and must so continue to operate, to a speedy termination of that war. I have given a description of the face of Florida. The advantages which the swamps, hammocks, everglades, and morasses, give the savages, render all civilized modes of warfare ineffectual. The swamps are almost impenetrable except to the savages, who know their secret passes. The hammocks and everglades form a covering and hiding places for the savages, which render them impervious to the keenest eye and the most vigilant search. The first warning the pursuer has of the enemy is the crack of his rifle, or the effect of his shot. I am told that one of the officers of the Florida service has been shot at (and wounded often) fourteen times in various attacks, and never saw a hostile Indian, such is the security the enemy enjoy by the natural advantages which the face of Florida gives them. Add to this the extent or spread of territory which covers over forty thousand square miles, over which the enemy are dispersed in small banditis. Add to these the fact that, though Florida is destitute of resources for a civilized army, it abounds in natural productions, suited to an Indian. The wild potato, the coonti root, and the cabbage tree, are the substitutes for bread. The fish, with which the lakes and ponds abound, the gofer, the turkey, and the deer, which they know where to find, and how to kill, are their meat. It is entirely impossible, and must ever remain so, to starve them out, for nature feeds them without an effort, scarcely, on their part; and as to clothing, the climate renders that not only unnecessary, but, for three-fourths of the year, actually burdensome. A warrior disdains to encumber himself with garments beyond his buckskin leggins, moccasins, and breech-clout.

The Florida contest is really no longer a war of fighting; it is one of hunting, finding, and catching—the difficulties of which may be imagined, but can only be realized by those who have been practical observers of its operations. Nothing is more unfair and unjust than to compare this war with other Indian wars known to our country; for there is, in truth, scarcely one feature that will bear comparison. To drive the Indians from our frontier, to push them farther into the wilderness, and enlarge our boundaries, has been the common policy, as the history of our frontier Indian wars shows: but such is not the character of the war in Florida. The Indians would long since have abandoned that country, if they had had a place of retreat, as the Indians of the West have always had. But, surrounded as they are, by the Gulf of Mexico on one side, by the Atlantic ocean on another, and the inhabited States on the third, they are unable to recede from the country, even under the severest pressure. They are therefore reduced to the necessity of hiding themselves in the numerous covers with which the country abounds, and we to that of seeking for them. The operation of finding, running down, and catching, some twelve or fifteen hundred wild Indians, scattered over an area of forty thousand square miles of wilderness, covered with inaccessible retreats and fastnesses, will be found to be fraught with difficulties which have never been met with in this country nor surpassed in any other.

If the Indians would concentrate and fight a decisive battle, there is perhaps not a regiment in Florida that could not close the war forever by defeating them. But such is not their policy. They know their strength consists in dispersion, not in concentration. By scattering in small squads over that immense territory, they see that we can neither find nor effectually assail them. They, in fact, become intangible to military operations. Hence the war may linger through many years, with the utmost effort that may be used to terminate it, and it is the opinion of many most experienced in the progress of this war, that time is to be an important element in bringing it to a close, and that no better plan can be devised for that purpose than that now in operation by the War Department, and carrying out the provisions of the occupation bill now before the House.

Mr. Chairman, while I am willing that unprincipled demagogues, and brainless coxcombs, shall exercise full sway in their denunciations of the Administration for what they please to call the failure of the Florida war, I will ask the attention of an honest and intelligent community, while I present for their consideration some other wars in other countries, but answering the description of this, with the exception of the single change of names; in the progress and conduct of which they will find ample reasons for the delays of this—reasons which, with them, will be found amply sufficient to secure the Administration from disgrace, or even imputation, and the American arms from dishonor.

Darius, King of Persia, to satisfy an unbounded ambition, and extend his conquests, declared war against the Scythians. His brother, Artabanes, in whom he had great confidence, remonstrated against this expedition, and offered, among other strong objections, that the Scythians were separated from Persia by an immense distance of sea and land; and besides, the Scythians were a people that dwelt in wild and uncultivated deserts, having neither towns nor houses; no fixed settlements or places of habitation. * * * As they are accustomed to remove from place to place, if they should think proper to fly before you, not out of fear or cowardice, for they are a very courageous and warlike people, but only with a design to harass and ruin your army by continued and fatiguing marches; what will become of you in such an uncultivated and barren country, where you will neither find forage for your horses nor provisions for your men? * * * * Darius heard his brother in kindness, but no admonition was sufficient to drive him from his mad purpose. He commenced his march from Susa at the head of seven hundred thousand troops. His fleet consisted of six hundred ships, which were chiefly managed by Ionians, and other Grecian nations that dwelt upon the sea coast of As a Minor and the Hellespont. He marched his army towards the Thracian Bosphorus, which he passed upon a bridge of boats; after which, having made himself master of all Thrace, he came to the Danube, where he had ordered his fleet to meet him. As soon as the Scythians were informed of the march of Darius against them, knowing their want of strength to meet him, they applied to the neighboring people to join in their defence, some of whom gave in, but most of whom preferred neutral ground; but of this refusal they soon had reason to repent.

The first wise precaution taken by the Scythians was, to secure their wives and children, by sending them to the most northern parts of the country, and with them all their herds and flocks, reserving nothing for themselves but that which they could carry with them, and what was necessary for the support of the army. Another precaution which they observed was, to fill up all the wells, stop up all their springs, and consume all the forage in those parts through which the Persian army was to pass. The policy then practised was to march a short distance before Darius's army, and lead them first into the countries of those who refused to join them against the Persians, to the end that their substance might be consumed by so vast an army. This being accomplished, they led the enemy into barren regions, where there was neither water, provisions, nor forage—retreating but a short distance before, and leading him into such places as suited them best. Whenever the Persians manifested a disposition to attack them, they would quicken their march and lead them still farther into famine and thirst. At last Darius seeing no hopes of bringing the enemy to battle, and growing weary of long and fruitless marches, sent a herald to the king of the Scythians, whose name was Indirthyrsus, with this message in his name: "Prince of the Scythians, wherefore dost thou continually fly before me? Why dost thou not stop somewhere or other, either to give me battle if thou feelest thyself able to encounter me, or if thou thinkest thyself too weak to acknowledge thy master by presenting him with earth and water?"*

To this communication Indirthyrsus replied by the same herald: "If I fly before thee, Prince of the Persians, it is not because I fear thee. What I do now is no more than what I am used to do in time of peace. We Scythians have neither cities nor lands to defend. If thou hast a mind to force us to come to an engagement, come and attack the tombs of our fathers, and thou shall find what manner of men we are. As to the title of master which thou assumest, keep it for other nations than the Scythians. For my part, I acknowledge no other master than the great Jupiter, one of my own ancestors, and the goddess Vesta." Darius was greatly enraged at what he regarded so insolent an answer, and pushed further and faster in his mad career. Just when his army was reduced to the last extremity, there came a herald to Darius from the Scythian prince with a bird, a mouse, a frog, and five arrows, for a present. The king desired to know the meaning of those gifts. The herald answered that his orders were only to deliver them, and nothing more; and that it was left for the Persian king to find out the meaning. Darius concluded, at first, that the Scythians thereby consented to deliver up the earth and water to him which, he supposed, were represented by the mouse and frog, as also their cavalry, whose swiftness was represented by the bird, together with their own persons and arms, represented by the arrows. But one of his lords expounded the enigma in a different manner. I know, says he to the Persians, that, unless you can fly away in the air like birds, or hide yourselves in the earth like mice, or swim in the water like frogs, you shall in no wise avoid the arrows of the Scythians.

The whole Persian army had now nothing before their eyes but ruin and famine. Instant retreat was all the salvation for the remainder of those who survived the famine and fatigue of the Scythian campaign. Darius returned to Susa with scarce half his army. Such was the fate of the Scythian war; such was the failure of one of the most powerful nations on the face of the earth, with one of the most powerful armies that ever marched against an enemy, headed by a prince flushed with victory, and adorned with fresh laurels by the conquest of Assyria and the destruction of Babylon, in an attempt to subdue a small nation of half civilized wanderers; and such were the advantages which the face of the country and the extent of territory gave the Scythians—advantages in no respect superior to those enjoyed by the Seminoles in Florida for their defence. The Scythians defeated the Persian army by wandering, and not fighting. The Seminole Indians have it in their power to long prevent a termination of the Florida war by wandering, and not fighting, by the same advantages that the Scythians enjoyed.

In the year 1655 Jamaica was conquered by the English, and the Spaniards driven out. Soon after the English laws were established in the island, the inhabitants found themselves beset and plundered by some wandering robbers who issued from the mountains of Clarendon, situated in the interior of the island. These robbers were called maroons, and principally consisted of negroes and their descendants, who, from time to time, had escaped from their masters, and taken refuge in the mountains, or cockpits. The mountains of Clarendon are lofty, remarkably broken, consisting of rocks, covered, in some parts, with dense shrubbery, with narrow, deep defiles, leading to openings more expanded, called cockpits, and other hiding places, fit for secure retreats for robbers and plunderers. The earliest attention of the colonial Government was given to the security of the planters and herdsmen from the daily depredations of the maroons. Garrisons and posts were established, troops were stationed at suitable points to defend the frontier, but all to but little effect. Robberies, depredations on property, and murders, by the maroons, was a portion of every day's news. The attention of the colonial Government was called and directed more earnestly and urgently to the safety of the frontier and the reduction of the maroons; but all still to little effect—murders and depredations were but little abated—the work of surprise, plunder, and death, still went on. The attention of the British Parliament was called to the maroon war; but year after year passed away and the maroon war still raged. The British arms were called into active requisition, troops of rangers were sent to scour the mountain passes, defiles, and cockpits, but no maroons could be seen, with a few exceptions. Fresh trails would be made on purpose to lead the rangers into narrow defiles, when, on a sudden, the maroons would fire on them from their hiding places and cut off whole companies, without any other discovery than the report of the musket, the smoke from its muzzle, and the death which ensued. Sir, I have not time to detail this war and its bloody consequences. It is sufficient for my purpose to say that perhaps there never were over one thousand maroon warriors at any one time, and yet the war lasted near two thirds of a century, with but little intermission of confirmed peace. It is sufficient to say that such were the advantages that the inaccessible (inaccessible to any thing but a maroon) passes, narrow defiles, cockpits, and hiding places that the Clarendon mountains afforded the maroons, that a handful of them (comparatively speaking) were able to keep at bay the power of the British arms. While the British lion was prowling unscared over vast and wide-spread India, shaking the earth and making all creation tremble at his roar, he was compelled to shake his mane and sneak, in dismay and defeat, from the presence of a handful of maroons. Such were the natural advantages which the maroons enjoyed, owing to the face of their country. But, great as those advantages were, the Seminoles enjoy those that are equal for their mode of warfare, and against which the American arms have had to contend. The maroon war was finally closed in 1796, not before; nor would it yet have been closed, but for the importation of the Spanish chasseurs and bloodhounds, about which I will have to say something before I take my seat.

In that part of Asia, or, perhaps, more properly, in Asia in Russia, are what are called the Circassian mountains, which are inhabited by a people called after the mountains, or perhaps the mountains are called after them. Be that as it may, the people are called Circassians. The Government of Russia has owned that province of Asia for perhaps a century or more. Her arms and her laws have been extended to the subjection of all the tribes and nations within the limits of that province, except the Circassians, who have never been conquered to this day. Perhaps the description given of the Clarendon mountains of Jamaica may, to some extent, serve for a descriptions of the Circassian mountains, and the advantages of the one are similar to the other, for national defence. The Circassians, I believe rank with what is called half civilized people. think their concentrated military force has, at no time, exceeded one or two thousand warriors. The arms of Russia have been directed against that people, with but little intermission, from the time she has owned the province. Campaign after campaign has marched, with ten, fifteen, and upwards of twenty thousand troops, as brave as ever bore arms, or followed the Russian standard; and as often as they have been marched, so often have they failed, or been defeated. The Russian eagle, that hovers over, unscared, one half of the continent of inhabited Europe, has been compelled to flee from the presence of a handful of Circassians, in defeat and dismay. Ten thousand of Russia's bravest veterans have fallen in a single campaign before them. They are unconquered and unconquerable, so long as their scattered, small clans, remain united for the common defence of their country, and so long as the mountains stand, and the passes, fastnesses, and defiles remain; for these are the natural advantages by which they are enabled to contend against the almost unlimited powers of a Russian Autocrat; and yet the natural advantages that the Circassian mountains afford that people in the safety of their retreats, does not excel the advantages the everglades, swamps, and hammocks secure to the Seminoles in Florida.

The failures of the Persian army to defeat Scythia; the procrastination for more than half a century of the maroon war, and the total failure of all Russia to conquer Circassia, can all be accounted for by the honest, intelligent and candid world, and yet this Administration must be the subject of Federal derision, ridicule and denunciation, because the Florida war has not been terminated in the space of two or three years, with all the insurmountable difficulties that have their foundation in nature to contend with—limited means, a destitution in resources at the theatre of war, and the untimely and embarrassing interposition of Congress—all of which have conspired to make this war as complicated and as difficult of termination as those to which I have referred.

Sir, the spirit of persecution and demagoguism which has hunted the Executive and the War Department, as well as some of the officers, through this war, is worthy of, and in character with, the reckless demagogues of other times and other Governments, who are always prepared to sacrifice the highest interest of their country at the shrine of their ambition. It is worthy of the ingratitude and inhumanity of an Apries, when the Egyptians determined to shake off the yoke that bound them down in slavish bondage to Apries (Pharao Hophrah) they made Amasis their king, Apries in exasperation sent Paterbenis, one of his highest officers and principal lord of his court, to put Amasis under arrest and bring him before him. Paterbenis, faithful to his prince, did all he could to execute his master's order; but, for want of power and means, failed in his commission. The base and brutal Apries, as a reward for his fidelity, treated him in a most ignominious and inhuman manner, by cutting off his nose and ears, for failing to do that which he had neither the power nor the means to do.

It is in character with the base conduct and treachery of Hanno, and the vile faction he headed in Carthage, whose whole efforts were directed to the destruction of the immortal Hannibal, whose success in arms, and whose popularity with his people, were a constant source of mortification and disappointment to him. The management of the Government of Carthage, and the command of her armies, were Hanno's ambition; and, like the Federal demagogues of this day in our country, he preferred to see the proud name of Carthage wither, her arms dishonored, and her people sunk in infamy and sold in slavery, rather than fail of his object; and such aspiring demagogues have been the misfortune and curse of every Government and people, at all times. So says the history of the world and of man. But I will not now take time to illustrate by examples. The American people will be able to appreciate the motives that give birth to the base charges against the Administration in reference to the Florida war.

Mr. Chairman, I ask your attention, while I expose the inconsistency involved in the cry against the Administration for what is called the "mismanagement of the Florida war." The Executive and the War Department have been charged with impotency in its management, and General Jesup has been brought in for a large share of Federal abuse and Federal censure. Of the Administration I will say nothing more, farther than repeat, that all that has been done, has been done with the best directed judgment.

But of General Jesup I must say something, by way of contrast to the services of General Scott.

General Jesup served, I think, hardly a fortnight in the Creek war, and by his efficient means, and in violation of the orders, and contrary to the plans, of General Scott, he succeeded in terminating the war, and completed the arrangements by which near twenty thousand Indians were moved west of the Mississippi. For this, as I have before remarked, he received General Scott's censure.

General Jesup served in Florida, and had charge of the war a little over seventeen months, in which time he killed and captured of the enemy near twenty-four hundred, defended the frontier, established posts and fortifications, destroyed the enemy's property, burnt their towns, swept the swamps and hammocks, and dispersed the small remainder, and yet General Jesup has been abused and denounced in no measured terms by the Federal sheets of the day; he has been identified with the War Department in the charge of "impotency" and the "disgrace of the Florida war."

General Scott performed a campaign in Florida with near five thousand troops (the bravest of the brave) well supplied, in which he may have killed, it is said, five or six of the enemy, and yet, strange to say, General Scott, by the same men and the same party, is lauded for his bravery and his transcendent military services, and is held up as qualified for and entitled to the first office in the gift of the American people. Yes, sir, he was really a prominent candidate for the Presidency at the late Hartford Convention. (Pardon me, sir, I should have said Harrisburg. I am so in the habit of calling things by their proper names, that I sometimes violate the rules of courtesy. The fact that it was composed of men of the same party, governed by the same principles, and whose object was to effect about the same purposes as that of the Hartford convention, led me into the nominal mistake. I will be more careful hereafter.) Yes, sir, General Scott, who, of all the officers that had charge of the Florida war, with greater means and greater advantages, did the least, (except one whom I shall name shortly,) is held up by the Opposition as worthy and qualified for the Presidency!

Sir, if there is any disgrace attached to the conduct of the Florida war, or any failure in its management, that disgrace, and that failure, must attach to General Scott. If there was any thing left undone, which could or ought to have been done, in the Florida war, it was the failure of General Scott to fight, surround, and conquer the enemy, when they were embodied on the Withlacoochee river. At no time, during the war, were there so great a number of the enemy embodied as on the Withlacoochee, when General Scott met them. At no time were there so many efficient troops so contiguous, nor were the troops at any time so well supplied, as were the troops at that time under Gen. Scott. He had nineteen hundred and sixty men in his right wing, immediately under his command, with sixteen days' provisions. His left wing was at Palaklakaha, consisting of the same number of men, and the same quantity of provisions, and with cattle in abundance, and only one or two days' march from where the Indians were embodied. Then was the time for a decisive battle, if such a battle could have been fought with the Indians at any time. If there was ever a time when an end could have been put to the Florida war by efficient and prompt action, that was the time. If ever there were circumstances which put it in the power of any commander in Florida to put, at one blow, an end to the war, these were the circumstances. What was the course of General Scott? It was, as I have remarked, to attack the Indians, who, without the loss of one man, retreated to the swamps. General Scott followed them but four or five miles, and then took up the line of march for Tampa Bay, where he arrived in eleven days from Fort Drane, with seven days' provisions, and where he met the left wing of his army, with a like quantity of provisions. Sir, one is naturally led to inquire why Gen. Scott did not send to Palaklekaha for the left wing of his army, secure a few of the enemy's cattle which were in such abundance, attack the enemy with his whole force, and at a blow put an end to the war. It has been confidently said by some officers of experience, that if General Gaines or General Jesup had commanded at that time at Withlacoochee, with the forces and provisions that General Scott had, an end would have been put to the war by a decisive battle. It is said that it was a great error in General Scott to permit the Indians to disperse. They never have since been so embodied, nor will they ever again be so embodied. I repeat, that there and then was committed the fatal error, if any error can be justly charged in the conduct of the Florida war. I charge this upon General Scott, and I defy his friends to get him from under the charge, unless they will maintain that owing to the character and face of the country and the advantages of the swamps, hammocks, and fastnesses the enemy enjoyed, it was impossible for him to find and defeat them; and such seems to be the case, and the apology upon which the court of inquiry decided, as set forth in Senate document 224, evidence furnished the court by Gen. Scott himself. I say, if the friends of Gen. Scott assign these as good reasons why he so signally failed in the Florida war, then must they cease their clamor against the Administration, and their charges of inefficiency and "impotency" upon the head of the War Department for not doing that which they must acknowledge was impossible to be done, or they must consent to let their would-be President stand charged with more inefficiency and greater error, than any one officer connected with the Florida war—no one having it so much in his power to end the war as General Scott.

I was amused to hear the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] when on this subject, (Florida war.) He asks:

"What has yet been accomplished by the Second dragoons, a regiment raised specially for that service? Nothing, that I have ever heard of. I would not object to raising one or more regiments, if I knew who were to command them; if I could have any assurance that the command would be given to Gen. Floyd of Georgia, or some other such man. I, however, know none such. But it will be given to no such man, but to some palace pet or noisy politician. These appointments have been, and will be made, not with a view to military, but to political battles; not with a view to obtaining victories over the Indians, but votes at elections."

He knows no such man as Gen. Floyd! Ought the gentleman not to have embraced Gen. Scott and the hero of Tippecanoe?

But, sir, who is Gen. Floyd? I may expose my ignorance by asking this question. If so, I hope I will find an apology in the fact that some of us in the West have no books to read but the Bible and old Tom Dilworth's Spelling-book. I do not make the inquiry with any disrespect to the gentleman, who seems to stand so high in the estimation of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. T.] Gen. Floyd may have slain his thousands and tens of thousans. He may have fattened many a broad field with his slain. He may have planted standards of liberty in every quarter of the globe. Victory may perch upon his banner, and conqueror may be his name, but it so happens I know little or nothing of him. I believe he had the charge of a campaign in Florida. I think he was sent to do what Gen. Nelson had failed to do. And what did they both do? Senate document No. 507 informs us that Gen. Nelson, with a brigade of Georgia volunteers, was directed to secure the frontier of Middle Florida and the western part of East Florida. His operations covered the country west of the Fort King road, from the south point of the Annuttalega swamp to the Withlacoochee, and to the head of that river; thence to the Suwanee, and thence west of that river, and south of the Tallahassee road to Stein Hatchee, the whole distance on the coast being a continued swamp, extending from the Gulf of Mexico to the interior, from ten to thirty miles, and along the Gulf a hundred and fifty miles. He had several skirmishes with the enemy, and the result of his operations, so far as they have been reported, are six Indians killed, and fourteen prisoners. That is something. General Nelson is a Democrat, I am told.

Now, sir, I have told you I did not know what General Floyd has done, but I can tell you what he did not do. After General Nelson left Florida, General Floyd went on a campaign. His operations were confined to the southern part of Georgia, and northern line of Florida, near the Okeefenoke swamp. His force I think consisted of near one thousand Georgia volunteers and United States regular troops. His campaign continued probably three months. He returned without killing one Indian or taking a prisoner. This is what he did not do. I believe General Floyd is a modern Whig!

"The King of France, with forty thousand men, Marched up a hill, and then marched down again."

But my friend from South Carolina knows no such man as General Floyd. He does not like pets of the white palace, and noisy politicians; I suppose he prefers bank pets. I take it for granted, if the charge of the Florida war could be put into the hands of the pets of the bank marbled palace and the friends of rotten corporations; the rag tag shinplaster currency and incorporated swindlers, they might make as much "noise" as they pleased in politics. Such generals would be to the gentleman's liking and the liking of his party, whether they would obtain "victories over the Indians" or not, so that they would "obtain votes at the polls."

But, sir, I wish it to be understood that I neither make the inquiry nor the expose which I have, in relation to General Floyd, through any disrespect to that gentleman, or to diminish any claims to chivalry, bravery, or good conduct, he may have achieved by his services in the Florida war. On the contrary, it is my desire that he shall enjoy all the credit to which his services entitle him. But when his friends are so imprudent as to extol him, at the expense, and to the exclusion, of all others who toiled with him in the scenes of Florida, a plain, unvarnished statement of facts is not only admissible, but demanded, in justice to those who may be affected thereby. And I am willing to admit that General Floyd did all that could have been done under the circumstances in which he served.

I have stated that the abused General Jesup ended the Creek war in ten or fifteen days, and sent near twenty thousand Indians west of the Mississippi; and that he killed, captured, and took prisoners, near twenty-four hundred of the enemy, in less than seventeen months, during which he had charge of the Florida war. How will these compare with other Indian campaigns and Indian wars.

General Wayne's Indian campaign commenced in 1792, and ended in 1795. Wayne's last battle was fought on the 20th August, 1794. The Indians did not come in for a year after, and, when all told, they did not amount to more than eleven hundred.

General G. R. Clark, who was considered one of our most successful Indian hunters, never took more than one hundred and fifty Indians; nor did he kill more than twice that number. Generals Scott (not the would-be President) and Wilkinson killed and captured ninety-nine Indians in their campaign, for which they received the thanks of General Washington.

In the surprise at Tippecanoe it is supposed fifty Indians may have been killed with the offset of one hundred and eighty of our troops killed and wounded.

So Gen. Jesup, in a seventeen months' campaign, killed and captured, and made prisoner, more Indians than all killed and taken by Wayne, Clark, Scott, Wilkinson, and Tippecanoe to boot; and yet the Administration, the War Department, and General Jesup, are charged with disgrace for failures in the Florida war, and General Winfield Scott must be made President of the United States. Monstrous!!! and Tippecanoe more monstrous!!!!

Mr. Chairman, I regret that my time and the limits of a speech will not permit me to take the notice I should of many of the gallant officers who served in the fatiguing and harassing war of Florida. If I had time and opportunity, it would give me great pleasure to annex the services of the gallant Smith, Taylor, Hernandes, Cawlfield, Harny, Fanning, and others, to their names.

I have a word to say, by way of conclusion, to the charge made upon the War Department of importing bloodhounds to hunt down the Seminole Indians.

This charge is made by the humane Federalists. Humanity is one of the noblest qualities of the human heart, but it sometimes requires the exercise of sound judgment, to give it a proper direction; and unfeigned humanity is generally blended with some regard for truth and veracity. We had a very humane party during our last war with Great Britain, in which we were struggling to maintain our liberty and independence. That was the Federal party who, for the time, styled themseles the peace party, and the same party whose eyes are now pumping, and whose hearts are bleeding, at the thought of employing bloodhounds to hunt the poor Seminoles. At the same time that the whole line of our frontier country was bleeding at every pore; when the heavens were illuminated by night with the torch of the savage and the conflagration of the frontier cabins along the whole northern boundary; when the crack of the deadly rifle was not permitted to die on the ear; when the red scalping knife and tomahawk were never permitted to dry; and when the work of death was the daily and nightly occupation of the enemy, many a loud and fervent prayer was sent to Heaven by the peace party to revenge, on our countrymen, the blood of an unholy and unjust war. And now, when the first intelligence of the morning is the indiscriminate slaughter of one or more families, the burning of one or more houses, by the Seminoles, we hear the same party petitioning men and Heaven against employing bloodhounds to trace the enemy to their lurking places and inaccessible retreats—for no other use is intended by them.

The Florida Indians are perhaps the most treacherous and inhuman savages that ever degraded the human name, or deformed the image of man. They are composed of every material that is vile and abominable in human nature and degraded in principle.

In the course of this war, they have not only placed themselves without the pale of mercy and humanity, by their inhuman and indiscriminate barbarity, but they have made themselves, by the laws of nations and of war, subjects of the gallows, by the violations of the capitulation solemnly entered into at Fort Dade, which I have before described; and this is the kind of enemy against which bloodhounds must not be used, for the purpose of ferreting out their places of concealment.

Every wind from Florida bears upon its wings the sickening intelligence of some innocent family falling a sacrifice to these plundering murderers. The intelligence of the parents of some family having their throats cut, their cabin fired, and their children's brains dashed out upon its burning logs, and the mangled bodies left to fatten the wolf, and feed the raven. But all this can be heard with cold indifference, while the pitiful whine is spread upon a thousand petitions against employing bloodhounds, to hunt the poor Seminoles. Sir, it is all the slang of the demagogue, and the cant of the hypocrite. I have in my possession an extract from Governor Reid's message to the Florida Legislature, which gives a description of one of those horrible scenes of murder and burning. It is said that a pious and exemplary citizen, on seeing the mangled corpses and the smoking ruins of the dwelling, exclaimed, in feeling and horror, that he would employ hell hounds and devils against such an enemy.

But the Executive and the War Department have been assailed and denounced from one end of the Union to the other, for importing bloodhounds, to be used in the Florida war. Now, sir, I have to inform you that the whole charge is but one of the reckless, unprincipled, and vile slanders of the times, propagated and promulgated for the base purposes of party. Neither the Executive nor the War Department have had any hand in the importation of blood hounds. It is the work of the Florida authorities, a matter over which the Executive and the War Department have no control, except whether they shall be used as instruments of war in the hands of the United States troops, or, if permitted, in what manner they shall be used.

I present the reply of the Secretary of the War Department to a communication of the Hon. H. A. WISE to him on that subject, which I ask may be read by the Clerk, and which I shall make a part of my printed remarks.

On this letter I endorsed the following decision, which was communicated to General Taylor: "I have always been of opinion that dogs ought to be employed in this warfare, to protect the army from surprises and ambuscades, and to track the Indian to his lurking-place: but supposed, if the General believed them to be necessary, he would not hesitate to take measures to procure them. The cold-blooded and inhuman murders lately perpetrated upon helpless women and children by these ruthless savages, render it expedient that every possible means should be resorted to, in order to protect the people of Florida, and to enable the United States forces to follow and capture or destroy the savage and unrelenting foe. General Taylor is, therefore, authorized to procure such number of dogs as he may judge necessary, it being expressly understood that they are to be employed to track and discover the Indians, not to worry or destroy them."

This is the only action or correspondence, on the part of the Department, that has ever taken place in relation to the matter. The General took no measures to carry into effect his own recommendation, and this Department has never since renewed the subject. I continue, however, to entertain the opinion expressed in the above decision. I do not believe that description of dog, called the bloodhound, necessary to present surprise, or track the Indian murderer; but I still think that every cabin, every military post, and every detachment, should be attended by dogs. That precaution might have saved Dade's command from massacre; and, by giving timely warning, have prevented many of the cruel murders which have been committed by the Indians in Middle Florida. The only successful pursuit of Indian murderers that I know of, was on a late occasion, when the pursuers were aided by the sagacity of their dogs. These savages had approached a cabin of peaceful and industrious settlers so stealthily, that the first notice of their presence was given by a volley from their rifles thrust between the logs of the house; and the work of death was finished by tomahawking the women, after tearing from them their infant children, and dashing their brains out against the door posts. Are these ruthless savages to escape and repeat such scenes of blood, because they can elude our fellow-citizens in Florida and our regular soldiers, and baffle their unaided efforts to overtake or discover them? On a late occasion, three estimable citizens were killed in the immediate neighborhood of St. Augustine, and one officer of distinguished merit mortally wounded. It is in evidence that these murders were committed by two Indians, who, after shooting down the father, and beating out the son's brains with the butts of their rifles, upon hearing the approach of the volunteers, retired a few yards into the woods, and secreted themselves until the troops returned to town with the dead bodies of those who had been thus inhumanly and wantonly butchered. It is to be regretted that this corps had not been accompanied with one or two hunters, who, with their dogs, might have tracked the blood-stained footsteps of these Indians, have restored to liberty the captive they were dragging away with them, and have prevented them from ever again repeating such atrocities. Nor could the severest casuist object to our fellow-citizens in Florida resorting to such measures, in order to protect the lives of their women and children.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,
J. R. POINSETT.

Hon. HENRY A. WISE,
House of Representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 26, 1840.

SIR: It is understood by the Department, although not officially informed of the fact, that the authorities of the Territory of Florida have imported a pack of bloodhounds from the island of Cuba, and I think it proper to direct, in the event of those dogs being employed by any officer or officers under your command, that their use be confined altogether to tracking the Indians: and in order to insure this, and to prevent the possibility of their injuring any person whatsoever, that they be muzzled when in the field, and held with a leash while following the track of the enemy.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,
J. R. POINSETT.

Brig. Gen. Z. TAYLOR,
Commanding Army of the South, Florida.

I now ask to read the following resolution, which also shall make a part of my speech:

Mr. ADAMS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House the natural, political, and martial history of the bloodhounds, showing the peculiar fitness of that class of warriors to be the associates of the gallant army of the United States, specifying the nice discrimination of his scent between the blood of the freeman and the blood of the slave—between the blood of the armed warrior and that of women or children—between the blood of the black, white, and colored men—between the blood of savage Seminoles and that of the Anglo-Saxon pious Christian. Also, a statement of the number of bloodhounds and their conductors, imported by this Government, or by the authorities of Florida, from the Island of Cuba, and the cost of that importation. Also, whether a further importation of the same heroic race into the State of Maine, to await the contingency of a contested Northeastern boundary question, is contemplated, or only to set an example to be followed by our possible adversary in the event of a conflict. Whether measures have been taken to secure exclusively to ourselves the employment of this auxilary force, and whether he deems it expedient to extend to the said bloodhounds and their posterity the benefit of the pension laws.

Mr. BOYD demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the resalution; which were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS said, inasmuch as the yeas and nays were ordered, he would wish to explain before the question was taken.

The resolution, in consequence, was laid over under the rule.

Sir, if any other member than the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts had offered this resolution, I would have thought him a fit subject for the dark cell of a lunatic asylum. Or if his reason was evidently so as to prevent such a conclusion, and knowing that he had read the communication of the Secretary of War, (a document which has been lying on our desks for some weeks,) I would have thought he was wilfully, designedly, and maliciously, attempting to practice a base fraud upon the American people, and a vile slander upon the Administration.

I presume it is not the intention of the Secretary of War to enrol the Spanish bloodhounds of Florida with the pension soldiers of the Revolution. When the time comes that dogs must be enrolled with men, I can tell you a list on which they will be placed. I mean the black list. The list of those who violated the Constitution, trampled upon the sacred rights of the American people, and debased the purity of the elective franchise in 1824, by the appointment of a man to the highest and most responsible office known to our Government, who was not of the people's choice.

It is a principle in ethics and philosophy, that there is a time and place for every thing; and it is a principle in propriety that every thing should be in its place. If dogs are to be enrolled with men, let them be enrolled with those who have disgraced their stations and dishonored their Government. But let patriots be enrolled with patriots.

If the solicitude manifested on the subject of the employment of bloodhounds in Florida be not the result of morbid humanity and Christian sympathy, or the whining, pining, sniffling cants of hypocrisy and demagoguism, when had it its beginning?

I ask your attention while I read the conclusion of a proclamation of the pious Governor of Pennsylvania in 1764, and also the conclusion of the ordinance of the court, and the proclamation of his Excellency, William Shirley, Governor of the puritans of Massachusetts, still more celebrated for their piety, in 1744, at a time when piety held so high a seat that the man who would so far forget himself as to kiss his wife on Sunday, was subject to the payment of a heavy fine, and, for aught I know, corporeal punishment. But here are the extracts:

"AND WHEREAS, it is necessary for the better carrying on offensive Operations against our Indian Enemies, and bringing the unhappy war with them to a speedy issue, that the greatest Encouragement should be given to all His Majesty's Subjects to exert and use their utmost endeavors to pursue, attack, take and destroy our said Enemy Indians; I DO HEREBY DECLARE AND PROMISE, That there shall be paid, out of the Moneys lately granted for His Majesty's Use, to all and every Person and Persons not in the Pay of this Province, the following several and respective PREMIUMS and BOUNTIES for the PRISONERS and SCALPS of the enemy Indians, that shall be taken or killed within the Bounds of this Province, as limited by the Royal Charter, or in Pursuit from within the said Bounds; that is to say,

"For every MALE INDIAN ENEMY, above Ten Years old, who shall be taken Prisoner, and delivered at any Forts garrisoned by the Troops in the Pay of this Province, or at any of the County Towns, to the Keeper of the Common Gaols there, the Sum of ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY SPANISH DOLLARS, or PIECES OF EIGHT.

"For every FEMALE INDIAN ENEMY, taken Prisoner and brought in as aforesaid; and for every MALE INDIAN ENEMY, of Ten Years old or under, taken Prisoner and delivered as aforesaid, the Sum of ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY PIECES OF EIGHT.

"For the SCALP of every MALE INDIAN ENEMY, and above the age of Ten Years, produced as evidence of their being killed, the Sum of ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FOUR PIECES OF EIGHT. And "For the SCALP of every FEMALE INDIAN ENEMY above the age of Ten Years, produced as evidence of their being killed, the Sum of FIFTY PIECES OF EIGHT.

"AND that there shall be paid to every Officer or Officers, Soldier or Soldiers, as are or shall be in the Pay of this Province, who shall take, bring in, and produce, any INDIAN ENEMY PRISONER or SCALP, as aforesaid, ONE HALF of the said several and respective PREMIUMS and BOUNTIES

"Given under my hand and Great Seal of the said Province, at Philadelphia, the Seventh day of July, in the Fourth year of His Majesty's Reign, and in the reign of our LORD one thousand seven hundred and Sixty-Four.

JOHN PENN.

By His Honour's Command.
JOSEPH SHIPPEN, junior, Secretary.
GOD Save the KING."

So much for pious Pennsylvania; now for the puritans.

"On the 26th of October last the General Court of this Province voted, that there shall be paid out of the public Treasury, to any Company, party, or person singly, of his Majesty's subjects belonging to or residing within this Province, who shall voluntarily, and at their own proper cost and charge, go out and kill a male Indian of the age of twelve years or upwards, of the tribe of St. Johns or Cape Sables, after the twenty-sixth day of October last past, and before the last day of June, anno Domini one thousand seven hundred and forty-five, (or for such part of that term as the War shall continue,) in any place to the Eastward of a line to be fixed by the Governour and His Majesty's Council of this Province, somewhere to the Eastward of Penobscot, and produce his scalp in evidence of his death, the sum of one hundred pounds in bills of credit of this Province of the New Tenor, and the sum of one hundred and five pounds in said bills for any male of the like age who shall be taken Captive, and delivered to the Order of the Captain-General to be at disposal and for the use of the Government; and the sum of fifty pounds in said bills, for women; and the like sum for children under the age of twelve years killed in fight; and fifty five pounds for such of them as shall be take prisoners, together with the plunder.

And upon the second day of November instant, His Excellency, with the advice and consent of the Council, issued a proclamation for giving public notice of the said encouragement; wherein they have also fixed the line (to the Eastward of which the said Indians may be slain or taken, or made prisoners) which line is to begin on the sea shore at three leagues distance eastwardly from the Easternmost part of the mouth of Passamaquoddy river, and thence to run North into the country through the Province of Nova Scotia to the river St. Lawrence.

Sir, I would like to comment on these extracts, but I must leave that to those who may read them, for I have already consumed too much of the time of the committee. Permit me to conclude, by returning my sincere thanks for the patience and attention with which I have been heard.

SPEECH OF MR. RIVES,

OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives, February 26 1840—

In favor of the proposition of Mr. JOHNSON of Tennessee, to instruct the Committee of Elections to report, forthwith, which five of the ten individuals claiming seats from the State of New Jersey received the greatest number of votes at the election of 1838, and in reply to Mr. SMITH of Connecticut.

After Mr. SMITH took his seat,

Mr. RIVES rose and said:

Nothing, Mr. Speaker, but the importance of the subject under consideration, could induce me, under present circumstances—the House being fatigued, as it must be, by the elaborate remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. SMITH]—to detain it with any additional remarks; but I feel it a duty I owe, not only to myself, but to the people I represent, to let it be known what I have done, and also what I think we should do, in relation to the New Jersey case.

In order, said Mr. R. that we may not be led off from the plain subject at issue, I beg leave, in the first place, to state the circumstances under which we met here at the beginning of the session. This is done for the purpose of comparing with each other the principles and actions of the two parties which divide this House.

Long before the meeting of Congress, much was said throughout the United States about the "election" and "returns" of persons to represent the people of New Jersey in the present House of Representatives—it being charged, on the one hand, that the return was in conflict with the election; and on the other, that if such was the fact, "it could, and ought to be, corrected by the House, it being the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications, of its own members." It was also said, prior to our arrival here, that an effort would be made by us to exclude the persons who were commissioned by the Governor, and to force into their seats persons who had no evidence of their election. Now, although we believed that the Governor had usurped powers that did not belong to him, and had, in defiance of the Constitution of the United States and the laws of his State, returned persons to this House whom the people had refused to elect, what did we, the Administration party, do?

Fearing that we might be wrong, and fearing that we might be charged with sacrificing principle to party purposes, if we permitted the persons who claimed seats by virtue of their election by the people to come in as members of this House, and anxious to occupy ground that ought to keep ourselves above suspicion, we thought it best to adopt the course recommended, at the last session, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] which recommendation was in these words:

That every member of the House of Representatives of the United States ought, before taking his seat therein, to produce at the Clerk's table, or to deposite in the Clerk's office, the credentials by virtue of which he claims his seat; and in all cases of contested election, no member ought to be permitted to vote until the House, upon a report from the standing Committee of Elections, or by the vote of the majority of the members present, being a quorum of the House, shall have decided which of the claimants is entitled to the contested seat.

This course, we know, too, was sustained by precedent—Moore and Letcher having been required to stand aside till their case was acted on by the Committee of Elections.

However anxious we might be to elect a Speaker, Clerk, and Printer, whose politics might be in accordance with our own, believing that this was the safe course, and one calculated to keep us free from the charge that the Opposition made against us, we proposed that both parties should stand aside, though we thought the returns ought to have been founded on the election, and that if they were not so, they must be illegal.

For these reasons we took a course that has prevented New Jersey from having her full representation up to this time, believing, as we did, it would be better for her to have no representation than to be misrepresented.

But what was the course of the opposite party? Those men who received the certificates of the Governor, though no man ever said, here or elsewhere, (so far as I have heard,) that they received a majority of the whole number of votes cast by the people of the State—these men who succeeded in obtaining returns against the Constitution of the United States, against the laws of the State, and the wishes of the people, must have seats at all hazards. This was the course of the Opposition. But was there a man of the Administration party who was for giving seats, under the then state of things, to those who brought with them evidence of their having received a majority of votes? Not one. You recollect, Mr. Speaker, what was the astonishment of the Opposition after the House refused to let the "broad seal" men qualify, that we did not propose the qualification of those who came here on the return of the facts of the case. Not one of us, however, advocated such a measure, either in that case, or the one from Pennsylvania. In the latter case, we had before us double returns, and although the Whig candidate was not returned in the regular way, his political friends were for counting all the ballots that were in the ballot boxes, relying not on the return, but on the votes, whether put in before or during the election; and they succeeded, too, in having him qualified, by the aid of some three or four of our party, who were at the time induced to think the election had been fairly conducted.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to examine somewhat into the course that has been pursued by the gentleman from Connecticut, and in doing this I intend to show that he has advocated the conduct of an officer who has acted in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States, and in conflict with the laws of New Jersey.

What does the Constitution of the United States say in relation to the election of Members of Congress? "That the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States." And that the "times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof." And, furthermore, that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Now let us see what New Jersey did under the authority given to regulate the "times, places, and manner of holding elections" in that State?

After fixing the times and places, and directing by law the mode of voting, and designating the officers who shall conduct elections, their law is, that,

After the poll is closed, the judge and inspectors shall, together with the clerk (township clerk) of the election, proceed, without delay, to take an account of, and cast up the votes given for each candidate, and shall make separate lists of the same; which list they shall sign, certify, seal up, direct, and transmit to the clerk of the county, who shall attend at the court-house of the county, on the Saturday next after the day of election, for the purpose of receiving the same, which list shall be delivered to him before five o'clock in the afternoon of said day, which said clerk shall then proceed in a public manner to make one general list of all the candidates voted for as aforesaid, together with the number of votes received for each of them, and shall transmit the same, at the expense of the State, to the Governor, or person administering the Government, within seven days thereafter, having first caused a duplicate thereof to be filed in his office, together with the lists from the said townships.

The same law makes it the duty of the Governor, or person administering the Government and Privy Council, to determine the six persons who have the greatest number of votes from the whole State for Representatives in Congress of the United States from that State; which six persons the Governor, or person administering the Government, shall forthwith commission, under the great seal of the State, to represent the State in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

The laws of this State further provide:

That if the certified lists of votes given for Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States, shall not be received from the clerks of any of the counties of this State, by the Governor, or person administering the Government, within seven days after the day prescribed by law for the casting up of the votes, making a list thereof, and certifying the same, by the clerks of the respective counties in this State, it shall be the duty of the Governor forthwith to send express to the county or counties from which such certified lists of votes have not been received, and procure the same at the expense of the State.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us inquire whether the persons who were commissioned by the Governor, were "chosen by the people" of New Jersey. That being done, it can readily be decided whether the complaint should be against us, or against the Governor of that State, for not having on this floor a representation equal to her constitutional right. We contend that a return, unless it be founded on an election by the people, is not sufficient to entitle persons to occupy seats in this House as the Representatives of the people—that the returning officer of an election is nothing more than the instrument of the law, or the organ through which is conveyed to us the names of the chosen agents—that votes are better evidence of the popular will than returns, when the polls are introduced to falsify and invalidate the returns—that as one party came with the commissions, and the other with the facts of the case, and said to us, "judge of the elections and returns," it was our duty to do so. And hence it was, that we told them to stand aside until there could be an examination into the matter.

In committee, Mr. Speaker, we have had a most laborious time of it—not to settle the real issue, but to sustain a new issue; not to determine which party received the greatest number of votes, but to devise the plan by which the returning officer could be protected from exposure. The "broad seal" men found they held only the shadow of a claim; that the evidence proved they had been appointed by the Governor—not elected by the people—and although we had, in the first instance, committed, in the estimation of those men, such a "palpable outrage on a sovereign State," they have shrunk from the ground first occupied, and resorted to a scheme that was not heard of till last November, some thirteen or fourteen months after the election.

Sir, the member from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] complains heavily of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] which requires that the committee shall report forthwith which of the five persons received the greatest number of votes from the whole State. Why so much vehemence? Why resist the instruction with so much feeling, when he knows there is no dispute now about that fact; and the chairman, in whom he has so much confidence, has told the House that that duty can be performed in two hours? Is it because he is unwilling that the facts of the case shall be published to enable the community to see where the corruption lies? Does he desire that the various Legislatures to which the New Jersey resolutions have been sent, shall act in the dark, when, by reporting and printing, they will have light? So far from complaining myself, as a member of the committee, I rejoice at it, give the gentleman my thanks, and hope the House will adopt his amendment.

Print the papers, Mr. Speaker, and you will see that, by the agency of two Whig clerks, the votes polled in two townships were suppressed, in violation of the law I have quoted. Print them, and you will find the returns made by the township officers were filed in the offices of the e Whig clerks, and that they had the humiliating duty to perform of giving certified copies of them to the persons injured by the suppression. Print them, and it will be seen that the Governor knew, when he counted the votes, those cast at Millville and South Amboy had not been returned, and yet he would not "send express for them." Print them, and it will appear that, as these Whig clerks would not send them, the township officers sent them, and a portion of his council insisted on their being counted—but all in vain. Yes, Mr. Speaker, adopt the amendment we are considering, and you will soon see, by examining other townships returns, that, if Whig majorities had been given at Millville and South Amboy, they would never have been suppressed. Adopt it, and every one who is not wilfully blind must come to the conclusion that the Governor commissioned five persons, when he knew that five others had received a majority of the whole number of votes cast in the election.

I have, Mr. Speaker, many reasons for desiring speedy action on this subject, and a few more of them I will present to the House. Among other things, it has been said by the "broad seal" men, or appointees of this immaculate Governor, that by our act "we disgraced the history of a regular representative Government." This is said by men, too, who never had the audacity to deny the fact that other persons got a majority of all the votes cast in the election, and when—so conscious were they that they could not retain their seats—they had proposed to the adverse party that all of them should resign their respective rights to seats, and have a new election. Now, do you think, Mr. Speaker, that they were of opinion they could retain their seats, except by a "lawless and revolutionary power?" No; never would they have made such a proposition, but for their looking on it as a hopeless claim. Let the report come in, sir, I beseech the House, and have the corruption exposed to the world.

I am unwilling, for another reason, that this iniquitous conduct to which I have alluded shall remain locked up in the committee room till the 2nd Monday in April. When this outrage was first perpetrated on the people of New Jersey, the Governor said it was not in his power to repair the injury done by the two clerks of whom I have spoken; but it was the duty of the House of Representatives, and he hoped it would exercise its right of judging of the "election and returns," and do ample justice to the parties. We took on ourselves the discharge of this constitutional duty, as we were bound to do, and pray what does the usurper say now? In the most imperious manner, he says: "whether my decision in granting the certificates was right or wrong, Congress, at all events, is bound to receive the credentials thus furnished, as the mandate of the State," &c. And his arrogance did not stop here; he was not content with saying this to the Legislature of his own State, but advises an appeal to the several States to enter their solemn protest against the usurped powers of Congress. Sir, the boldness of the man is equalled only by the enormity of the crime he has perpetrated. Not only has he undertaken to abuse us for keeping his Whig friends out of their seats, but has assailed, in a most wanton manner, the Secretary of his State—and for what? Because, when called on by the persons who were elected by the people, for a copy of the papers that were before the Governor and on file in his office, he had the honesty to furnish them. If he had had an "approving conscience"—if he had supposed the facts of the case justified the return he made, is it possible that he could have desired a suppression of the facts on which he came to his conclusion? Never. He knew he had returned men—not because they had been elected, but because they were Whigs.

Again: the Governor and his appointees say, it was "for party purposes" they were kept out of their seats; and that charge, of itself, independently of all other considerations, would cause me to be anxious to have the papers printed, that the community may judge whether it was not the wish of one party to preserve the purity of elections, and of the other to invade the representative principle of our Government.

One party believe the people to be capable of self-government, and that it is the duty of this House to protect them in the exercise of that right, against invasion, from whatever quarter it may come. The other, however, disregarding the popular will, are willing to receive, as members on this floor, persons as Representatives when they know they have not been elected. One of these parties asks for light, with a view to a correct decision—the other prefers to give judgment in the dark. Yes, Mr. Speaker, party commenced this thing, and party must end it. Republicans elected Representatives, and a Whig Governor refused to commission them. In that situation the question reached us, and if there be more members in this House who are disposed to be governed by the Constitution and laws, than there are of those who disregard every moral, civil, and political restraint, New Jersey will soon have on this floor men who were "chosen by the people."

Sir, I have witnessed, with some degree of mortification, the political aspect of this question, not only in New Jersey and in this House, but in my native State. You have noticed, no doubt, that our Whig Governor, at the request of the Governor of New Jersey, has submitted the case to the Whig branch of our Legislature, with a request that condemnation may be passed on us. And pray, sir, what was the fate of a proposition of one of our friends, who desired to act understandingly on the subject, and, with that view, moved a call on the Governor of New Jersey for copies of all the papers that were before him and his Council at the time he made the return? Not one Whig, I believe, in that body, voted with him, although anxious, no doubt, to pass judgment on us for excluding both sets of claimants till the committee could examine into the truth of the case.

[Here Mr. RANDOLPH, the only member on the floor from New Jersey, enquired of Mr. RIVES whether a portion of the Administration party did not also vote against the resolution in his State Legislature.]

Yes, said Mr RIVES, some of them did vote against the resolution, believing, as they did, it was a subject with which they had no right to interfere, the House of Representatives being the judge, under the Constitution of the United States; and not believing it possible that any Governor in this Union would pay so little respect to the Constitution, the laws, and his oath of office, as to commission men to represent a State, when the people had not only not elected, but had, by a considerable majority, rejected them.

And here permit me to say, Mr. Speaker, that this act of Governor Pennington inflicts an injury on the character of the office he fills, and is calculated to lessen the confidence we have heretofore had in the acts of the Chief Executive officers of the States. We have been taught to give "full faith and credit" to the public acts of officers thus highly promoted; but this usurpation of power will cause us hereafter to look with distrust on the official acts of these officers. In this point of view, however much the lawless act we are discussing may be deprecated, it may turn out to be serviceable, as it is calculated to increase the vigilance of the people, and arouse them to the maintenance of their rights. It is, and has been for several years, the policy of one party, (that which claims the right of the Governor to appoint members of Congress,) to mystify and mislead the public mind. In this they frequently succeed for a while; but give the people time—give them light—and they invariably get right "in the long run."

I am anxious, for another reason, that a report shall be made forthwith, as is proposed by the amendment, and that the evidence shall be speedily printed. It is that a distinguished citizen of Virginia—I mean the head of "the armed neutral party," who has been an enemy in disguise for more than two years, has at length the manliness to come out in the open field and rank himself with the enemy of popular rights. He, too, has joined in the tirade against us for undertaking to protect the people in their representative rights; and as he was once the favorite son of Virginia, and may yet have some influence, I am anxious to disarm him, by a publication of the facts connected with this great constitutional question. He, just now, when the Whig convention is about to meet in Richmond to nominate electors for President and Vice President, has drawn aside the veil, and after many other things, says: "When to these, and to other evidences of contemptuous disregard for the rights and dignity of the States, to which I have already referred, we add the bold act of party power, by which the President's friends in the other House of Congress did not hesitate to disfranchise a sovereign State of the Union of her constitutional right of representation, in order to effect the election of a party Speaker—a disfranchisement which to this day is continued, and may be indefinitely prolonged—we may form some idea of the modesty, as well as justice, with which the President and his party have presumed to appropriate to themselves the name of State Rights Republicans."

Now, Mr. Speaker, although he has thus assailed our motives, and may thereby cause his new allies to see that he is trustworthy, it will not induce me to say what I think caused him, at this particular time, to lay aside his previous "delicacy," and become the champion of "executive supremacy," against law, Constitution, and the sovereign will of a majority of the people of a State. His abandonment of principles we thought he once possessed, and joining the Harrison party, will not induce me to say more, than that, when he sees the evidence, it is to be hoped his good sense will induce him to recant what he has said on this subject. For he cannot, will not, adhere to the odious doctrine now for the first time introduced into this country, that the House of Representatives has not a right to "judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." His new born zeal has made him leap in the dark in his transformation from a "no party" to a "party man," and has caused him to forget in what "the sovereignty of a State" consists. He and I, Mr. Speaker, on a memorable occasion, when it was thought the Union was in danger—when so much was said about sovereignty, thought alike—"that sovereignty was in the people of the respective States." But how is it now? I adhere to that doctrine, and he believes, with his new allies, that the sovereignty of New Jersey is in the "broad seal" of Governor Pennington—that the sovereignty of the State is the will of one man, and not the will of the people.

We have been charged in various directions with having disfranchised a State, and our acts are nullities in the estimation of the madcaps who are writhing under the apprehension that justice is likely to be done to the people whose rights have been thus outraged.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, in our anxiety to keep ourselves above suspicion, and to do nothing that could seem to operate injuriously on either party, we did do wrong, and I am anxious to repair the injury without delay. Our error was this: being told that certain men had been elected by receiving a majority of votes, and the fact not being disputed by the adverse party, we ought forthwith to have disregarded the fraudulent returns, and have given the seats to the people's chosen representatives. Let me beg of the House to direct a report to be brought in—see the evidence—act on it, and give the seats to the true and lawful representatives. Do this—promulge the facts—expose the usurper—save the Constitution—quiet the people—and stand justified before all the friends of a representative Government.

Sir, connive at conduct like this, and the consequences will be direful indeed! Sanction conduct like this, and you will be justly chargeable with recreancy to the most sacred principle on which this Government rests. Approve this act of which I am complaining, and you withdraw from New Jersey the guarantee that she shall be secured in "a Republican form of Government." Let this act go uncondemned, and you will have failed to protect this much injured people "against invasion" of their rights. Sanction this proceeding, and you do not protect the people of that State "against domestic violence." Check this thing, Mr. Speaker, or you will see, before many years, civil wars in the place of peace and quietude, and mobs regulating the affairs of the nation. But let us abandon for a while these melancholy forbodings, and consider the subject in another aspect.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] has labored with a zeal worthy of a better cause, to prevent any report from the committee before the second Monday in April next, at which time the parties are to return with the evidence they are now collecting. I beg to remind him that the evidence they are procuring will not affect the present question; that will be confined to the ultimate right. The evidence is complete as to the question who received a majority of votes, and that fact only is contemplated to be reached by the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON] They are separate questions, and I hope they will not be blended; for if the persons who were commissioned by the Governor received a majority of votes, they were properly returned, and ought to be occupying their seats.

If, however, they did not, they were illegally returned, and the others ought to have the seats. The Governor of New Jersey has appealed to the various Legislatures to sustain him in the return he made, and we desire to show that his right to commission did not authorize him to do so without the happening of something which the evidence proved did not occur. Bear in mind the argument (if argument it may be called) of the member from Connecticut. He says it would be gross injustice to the parties, for us to do any thing in their absence, as they left here under a belief that there would be no action on the subject before their return. A complaint of this sort, the gentlemen ought to know, cannot be founded on the facts of the case. For the committee, to prevent such a conclusion, adopted a resolution in which it is stated, "Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the committee from making a preliminary report at any stage of its proceedings." But suppose what the member has assumed as true, had in reality been so, his remarks about "breach of faith," would not apply to me; for I wish it distinctly understood that we (the Republican members of the committee) made ineffectual resistance to the measure, on the ground that the committee had no right, under the authority given us by the House "to send for persons and papers," to send the parties home to take depositions; and it was my opinion, from the commencement of the investigation, that there was no law in New Jersey under which evidence could be taken to prove that illegal votes had been cast in the election. All that New Jersey had done to protect the ballot boxes against bad votes, was to state the necessary qualifications of voters, and to impose on her sworn election officers penalties, if they received illegal votes.

My doctrine is, that, whilst in all elections of member of Congress—whether the voting be viva voce, or by ballot, some will be given in that are not legal, they must be considered lawful, until they are proved to be illegal votes. In the one mode of voting, there is but little difficulty in proving votes to be spurious; but where the laws require, as is the case in New Jersey, that the secret ballot shall be used, and a fine of twenty dollars can be recovered of a person who attempts to vote without a right to do so, it must be exceedingly difficult to introduce positive evidence to establish for whom a man may have cast his vote.

Sir, I agree with my colleague, [Mr. BOTTS,] who, I regret to perceive, is not in his seat, "that the people of New Jersey have never contemplated such a thing." "In that State, (said he, on a former occasion,) they vote by general ticket, and by ballot; and the idea of canvassing a whole entire State, and taking testimony in every part of it, in a disputed election, never entered their minds as being reasonable or probable." Whilst, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman in this, I must insist on going further back in the inquiry than he thought, at the time alluded to, we had a right to do. He said: "I say there is no contest here, and never can be one; the case has been finally and conclusively settled in the State of New Jersey. This is a question to which the principle of res judicata strictly applies; and there is no appeal from it, simply because there is no law on earth applicable to the subject, either State or Federal."

Sir, there is a law in that State which required that an election should be held on the 9th and 10th days of October, 1838; and the election was accordingly held. There is a law which requires that township officers, after having received the votes, shall make a return of them to the county clerks; and they did so. There is a law which makes it the duty of the county clerks to sum up all the votes returned to him from the township officers, and send a general list of them to the Governor of the State; and all except two did their duty. There is a law which requires the Governor to count the votes, and to commission the persons who may have received the greatest number of votes from the whole State, and the failure of the Governor to do so has produced a "contested election;" and, as the persons who received a majority of votes could not get their commissions in New Jersey, they have come to the constitutional judges to get their seats. The difference between my colleague's position and my own is this: He thinks, or rather once thought, we could not go legally behind the returns. I think it proper that we should go back to the elections, and that we are bound to judge of the "elections," that we may determine on the correctness of the "returns;" for, to say "that there is no appeal from the decision of the Governor, is the doctrine that the "King can do no wrong." In opposition to that, we say "election" first, and then the "return."

It gives me pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to allude to another remark made by my colleague, and give it my most hearty concurrence. After speaking of the situation of New Jersey, relative to her election laws, he says:

> But it happens, in this case, that there is no law upon the subject of contested elections, or, at least, was not at the time of this election, nor was there one for six months after; and that surely cannot apply to this case, it being, in the first place, an ex post facto law.

With a knowledge of this fact, I did not consider evidence that had been taken under it legal evidence, nor did I think the committee had power to order the taking of any under it. Consequently, I was opposed to sending the parties home for the purpose, and then voted against that measure. But the majority of the committee overruled us, and not only authorized that evidence should be taken under that law, but directed them to take it under a law which was about to be passed by the Legislature to enable their brother Whigs to get into the ballot boxes.

Mr. Speaker, I must notice one other portion of the speech of the member from Connecticut, that you may see the kind of scraps of which it is made. Recollect, the greater part of it was against any action until the month of April; and it would be most terrible treatment to give any one seats from New Jersey at this time. But before he closed, he said:

> Upon what principle did our fathers fight out the battles of the Revolution? They would not suffer their money to be taken from them by an Assembly in which they were not represented. I insist that if you attempt to take a dollar of the money of the people of New Jersey, they have a right to resist the imposition upon the fields of Trenton, Princeton, and Monmouth.

Now, sir, what is the amount of this? You must not give New Jersey her representation before the month of April next; and, in the mean time, if you appropriate any money, the people of that State "have a right to resist the imposition upon the fields of Trenton, Princeton, and Monmouth." This is truly sublime; to see the Governor with his minority at "Trenton, Princeton, and Monmouth," fighting us here, would indeed be a fanciful scene I presume, however, the gentleman had prepared a speech which he expected to deliver before the subject was referred to the committee; and that idea having occurred to him then as excellent, he concluded to-day it ought not to be lost, and has made a flourish of it, without regard to its applicability.

Mr. Speaker, I have heretofore adverted to the Governor of Virginia; and I now propose to take further notice of him. The gentleman from Connecticut, to prove the revolutionary character of our conduct, has quoted from Governor Campbell's message to the Legislature of Virginia, and says it is unanswerable. Now, as he was of the "armed neutral party," and has also joined the Harrison party in the clamor against the right of the people to elect their Representatives, and looks on the act of the House of Representatives as an improper interference with the "sovereignty" of the "broad seal," I beg leave to comment on the paragraph alluded to. It is this, if I am not mistaken:

> Should the practice obtain in the Congress of the United States, of which this case is believed to be the first example, of one portion of the members returned according to the laws of their State, undertaking to exclude other portions of members having similar and legal authentications of their membership from a participation in the organization of the House and the election of its officers, and from holding their seats until an adversary claim to them shall have been regularly adjudicated, it is obvious to perceive that such a course has no limit or principle but force, and must ultimately result in revolutionary violence.

This shows you the difficulties into which men get themselves by obtruding their opinions on the public without knowing any thing about the subjects they discuss. I say this, because the Governor either knows nothing of the merits of this controversy, or he has committed the offence of wilful misrepresentation. Not knowing the facts, he had to assume what was false to get to his conclusion in support of Governor Pennington. He expresses himself in such a way as to create the belief that persons "were legally returned," when, in fact, they were illegally returned. If persons had been returned who were elected, there would not have been any contest before Congress. The returns, however, not being founded on the election, but against the election, they are considered by us as nullities, and on that point only the entire merits of the question are to turn. It is true, this is the first case of the kind that has occurred in this country where the people of a State have been deprived of their representation by their own Governor—and as our Governor very justly says, "it is obvious to perceive that such a course has no limit or principle but force, and must ultimately result in revolutionary violence."

The sin we have committed is of a most "damning character," and is calculated to produce "revolution." And, pray, what terrible act is it that is to produce the revolution spoken of? I must tell you, Mr. Speaker. Five Whigs were sent here to aid in electing a Speaker, a Clerk, and a Printer, and we would not let them do it. Because we were prompt in the discharge of our duty, and would not suffer them to to do any mischief, we are denounced by the Whig party in every portion of the Union. Till now, returns have not been looked on as very essential—election was the thing to control; but now we are told that even the sovereignty of a State is in the return—election is nothing. Mr. Speaker, let me ask you how you got into this House as a member? Was it by virtue of the return of our Governor, or by virtue of your election by the people? I, perhaps, know more on that subject than you are aware of; for I went to the Clerk's office the other day to see whether the "broad seal" of Virginia had been sent on, that it might be known that we were members of Congress; but it was not there, and we are in a perilous situation, in consequence of it; as we are resting on authority that is repudiated as being too old fashioned for the times. I hate to alarm any one, sir, but it is my duty to tell you, that you, myself, and eighteen of our colleagues, are here with no better evidence of rights to seats than VROOM, DICKERSON, and Co. have, for we are resting not on "broad seals," but on the poll books.

Before I dismiss our Governor, I desire to put a few cases to him to show the alarming tendency of his doctrine. In November next the great contest closes, and the commissioners of the respective counties, who may have been appointed by his Excellency in each of the counties of the State, to conduct the election of "electors of President and Vice President," shall, "within two days after the polls shall be closed, ascertain the number of votes given for each person, who shall be voted for as an elector."

This is the law, and they comply with it.

The said commissioners shall, within three days after closing the polls, as aforesaid, make out three copies of a return in a certain form.

That is the law, and they do it.

Which returns shall be sealed and subscribed by the commissioners holding the election. One of the said returns shall be delivered to some person among the twenty three, who shall have therein the greatest number of votes; another shall be filed in the clerk's office of the county electing; and the third shall be transmitted to the Governor and Council; all of which shall be done within fifteen days after the same shall be made out; and the Governor and Council shall proceed to ascertain from the said returns the twenty-three persons having the greatest number of votes throughout the State, and to advertise their names in such gazettes as they may think proper.

I wish it borne in mind, "that advertising their names in such gazettes as they may think proper," is "the broad seal;" and that the commissioners do "transmit to the Governor and Council" the returns. Now let me ask the Governor whether he would count all the votes, or would he presume some of them illegal, and refuse to count them? Would he, if informed by a political friend, that some "aliens" had voted in certain counties, reject all the votes polled in those counties? Would he, if certain commissioners were to refuse to send to him the returns from certain counties, and the clerks of those counties were to send to him certified copies of the returns made to their offices, showing the number of votes cast therein, refuse to count them? Would he, if the commissioners of certain counties refused to send the returns, and the clerks of those counties sent to him, properly authenticated, copies of the returns made to them by such commissioners, and that some one of the twenty-three persons who had received therein the greatest number of votes also presented his returns, showing they agreed with those sent by the clerks, refuse to count them? Would he, if there were a law requiring him "to send express," in the event of the failure of any of said commissioners to return all the votes cast in their counties, refuse to do so? Would he, because he desires the election of a Federalist in preference to a Republican, issue his proclamation declaring Federalists elected, when he knew that Republicans had received "the greatest number of votes throughout the State?" If he answers in one way, he ought to support the Governor of New Jersey; but if he answers the other way, he ought to sustain us. For I can assure our Governor, that if the Chief Executive officer of Virginia were to commission persons to vote for Harrison, when the people had chosen Van Buren men, his right to use the great seal would not protect him. He would have to make his "tracks very thin" to avoid the wrath of a people "who know their rights, and knowing, dare maintain them." They claim to possess the sovereignty of that State; and this new fashioned doctrine, in a representative Government, that the "King can do no wrong," will make them "buckle on their armor, and rise in the majesty of their strength."

Sir, if a Governor be permitted, with impunity, to do as Governor Pennington has done in the Congressional election, the same game will be played in Presidential elections. And it so happens that, in the State of New Jersey, the election of Electors of President and Vice President takes place at the times and places of holding elections of members of Congress, every fourth year. In November next, they come on at the same times and places, with the same officers to conduct the elections, and the same voters to choose "Electors," in the one case, and members of Congress, in the other.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me call your attention more particularly to the dangers of this doctrine, advocated by the Federal party, than I have heretofore done.

The party of which I speak, you know, sustain the Governor, and thereby say he is not bound to count all the votes in a Congressional election. We deny that, and claim to be "judges of the elections, returns, and qualifications" of its members. In this case, there is a tribunal to which the people can and have appealed, to recover their right to representation in this body. If you sanction the doctrine in this case, you must sanction it in the election of Electors of President and Vice President; for votes that ought not to be counted for Congressmen ought not to be counted for the President.

Suppose, then, at the coming election in that State, enough of the township returns should be suppressed to defeat the popular will in the Presidential election. In that case, there would be no constitutional tribunal for them to appeal to for a redress of the grievance; and then would come the "tug of war," the worst sort of war—a civil war. Yes, Mr. Speaker, there would be battles more dreadful than those of "Trenton, Princeton, and Monmouth," during our struggle for independence against a foreign foe.

To prevent such a state of things from occurring in this country, I beseech the House to quiet the people of New Jersey by acting forthwith; for, up to this time, they have acted with great forbearance—wishing the judges, the constitutional judges, quietly to settle the controversy. Refuse to do it—refuse to condemn the usurper—and you enrage an already excited people, and thereby endanger the safety of the Governor himself. Do it, and you defend the Constitution, check usurpation, quiet dissensions, and protect your consciences against self reproach.

Sir, it may be thought that I show too much feeling on this subject. I do feel, and feel sensibly, the stab that has been aimed at the living—yes, the vital—principle, by which alone can be kept alive a Representative Government. It is, I hope, a proper feeling that animates me; that which should be felt by every American citizen who has any regard for a Republican Government. If the Governor of New Jersey had sent men here who had not been candidates, who had not been voted for at all by the people, the act would have been much more sufferable than sending the persons he did. The persons he sent were candidates; they were rejected by the people, and the Governor knew it. If he had sent individuals who had not been voted for at all, the ingenuity of man is such that some defence might have been attempted. In the case that did occur, the evidence is positive that the people did not only not choose, but absolutely rejected them; and none but the most reckless partisans will even talk about its propriety. If, however, he had sent men without being voted for, his friends could have had a presumption to stand on. They could have said they were very suitable, being talented, &c. and that, if they had been candidates, would certainly have been elected. I hesitate not to say, that I would much sooner attempt to sustain him in the supposed case than in the one that is now disturbing this whole nation. Sir, this subject increases in importance as you become acquainted with the circumstances attending it; and tyrants have trembled on their thrones for crimes far less offensive than this act of Governor ——.

Mr. Speaker, we ought to act, and that, too, without delay; for it has been said, out of this House and in it, that we cannot bind the people by acts that may pass during the disfranchisement of New Jersey; and it has also been said here, by how many I do not know, but I recollect the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and my colleague, [Mr. WISE,] that your election took place, when we had no right to elect. I differ with such as entertain these opinions; but to remove all difficulties, let New Jersey be no longer disfranchised, have the seats occupied, and then if gentlemen choose, we will elect a Speaker, and pass constitutional laws.

Mr. Speaker, this is not only a legal, but a great constitutional question we are called on to adjudicate, and I regret my inability to do justice to it; and although I would like to say more, I feel it my duty to refrain from it, as there are many others who wish to follow me. But before I conclude, I will make an appeal to the party in this House to which I am politically opposed.

Now, I beg you, I implore you, for the sake of our common country, the Constitution and union of the States; for the sake of the laws, the purity of elections, and harmony of our constituents; for the sake of justice, peace, and quietude, give to New Jersey her "chosen" representation. Do that—rebuke the usurper, and let it be seen that patriotism rides over the will one man, in this hall, and we shall have nothing to fear from internal commotions. But if you suffer yourselves to be led by your party predilections in performing the duty of judges, and will not suffer persons who are "duly chosen by the people," to take their seats, scenes will occur that will be deprecated by every patriot of the land. Americans are sensitive on this vitally important question; and from what occurred at Harrisburg, you may form some idea of the length to which they go in defence of a right that is "inestimable to them, and hateful to tyrants only."

And before I sit down, I must address myself to the party with which I act—the Republicans of this House—and remind them, that we alone are charged with having deprived New Jersey of her just weight on this floor. It is true we have been tardy, but the evidence will show the falsehood of the charge; and it is our duty to renew our exertions to get it printed. I beg of you, then, to be at your posts, and if I had not spoken, would desire you never to leave your seats without requiring the committee to report. But as it is, I intreat you to come here in the morning, resolved never to sleep before the proposed instructions are given; for this is a case more singular in its character than any that has heretofore been exhibited in the annals of our country. It is a case in which injustice has been done to a majority, and we alone can settle the matter in a peaceful mode. Be assured, if we do not, and in a short time too, violence and disorder may be the consequence; for, unless the stock has greatly degenerated since the Revolution, Jerseymen are of such stuff, that "creeds, tests, and anathemas, might be tried; stripes, fetters, and dungeons, might do their best; racks, flames, and gibbets, might exhaust all their powers;" and every effort to deprive them of their right to "elect," would end in miserable disappointment.

SPEECH OF MR. LUMPKIN,

OF GEORGIA.

In Senate, Thursday, March 19, 1840—In Executive session, on the treaty with the New York Indians.

Mr. SEVIER (chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs) having made a report and speech against the ratification of the treaty,

Mr. LUMPKIN rose and said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: In rising to advocate this treaty, and desiring, as I do, to reverse the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I am duly sensible of the magnitude and responsibility of my undertaking. The admitted ability, and great ingenuity, with which the chairman of the committee [Mr. SEVIER] has sustained his report in opposition to the treaty, and the indications of approbation manifested by Senators in every part of this chamber, to the speech and views submitted by the chairman, is well calculated to make me feel the full force of my position. Yes, sir, my position appears to be that of leading on a forlorn hope. But, sir, a sense of duty urges me on to the contest; and nothing less than my taking the lead will satisfy my friends in the Senate, who concur with me on this subject.

As a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs at the last session of Congress, (heavy as the task was,) I had examined this subject in all its parts and bearings, so far, at least, as I was capable of of investigating a subject so complex and difficult to be comprehended. At the present session I had not supposed it necessary to enter upon an entire reinvestigation of the subject, not deeming it necessary to go further back than to the action of the Senate on the subject at its last session. The Senate then expressed its sanction of this treaty, with the single proviso, that the President of the United States should first be satisfied that the assent of Seneca tribe of Indians had been given to the treaty, according to its true intent and meaning. And if we now sustain the views of the Senate, as expressed at its last session, our duty is narrowed down to the single question—has the assent of the Seneca chiefs to the treaty been thus obtained or not? This, sir, is the true issue now before the Senate, and the friends of the treaty should not suffer themselves to be diverted from that issue.

But, sir, the chairman of the committee, [Mr. SEVIER,] having occupied all the ground connected with this treaty, from the beginning, and especially every historical fact and circumstance connected with the subject, calculated to invalidate and bring it into disrepute, it therefore becomes the imperative duty of those who support the treaty, to travel over all the ground occupied by the Senator. The Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] having yesterday replied to that part of the chairman's speech, in reference to matters antecedent to the treaty of June 11, 1838, I do not deem it strictly necessary for me to go further back than the President of the United States has done in communicating the treaty to the Senate. It may, however, be proper to state, very briefly, how it happens that we have such a variety of parties in interest, connected with this treaty. Well, sir, as stated by the chairman of the committee, the States of Massachusetts and New York, in the year 1786, in an adjustment of their conflicting territorial claims, finally agreed that while New York should have the jurisdiction and government of a certain district of country, being, in part, the country embraced in the present treaty, Massachusetts should have the right to the soil, subject, however, to the occupant rights of the Indians then inhabiting the same. The pre-emptive right to these lands were sold by Massachusetts to Robert Morris, of Philadelphia, on the 11th of May, 1791, and are now represented by Ogden and Company of New York. This, sir, accounts for the agency of Massachusetts in connection with this treaty, and will cause me to be understood hereafter, when I speak of General Dearborn as the agent of Massachusetts, superintending the negotiation of this treaty in connection with Mr. Gillett, who acted as commissioner of the United States in making the treaty.

And now, sir, in the language of the President of the United States in communicating this treaty to the Senate, let me express my decided conviction, that the treaty will be alike beneficial to all the parties concerned; to the Indians, to the State in which the land is situated, and to the more general interest of the United States in consummating her policy in relation to Indian affairs. Now, sir, if I can demonstrate that this treaty is beneficial, and a blessing to all the parties in interest, shall we still refuse to sanction it? If I prove that its rejection will be highly detrimental to the best interest of the Indians, to the State of New York, and to the United States, shall we still refuse to ratify it? Sir, when I consider the moral degradation of these Indians, and reflect that they cannot escape from the destruction attendant on their continuance in their present abodes, I cannot estimate the value of immortal beings by dollars and cents. I cannot be altogether as strict in my inquiry in regard to the propriety of the United States incurring some expenditure, in an object so essential to the preservation of a remnant of a once powerful race.

The President of the United States informs you in his message, that this treaty presents the only prospect for the preservation of these people. He says: "Surrounded as they are, by all the influences which work their destruction, by temptation they cannot resist, and artifices they cannot counteract, they are rapidly declining," and "that where they are they must soon become extinct." And, sir, this statement of the President is fully sustained by both the Senators from New York, as well as by General Dearborn and Mr. Gillett, and every other gentleman with whom I have conversed, who is acquainted with the present and true condition of these people. And yet, sir, we find persons professing all that is benevolent, pious, and good, who are unwilling to let these people go. This treaty is truly recommended by the liberality of its provisions to the Indians. It gives them 1,824,000 acres of land in the Indian territory West, and the sum of $400,000 for their removal and subsistence, for education and agricultural purposes, the erection of mills and other necessary buildings, and the promotion of the mechanic arts; besides some other minor, but advantageous provisions. From the enumeration of the specific objects to which this money is to be applied, it is proper for me to remark here, that I take it for granted, that while these provisions of the treaty are munificent and bountiful to the Indians, that the expenditure must be gradual, and therefore cannot burden the Treasury.

It is believed, that ten thousand dollars will not be required from the Treasury in twelve months, to carry out the provisions of the treaty. A small sum only will be required at first, and will probably increase as the migration progresses.

In exchange, the Government obtains 435 000 acres of the best lands near Green Bay, lying on Fox river, and near the best port in Wiskonsin. This land is said to be in demand, and disconnects the white settlements which are already made in that country. The public interest would be greatly promoted by the early settlement of this 435,000 acres of land, with a white population; and if it could be brought into market, no doubt is entertained of its being readily sold and speedily settled by an industrious and enterprising population. At the Government price, (and it is believed that most of it would sell for more,) it would not only reimburse the Treasury for the necessary appropriation to carry out the treaty, but it would exceed it by one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Indeed, it is believed that the demand upon the Treasury to carry out this treaty, might be supplied from these lands. It has been suggested by those opposed to the treaty that this land might be declared forfeited to the Government; but the supplement to the Menomonee treaty of 1831, gives no definite time for its occupation, and the President has prescribed none. Moreover, the New York Indians paid a large consideration for these lands, by their treaties with the Menomonees in 1821 and '22, which treaties were approved of by the President of the United States. But their purchase from the Menomonees amounting to about 1,500,000 acres, in regard to its justice and policy, being called into question, in the year 1831, treaties were made for the purpose of reconciling all the conflicting claims, by which the United States acquired the territory in dispute, giving the New York Indians, however, 500,000 acres of the disputed land, and the Menomonees $20,000 for their acquiescence—all of which may be seen by reference to the treaty with the Menomonees of 1831. Under these circumstances, the title of these Indians cannot be justly disturbed till another home is provided for them. And, sir, the tract of country set apart for the New York Indians, by this treaty, is not so serious a consideration to the Federal Government as gentlemen seem to contend. A territory west of the Mississippi has been procured, and sacredly set apart by this Government, amply sufficient for the location of all the remnant tribes of Indians which may be found remaining in all the States and Territories of this Union. It is the settled policy and wish of this Government thus to locate these Indians. And, sir, if these poor, perishing people were entirely destitute of all the necessary means to contribute to their own comfort and settlement in the slightest degree, the duty would become, in that case, the more imperative upon this Government to provide for them.

This Government has assumed the parental, and guardian care of the aboriginal race, and its duty and honor require that it should at all times stand ready and prepared to render a satisfactory account of its stewardship to a civilized and Christian world. The wise and enlightened policy of collecting, removing, and settling these remnant tribes in permanent homes in the West, and thereby relieve the States altogether of this perplexing incumbrance, and, at the same time, make a last, an honest effort, to save from extinction a remnant of the native race, has always had my warmest support and approbation. I have no claims to the honor of originating this plan. No, sir; this was before I was on my present field of public labor. The plan was first brought to my special notice by observing its recommendation by Mr. Jefferson, and has since been recommended and sustained, more or less, by all his successors. Mr. Monroe most earnestly recommended to Congress efficient action to carry out this plan of emigrating the Indians from the States, and settling them permanently in the West. The then Secretary of War, Mr. Calhoun, sustained the views of the President in a very able report on the subject. Not being a member of Congress at that time, (1825, I believe,) I was surprised that no member of Congress made a direct effort at legislation on the subject.

And in 1823, when a member of the other branch of Congress, I did not fail to bring the subject, in a formal way, to the consideration of Congress. And, sir, it will continue to be a source of gratification to me, that I was the first member of either branch of the American Congress, to urge this beneficent plan of salvation to the Indians, and relief to the States, upon the consideration of Congress. Mr. President, you well remember the violent opposition my first effort met with from various quarters; but that effort has perseveringly been followed up, and in its progress constantly gained friends and support. The history of its progress and success is known to the Senate and the country. And, sir, I consider it now, as I have done from the beginning, one of the most important measures connected with the history and character of our beloved country. Shall we then dally and falter, in the consummation of a policy which now, from experience, has forced itself upon the approbation of the wise and the good, not only of our country, but upon all who appreciate the blessings of civilization in every land.

Sir, we are Senators, representing the sovereign States of this Union. Not only our own States in a special manner, but all the States. And the people of New York very properly feel a deep interest in this matter. And the Federal Government, by its own policy and action, has become so connected with this subject, that we cannot honorably, if so disposed, abandon the connection which the Government has by its acts assumed in relation to this matter. The views of the Government in relation to these Indians have been too fully developed in various official acts, and also in the legislation of Congress, for us, at this late day, to stand justified in assuming the ground that this affair all belongs to New York, and that this Government has no concern in the issue now before us.

Shortly after the close of the Revolutionary war, the Six Nations of Indians, of New York, became convinced that the increase of the white settlements around them would make it necessary for them to seek a new home in the West; and, in council held by these people as early as 1810, they resolved, and did send a memorial to the President of the United States, inquiring whether the Government would consent to their leaving their habitations, and their removing into the neighborhood of their Western brethren; and if they could procure a home there, by gift or purchase, whether the Government would acknowledge their title to the lands so obtained, in the same manner it had acknowledged it in those from whom they might receive it; and further, whether the existing treaties would, in such a case, remain in full force, and their annuities be paid as heretofore. The President answered by saying their request should be granted; and under this approbation, the treaty of 1831, between the New York and Menomonee Indians, to which I have heretofore adverted, was made and concluded. Under all these circumstances, is it not matter of surprise that any person who pretends to be acquainted with the history of these transactions, should now rise up and say the Federal Government has nothing to do with this matter; that it all belongs to New York and Massachusetts?

Sir, it has clearly and obviously become our legitimate duty to act in this matter; and, for one, I shall neither waive my right, or shrink from my responsibility Does not the interest of New York require that we should act in this matter? The answer is found in the following language from the President of the United States, in his message on this subject:

"The removal of the New York Indians is not only important to the tribes themselves, but to an interesting portion of western New York, and especially to the growing city of Buffalo, which is surrounded by lands occupied by the Senecas; and to this portion of our country the extraordinary spectacle is presented, of densely populated and highly improved settlements, inhabited by industrious, moral, and respectable citizens, divided by a wilderness, on one side of which is a city of more than 20,000 souls, whose advantageous position in every other respect, and great commercial prospects, would ensure its rapid increase in population and wealth, if not retarded by the circumstances of a naturally fertile district remaining a barren waste in its immediate vicinity."

And, sir, what does the President say in regard to those persons who are entitled to the reversionary right of these lands. His language is: "Neither does it appear just to those who are entitled to the fee simple of the land, and who have paid a part of the purchase money, that they should suffer from the waste which is constantly committed upon their reversionary rights, and the great deterioration of the land consequent upon such depredations, without any corresponding advantage to the Indian occupants." In, and out of the Senate, I have found persons strongly opposed to this treaty, because they seem to think it confers special favors on the individuals known as the pre-emptioners. These individuals seem to be viewed in the light of speculators, who are endeavoring to defraud the Indians out of their lands. Now, sir, nothing, so far as I can discover, can be more unjust to these injured individuals The quotation which I have given from the President's message, as well as the reports of General Dearborn and Mr. Gillet, United States Commissioner, together with all the mass of documentary evidence which we have printed on this subject: yes, sir, all go to establish the merit, good character, liberal conduct, and fair dealing of these pre-emptioners, and especially their agents, Messrs. Ogden, Fellows and Wadsworth. Gen. Dearborn says the gentlemen just named "have afforded me every facility for an agreeable and thorough discharge of my duties." That these pre-emptive owners of the lands should be desirous to hasten the time of going into the possession of their just rights, is altogether natural, right, and proper. They neither claim or desire any advantage which has not been fairly derived from the State of Massachusetts, and their good conduct and fair dealing has obviously secured to them the respectful consideration of many of our most distinguished public men and citizens, as may be seen by a careful examination of the documents which accompany this treaty. It is true that I consider the interest of these individuals but a minor consideration in the objects of the treaty, yet it is an interest entitled to some consideration.

To remove, however, unjust and improper prejudices, growing out of a want of correct information, against these pre-emptive claimants, and consequently against this treaty, I will, contrary to what I had intended to say, on this branch of the subject, enter more fully upon an explanation of the nature and merits of the history of these pre-emptive claims. It will be found, sir, by examining the records and history of the proceedings of the Federal Government, that the convention held in 1786, between New York and Massachusetts, which resulted, as heretofore stated, in a cession to the last named State of the territory since called the Genesee country: the right and sovereignty of jurisdiction being reserved to New York, was held under the sanction of Congress; and, by the deed of cession, Massachusetts is authorized to hold treaties with the native Indians, for the extinguishment of their title, and for this purpose to employ such armed force as should be necessary; also, to grant the right of pre-emption to others, with the like powers, but under a provision that purchases from the Indians, by the grantees of Massachusetts, should be made in the presence of a superintendent, and subject to the approval of that State. And the lands embraced in the treaty now under consideration were conveyed by Massachusetts to Robert Morris, and by him to what was called the Holland Land Company. Under these cessions and conveyances, Morris extinguished the Indian claim to the greater part of the territory which he had purchased. In 1810, the Holland Land Company sold and conveyed all the lands now occupied by the Seneca and Tuscarora tribes, to David A. Ogden, who afterwards sold them to the present pre-emptive owners. In 1826, these owners extinguished the Seneca claim to part of those lands, and to the residue they still hold a legal estate, in fee simple, subject only to the possessory right of the native Indians.

For many years past, these claimants, or rather rightful owners of these lands, have been looking to this Government to carry out its policy, in the removal of all the remnant tribes still remaining in the States, to the permanent home provided for them in the West. And when, in the year 1837, a commissioner was appointed by the United States to hold a treaty with the New York Indians, these pre-emptive claimants procured the attendance, and at their own expense, of an agent on the part of Massachusetts, to superintend any sale growing out of a treaty which the Indians might be inclined to make. And this commissioner on the part of Massachusetts was General Dearborn, whose report has been, and will be again, adverted to, in support of the ratification of this treaty.

Mr. President, if I have succeeded in demonstrating the advantages of this treaty, to all the parties in interest, and that I have I think few will deny, why should I, then, longer dwell on this branch of the subject? For, sir, it is obvious to every one, that if the execution of this treaty be beneficial to all the parties concerned, its rejection will consequently be prejudicial to the interest of all. Let me, then, turn to another consideration connected with this treaty, by asking the question, Do these Indians wish to remove? This question is answered in the most satisfactory manner, by an attentive examination and consideration of the actings and doings of these Indians for the last thirty years. Their various efforts, with but little aid and encouragement from any governmental influence, either State or Federal, sustain the belief that they are unhappy, and very dissatisfied with their present abode, and are truly anxious to emigrate to the West. The inclination of the Indians in all the States, for many years past, when left free to the exercise of their own volition, has been a constant, earnest looking to the West for new homes, where they might be relieved from that thraldom of State legislation which deprived them of that unrestricted liberty, so congenial to the nature of the child of the forest. Yes, Mr. President, they have long desired a country where the white man might cease from troubling, and where the poor weary Indian might be at rest.

Mr. Gillet and General Dearborn both declare themselves to be perfectly satisfied, that were it not for the unremitted and disingenuous exertions of a certain number of white men, who are actuated by their private interests, to induce the chiefs not to assent to the treaty, it would immediately have been approved by an immense majority—an opinion which we find repeatedly reiterated by these gentlemen. The President of the United States expresses the opinion, that the same influence which was exerted in opposition to the treaty, if exerted with equal zeal on the other side, would show a large majority of these Indians in favor of emigration. But, sir, we will endeavor to arrive at a correct conclusion in regard to the wishes of the Senecas upon the subject of removal, by examining and scrutinizing the conduct and action of their chiefs, in connection with the subject of the ratification of this treaty. Well, sir, the commissioner for holding this treaty was appointed in the year 1837, and, attended by the superintendent on the part of Massachusetts, met the Indians in council.

And from the first commencement of the negotiation, we discover the interference of white men, assuming the character of friends to these Indians, strenuously opposing this negotiation, and greatly retarding its conclusion. Indeed, it appears that every art was employed to defeat the objects of the Government in effecting a treaty. The country beyond the Mississippi was declared to be unproductive, and the climate unhealthy. The prospects held out by the Government to the Indians, was declared to be delusive and deceptive; and in case of removal, they were told they might look forward to want, privations, and suffering.

These officious advisers were composed of white men, pretending to have influence with the Indians, and seeking to force themselves into the service of the pre-emptive owners at extravagant rates of compensation, but most of them deriving immediate advantage from a traffic carried on with these Seneca Indians; some in the sale of rum, tobacco, and blankets; others from the occupation of their lands at low rents; from the employment of saw mills on their lands, or from extensive contracts from the purchase of timber to be rafted and sent to market.

In addition to these, there were others who, possibly, were actuated by better motives—persons who had, for many years, been professedly engaged in endeavors to improve the condition of the Indians by religious and other instruction, and who, unwilling and reluctant to believe in the inefficiency of their labors, were loath to abandon the enterprise in which they had been so long engaged without any adequate success. Consequently this combined opposition to the treaty addressed every argument they could to the passions and cupidity of this ignorant people, to incline them still to be content in the continuance and indulgence of their accustomed habits; and such efforts, under such circumstances, could not fail to produce great effect. Even the more sober and sensible class of the Indians who had long desired a change of residence, with a view of relieving themselvese of the evils inseparable from their present position, were many of them, no doubt, brought to hesitate: while those opposed to emigration became more determined in their opposition, and more strenuous to defeat the treaty, regardless of the liberality of its provisions. However, after a tedious and protracted negotiation, characterized by extraordinary violence and opposition on the part of the opposing chiefs and their auxiliaries, finally a treaty was concluded on and signed by the Commissioner of the United States, Mr. Gillett, and all the tribes of the New York Indians. In June, 1838, the ratification of this treaty, although strenuously opposed by the the dissatisfied part of the Senecas, aided by a powerful combination of white men, was advised and assented to by the Senate, with certain amendments, designed, as is understood by me, to render its provisions more conformable to the policy and legislation of the United States; and this treaty, as proposed to be amended by the Senate, was sent back to all the tribes who negotiated the same, for their assent, which assent was duly and satisfactorily obtained, as will fully appear by the message of the President of the United States, to the Senate, of the 21st of January, 1839. The President says, "I transmit a treaty negotiated with the New York Indians, which was submitted to your body in June last, and amended." He adds: "The amendments have, in pursuance of the requirement of the Senate, been submitted to each of the tribes assembled in council, for their free and voluntary assent or dissent thereto. In respect to all the tribes, except the Senecas, the result of this application has been entirely satisfactory. It will be seen by the accompanying papers, that of this tribe, the most important of those concerned, the assent of only forty-two out of eighty-one chiefs has been obtained. I deem it advisable, under these circumstances, to submit the treaty, in its modified form, to the Senate, for its advice in regard to the sufficiency of the assent of the Senecas to the amendments proposed."

Mr. President, do you not perceive, is it not clear and obvious, that the only question presented to the Senate, in the message of the President, upon submitting this amended treaty, was to ascertain the opinion of the Senate, and obtain its advice upon the single point of the sufficiency of the assent of the Senecas to the amended treaty?

Sir, the President raises no question in this message as to whether a majority of the chiefs had signed this treaty or not. He could not do this, when communicating to intelligent men, who understand simple numbers; for he tells you that forty-two chiefs, out of the whole number of eighty-one, had assented to the treaty, and therefore no one could doubt the assent of a majority of the Seneca chiefs to this treaty. That majority being small, the object of the President was the advice of the Senate whether that majority should be considered sufficient. The Senate accordingly took into consideration the message of the President, and on the 2d of March, 1839, agreed to the following resolution: "Resolved, That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the assent of the Seneca tribe of Indians has been given to the amended treaty of June 11th, 1838, with the New York Indians, according to the true intent and meaning of the resolution of the Senate of June 11th, 1838, the Senate recommend that the President make proclamation of said treaty, and carry the same into effect." Now, sir, I have always thought, and still think, this resolution of the Senate, (no doubt well meant,) was inexpedient and injudicious, and that it unnecessarily laid the foundation for all the difficulties which we find ourselves this day involved in. If the Senate, at its last session, had taken upon itself the reasonable responsibility of responding yea or nay to the proper and respectful request of the President in regard to the sufficiency of the assent of the Seneca Indians, we should not now have found ourselves embarrassed with these difficulties of our own creation. And, sir, I commend the President for not permitting the Senate to excel him in diffidence, in modesty and courtesy, in deciding alone a question, the decision of which jointly devolves on the Senate as well as himself. I admit, sir, that we have no additional evidence that we had not, at the last session, to authorize the Senate to say now, what it declined saying at the last session, to wit: that the assent of the Seneca Indians is sufficiently evinced in favor of this treaty. But I believed then, and am the more confirmed in that opinion now, that a majority of the chiefs of the Seneca tribe have freely and voluntarily given their assent and signatures to this treaty. And whether they did so, in general council, at a town house, or whether it was done, in part, as is alleged, at other times and places, after the general council had been held, and the treaty fully and fairly explained, in the face of day, and to the whole people, as is fully and satisfactorily proven to us by the evidence now before us, I do not consider a matter of great importance. I can really believe that those who signed, after the adjournment of the council, are as justly entitled to our respect and consideration as meritorious chiefs and faithful representatives of the Indian people, as those who signed more hastily, and while the council was still in session. Indeed, sir, persons who are deliberate and slow in making up their opinions upon important matters, are generally more to be relied on than those who act more hastily.

Mr. President, I deem it important, for the satisfaction of such persons as are governed in the formation of their opinions in regard to the validity of this treaty, by the official dignity of the respective signers, to state a few facts, which I derive from an official communication of General Dearborn to Governor Everett. Well, sir, I find the Seneca tribe has eight great sachems, who are also chiefs. This title of sachem is the highest in rank of any known to the tribe; and the office is hereditary. General Dearborn gives the names of the eight sachems of the tribe, at the time of the signing of the treaty, and adds: "six out of eight of these sachems signed the treaty," and that half of them are Christians, and the others pagans. That an actual majority of the Seneca chiefs have assented to the amended treaty, seems no longer to admit of a doubt. The official and personal standing of Mr. Gillett and General Dearborn, who have certified to this fact, settles this question. I consider this question as heretofore settled by the action of the Senate.

In respect to the mode of the assent, I consider it altogether immaterial. The fact of assent I consider a matter of evidence; and, in the present case, that evidence is, to my mind, entirely satisfactory. That the chiefs who have subscribed to this treaty did so voluntarily and understandingly, is attested by General Dearborn and Mr. Gillett, whose testimony is unimpeached, and, I believe, unimpeachable.

I doubt, sir, whether the whole history of our country affords a solitary instance of an Indian treaty, which will bear the test of comparison with this much abused treaty, for fairness, liberality, honest execution, and requirements approaching to similar transactions, when conducted between equal and civilized nations. But, sir, I would emphatically ask, what is the history of Indian treaties, from the first discovery of this continent, up to the present day? When and where have we required that more than a majority of the Indian chiefs should sign a treaty in open council, to give it validity? When have we required higher evidence than that of General Dearborn and Mr. Gillett, in respect to the number, character, and authenticity of Indian chiefship to a treaty?

The history and origin of Indian treaty-making on this continent, down to the present time, I consider one of the unpleasant, if not painful recollections to the high minded American citizen. In the early settlement of the country, our ancestors effected by artifice, in the form of Indian treaties, what they were unable to effect by force. This treaty-making system, originating in physical weakness, pretended and appeared to do nothing in acquiring the Indian lands, except by obtaining the voluntary assent of the Indians. Yes, sir, even under the government of that good man, William Penn, we find the same statute which made it a crime for any citizen to furnish an Indian with intoxicating drink of any kind, nevertheless allowed the commissioners of the Government to administer a prudent portion of intoxicating drink to Indians with whom they wished to form a treaty. But, sir, I forbear to enter further upon the history of Indian treaties. I cannot allow myself to dwell upon a subject so little calculated to elevate the character of my country.

But this much I will say: if any gentleman will take the time and labor which I have done to investigate this subject, he will rise from the task, fully satisfied that the treaty now under consideration is one amongst the most fair and honorable transactions of the kind which is to be found on our recorded history as a people. I assert, sir, that many Indian treaties have been obtained, ratified, and carried into effect, that were never signed by a majority of the chiefs of the nation in open council. Indeed, sir, with all my dislike to Indian treaties, while I am satisfied that most of them have carried on their face, forms which the facts of the case did not justify, yet I am not disposed, at this stage of our progress in treating with Indians, to insist upon requirements which are new and extraordinary, for the express purpose of defeating the objects of this particular treaty, admitted to be exceedingly advantageous to all the parties in interest, and especially so to the Indian people themselves, whose good we wish to promote by this measure. Sir, I have never had any agency in negotiating an Indian treaty. I have more than once had the offer of such commissions, but have uniformly declined the service. The official stations which I have from time to time occupied have frequently made it my duty to have much to do with the execution of these treaties. This connection with Indian treaties has caused me to reflect upon and investigate the subject in all its bearings; and the result produced upon my mind is a settled conviction that the several State Governments, as well as the Federal Government, have greatly erred in continuing the treaty-making policy introduced by our colonial ancestors, from necessity, after the Indian tribes in our respective limits and jurisdictions have become a conquered and subdued people, wholly dependent upon the will and power of those who have supplanted them. We have not, sir, even the poor plea of the tyrant—necessity—for still adhering to the farcical forms of diplomacy originating in causes and under circumstances which no longer exist. We should long since have supplied the place of Indian treaties by wise, liberal, and judicious legislation.

Whenever the Indians, in point of fact, become subject to the control, legislation, and jurisdiction of the Federal, or any one of the State Governments, it becomes the duty of such Government to exercise its rights directly. We should legislate for these unfortunate remnants in the same spirit of kindness and liberality that we would for the helpless and destitute minor or orphan, whose only friend was the Government of the helpless and destitute.

These, sir, are my views of policy and duty, in relation to these remnant tribes; and upon these views I have acted myself, as far as circumstances would permit.

I would now ask, Mr. President, how can any Senator expect to put the negotiations of an Indian treaty upon the principles and footing of similar transactions with civilized, enlightened foreign nations? Are not these Indians in a state of dependence and pupilage? Are we not in the place of parents and guardians to them? Shall we, then, overlook all the facts connected with the subject under consideration? Shall we imagine a state of things which we know has no existence? Has not all the difficulty in regard to the treaty been produced by interested white men? Is not every charge of fraud, urged against this treaty, refuted by the fact of the liberal and benificent terms of this instrument? A charge of fraud cannot be well sustained against a transaction which confers great benefits, and no injury whatever.

But, sir, we have no complaints that this treaty is to injure the Indians, or any one else. Indeed it is impossible they can sustain injury from this treaty, because if they do not choose to emigrate under its provisions, they have the right secured to them to remain where they are during life; and yet the ingenuity of interested white men has produced the impression upon the minds of many, for whom I entertain great respect, in and out of this Senate, that there is something very alarming and dangerous in the provisions of this treaty. The whole alarm and difficulty of those who are opposed to this treaty, seems to be based upon the doubt whether it has fairly received the assent of a majority of the Seneca chiefs; and the great importance which they attach to these chiefs making their marks to the treaty, in what is called open council. These are the questions which perplex the judicial minds of statesmen and Senators. Under the existing circumstances of these poor perishing Indians, and with a view to the history of these Indian treaties, which I have heretofore adverted to, I am entirely relieved from all these perplexities. Moreover, sir, I have no doubt in regard to the assent of a majority of the chiefs having been fairly obtained to this treaty; and the Senate of the United States settled that question on the 11th of June, 1838, when they ratified the treaty. It was the action of the Senate upon the treaty, as a treaty, and as the act of the Seneca nation. The Senate must have viewed the instrument as executed by a majority of the nation, or else have considered that a majority was not necessary for the purpose of making a valid treaty. Is it to be believed, that the President of the United States, Governor Everett, General Dearborn, Mr. Gillet, and various other public functionaries, who have had an agency in bringing this instrument before the Senate for confirmation, would have said and done all that we find in the documents which we have in our hands, if they had entertained opinions adverse to the fairness and validity of this instrument? No, sir; this treaty would never have reached this Senate if these public functionaries had considered it liable to the formidable objections which we have heard advanced on this floor.

Mr. President, much as I have said upon this subject, I have greatly abridged what I would have said, but for the confidence I feel in the ability and disposition of the distinguished Senators from New York, to supply all my omissions.

Allow me, sir, once more, in conclusion of my remarks, to advert to the bearing of this question, now pending before the Senate, on the destiny and lasting interest of this remnant of the aboriginal race. To me, sir, these people are a peculiar and interesting portion of the human family. I consider them human beings; I wish to treat them as such. I cannot in my conscience assign them a place, half way between man and beast. I wish to save them from destruction. Hence I urge their speedy removal from the degraded and demoralizing situation in which we now find them. Their unrestrained intercourse with the licentious portion of the populous cities and villages, by which they are surrounded, is prejudicial alike to the Indian and white population. Deprived as these people are, of the right to acquire and hold property in severalty, they are destitute of those incentives to industry and frugality, which animate and reward every white man in our happy country. Being debarred all political rights, they naturally consider themselves a proscribed and debased race, and the individual exceptions of worth and intelligence amongst them, while it serves to evince their capability for improvement under more favorable circumstances, and to become a civilized people, will not, however, shield them from becoming a nation of vagabonds and paupers in their present abodes. During forty years they have made no perceptible advance in the arts of civilized life, so that it is impossible longer to resist the conviction that their preservation from increasing misery and ultimate extinction, can alone be found in their separation from the white population, and by conferring on them those rights and privileges which, in all countries where they are enjoyed, have been gradually found to lead to civilization, and to prepare the way for the introduction of Christianity, with all its happy influences. It is a striking and most important fact, which I have observed amongst various Indian tribes, since I have advocated the emigration of the Indians to the West, that the most educated, the most moral and intelligent, who are inclined to embrace Christianity, the most sober, industrious, and thriving, are generally the friends and advocates of emigration, and it is resisted most by ambitious and selfish leaders, who carry in their train the most ignorant and degraded, and those who are least capable of appreciating the advantages of civilization.

In connection with the best interest of these Indians, Mr. President, let us also bear in mind the important interest which the State of New York has in this question. True, New York is already great and prosperous; the empire State of the Confederacy; but, sir, may we not all rejoice at her increasing strength and prosperity; are we not all Americans? Do we not all belong to the same Confederacy of sovereign States? Are we not members of the same great family? Shall we, then, hesitate in being coworkers together, to promote the interest of each, of all the States? And still further, sir, shall we forget that the great interest of all the States requires that the country now occupied by these unfortunate Indians should be densely populated by good white citizens. The geographical situation of the territory in question requires its settlement, in aid of the defence and strength of our common country. But, sir, I will not detain the Senate longer upon the subject of this treaty. I trust what I have said will induce those who have not already done so, to investigate this subject. And, sir, overwhelming as the opposition to this treaty has appeared to be, yet if it can have a full and fair investigation by this enlightened Senate, I still indulge the hope that impressions, not well based, may give way to the force of evidence and reflection, and that this treaty may yet receive the expression of the Senate's approbation.

REMARKS OF MR. FISHER, OF NORTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, March 19, 1840—On the bill for issuing five millions of Treasury notes.

Mr. FISHER said: I do not rise for the purpose of delivering a set speech. It is now too late in the debate, and in the day, to do this, were I even so disposed. Nor shall I follow the example of some who have preceded me, and discourse about every thing except the one before us. I have no party criminations or recriminations to make; I leave this to those who take more delight in such warfare than I do. Above all, I shall not make a campaign against the Seminoles—for these campaigns, whether fought in this House or in Florida, as yet, have yielded no laurels. What I propose to do is, to make a few remarks on the subject before us, and in the shortest manner possible, give the outlines of the reasons why I shall vote for this bill. I proceed at once to do this.

However much gentlemen have differed on other matters, there is one point on which they all agree; that the public Treasury is without money. Owing to causes not necessary here to be stated, it is now well understood that the revenue will not be sufficent to meet the expenditures of the present year; and WE are called on to supply the deficiency; otherwise the Government, for the want of means, must stop, as would a steam engine for the want of the propelling power. The question then presents itself, how is this to be done?

There is one way (said Mr. F.) above all others, by which I wish to see the revenue of the Government made equal to the expenditures; and that is, by reducing the expenditures down to the revenue. That this can be done at a single dash, I doubt; but the work should now be commenced, and steadily followed up until fully accomplished. I will go as far as any member in this House to bring about so desirable a reform; and though we may not be able to complete it at the present session, still if all sides would talk less, and act more, much might be done. But for two large items, we might at once equalize the revenue, and the expenditures; I mean the Florida war and the pension list. When these two items shall be cut off, or the one wholy cut off, and the other reduced, the INCOME of the Government will be more than enough to meet all legitimate demands. It is to be hoped that the Florida war will not last forever; but will end with the present year, and with it will end an annual expenditure of several millions of dollars. As to the pension list, it is every year becoming less and less. The relics of the patriotic generation of '76 are rapidly disappearing from among us to take their places in another world, and if we pass no new pension acts, this source of expense in a few years will cease to exist.

Still there is a deficiency for the present year, and if we cannot at this session bring the expenditures down to the income, it necessarily follows that we must in some way bring the income up to expenditures; that is, we must in some way or other supply the means to carry on the Government. The question returns, how is this to be done?

In casting about, I see but four ways in which we can possibly raise the money.

The first is, by increasing the impost duties; that is, by raising the taxes on the people.

The second is, by making a regular loan; that is, by beginning a new national debt.

The third is by calling on the STATES to pay back the surplus fund deposited with them.

The fourth, and last is, by the issue of Treasury notes, bearing a reasonable interest; the plan proposed by the bill now before us.

There is no other way than these, except direct and excise taxes; and now let us see which of these plans is least objectionable.

First, as to increasing the impost duties, the tariff. Shall we now now set to work, and raise the impost duties; thas is, impose new burdens on the country? Shall we revive the old tariff contest again; a contest which came so near breaking up this Government? I know that there are many here, and elsewhere, for doing so, but I hope no one seriously contemplates a movement of this kind at present. I doubt very much whether the manufacturers themselves would desire to see this experiment now attempted

They hardly wish to see this question so soon again opened, and their interests thrown adrift on the wide ocean of strife and uncertainty. Besides, they begin to understand that high protective duties are not what they had supposed them to be; they begin to see that incidental protection, with a sound and steady currency, is vastly more important to them than high duties with an inflated paper circulation, expanding and contracting in rapid succession. But even if it were otherwise—if the manufacturers were desirous to see the tariff now increased, you cannot do it. The Southern members, without distinction of party, will resist the attempt to the utmost. Then, as additional taxes are now out of the question, shall we resort to

The second plan—that is, to a regular loan. Shall we begin a new national debt? Many gentlemen, in debate, have warmly urged this scheme; and one gentleman has actually introduced a bill, by way of amendment, for this purpose; but for myself, I can say I am as much opposed to this plan as I am to new impost duties; and, if any thing, more so; for, if you once establish a regular national debt, it will soon lead to taxes, and none, that are now living, will see the end of it. The day in which this Government paid off her public debt, was a great and glorious day for our Republic. It should be long remembered, and celebrated by the American people. When the fact that the United States had paid off their public debt was first made known in Europe, it awakened astonishment, and was hardly believed. It attracted the attention not only of Government, but of the intelligent men of all classes. It made an impression on all Europe, and has placed our Republic on an elevation so high as to be seen by all. It has thrown around our Government a moral and political grandeur that we should not undervalue; it gives us advantages over other nations that we should carefully preserve. Is it not a just cause of exultation, while every Government in Christendom is staggering under the weight of a great national debt—while ENGLAND, our parent country, is almost crushed with her enormous taxes—that our republican Government stands disenthralled before the world? Shall we now be so unmindful of this glorious position as to give it up without urgent necessity? I hope not. In my opinion, nothing but the greatest exigency should force us to lay the foundation of a new national debt.

That the rich money holders in the great cities may wish to see another public debt begun, I can readily believe. Government stocks would be a safe investment for them, particularly in times like these, when confidence seems to be lost in every thing else. That the brokers may wish to see Government stocks in market again, I can well understand, as it would open a new field of speculation and profit to them. To these classes, a national debt may be a national blessing; but certainly no other class of men in the country can desire to see our Government, in time of peace with all the world, except a handful of Seminole Indians, commence another national debt, which would bring on the country new tariffs, high taxes, an increase of Government patronage, extravagance, and corruption. Sir, that party, be it which it may, that first begins a new national debt in this country, will not do it with impunity; they will furnish the weapon for their own destruction. I was highly pleased to see the sentiments of the President on this subject; they are worthy of the head of a Republican people. I hope his supporters, in this House and out of it, will faithfully and zealously stand up to them.

Then, sir, as it will not answer now, in time of peace, to contract a new national debt, shall we resort to the third alternative—that is, shall we call in a part or the whole of the surplus funds deposited with the State? I have heard no one, as yet, seriously propose this, and I think no one will. But suppose that this plan should be urged, I should like to be informed which of the STATES could meet the call in season for the present wants of the Government? Could Maryland, or Pennsylvania, or even New York, with all her resources, do it? Look at the condition of these States, and, indeed, of many others, and see if they could pay. No, sir; many of them could not pay a dollar, and none of them can pay without the utmost distress. I believe, sir, no State in this Union is in a better condition than my own State, North Carolina. She owes nobody on this, or on the other side of the ocean, except this surplus fund. She never sent agents out to hawk her credit over the world. She has no bonds in market; and yet I must say, she could not now repay the deposites without great distress to her citizens. This plan, then, is also out of the question, and we must, though necessity, resort to the last alternative set before us—that is, to the measure proposed by the bill before us, namely, the issue of five millions of Treasury notes. What solid objection can there be to this plan? None that I can see, as a temporary measure. It has, heretofore, oftentimes been tried, and always has answered the purpose well. But it is only as a temporary resort that I advocate it—I would deprecate it as a permanent measure of finance, and I presume no one intends it as such. But an objection has been raised which, if valid, would at once decide me against it, whatever might be its advantages in other respects. Some contend that it is unconstitutional. I have examined this objection as far as I am capable of doing, and I come to the conclusion that there is no force whatever in it. Those who urge this objection adduce, as authority, a quotation from the papers of Mr. Madison just published, in which the writer would seem to entertain this opinion. But this argument loses its force when we call to mind that Mr. Madison himself, while President, approved acts of this kind, under which millions of Treasury notes were issued. If he really believed this measure unconstitutional, would he have approved it, and carried it into execution? All who know the character of that great man will not feel at a loss how to answer.

In reality, these Treasury notes are but evidences of debt; and, it cannot be disguised, that by the issue of them we create a species of debt against the Government—a sort of transient debt, which we begin to pay as soon as we begin to contract. It is not a regular, funded, STOCK DEBT, having years to run, and which, on this account, is so exceptionable; but a debt that must be paid within the year. Still it is in the nature of a debt, and, as such, comes clearly within the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. F. continued: I have already intimated that I go for this plan only because I think it less exceptionable than the others within our reach just now. As a permanent measure of finance, I am utterly opposed to it. I think, however, in the present exigency, it will not only relieve the Government, but also give considerable relief to the country, particularly in the business of exchanges. But, after all, the the only sure plan is to go right to work, and cut down the expenses of the Government so as to bring them strictly within the revenue. If we do this, there will be no necessity again to resort to such expedients; but if we neglect this, then all the expedients in the world cannot long keep off the evils of increased taxation. I therefore hope that the old and experienced members of this House, instead of consuming their time in this party warfare against each other, will turn their attention to the work of retrenchment and reform—a work so necessary to the stability of the Government, and for the prosperity of the country.

SPEECH OF MR. SEVIER,

OF ARKANSAS,

In Senate, March 17, 1840—In Executive session, on the treaty with the New York Indians.

Mr. SEVIER addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The treaty now under consideration is a complicated affair, and on that account, as well as on account of its importance to the Seneca Indians, to the State of New York, to the grantees of the State of Massachusetts, and to the United States, I hope, while I endeavor, in discharge of my public duty as chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, to explain it, that I shall be indulged with the patient attention of the Senate.

This is a treaty of much more importance than is generally supposed. It is one about which the Senecas and their friends feel, as they have felt for upwards of two years, (during all of which time it has been before the country, in one form or another,) a deep, intense, and an all-absorbing interest. The written appeals of a large majority of this tribe to the President, and to the Secretary of War; to the Senate, and to individual Senators, earnestly imploring a rejection of this treaty; the immense mass of testimony with which they have furnished us respecting it; the constant attendance of their delegates here, upon their own expenses, at a great distance from their homes, and at the sacrifice of an utter abandonment of their private pursuits, at all times, when this treaty was before the Senate; and their daily attendance in our galleries, to observe and to gather, if possible, something from our proceedings, show most abundantly the light in which this treaty is viewed by them.

On the other hand, the citizens of New York, and especially those residing about Buffalo, have their wishes and hopes and fears respecting its fate with the Senate. They have furnished us, also, with testimony and memorials, and sage suggestions, upon the subject of Indian policy and Indian welfare. They, too, have had their lobby members and ambassadors here, consisting of both red and pale faces, for the purpose of urging this treaty through this body. Nor are these the only interested parties. Massachusetts seems to have, in this treaty, something more than a general interest; she seems to have an interest somewhat particular and identical, which I deem important first to consider and explain, that we may fully understand it in all its bearings.

Prior to 1786, Massachusetts claimed, as properly belonging to her, a portion of the State of New York. This claim New York contested; and this somewhat angry controversy was not finally settled, as we learn from the public journals of that day, until 1786. This dispute was then settled, by Massachusetts ceding to New York all her right and title to the government, sovereignty, and jurisdiction over the disputed territory; and, in consideration of this cession, the State of New York ceded to Massachusetts, and to her grantees, and to the heirs and assigns of her grantees, the right of pre-emption of the soil of the native Indians to the territory described in this compromise. The native Indians, occupying the territory to which Massachusetts thus acquired the right of pre-emption, were then, as now, the Tuscaroras and Senecas, of New York.

It was further stipulated, in this compromise, by New York, that Massachusetts might, at any time, by persons duly authorized by her for that purpose, hold treaties and conferences with these Indians relative to a purchase of their lands. And further, that Massachusetts should have the right to dispose of this pre-emption right to any person whatever. This compromise was approved of and sanctioned by Congress in 1787. A complete and full detail of this contract is to be found in the 4th volume of Journals of Congress of the year 1787, at page 788, to which I respectfully refer any honorable Senator who may desire to see it.

The right of pre-emption being thus secured to her, as well as the right to dispose of it, Massachusetts did afterwards, in 1791, sell this right of pre-emption to the Holland Land company, and that company to David Ogden, and Ogden to the present claimants. The present claimants being the grantees and representatives of Massachusetts, have the indisputable right to hold treaties and conferences with the native Indians, for the purpose of purchasing out the Indian right of occupancy; and in exercising this right, though courtesy might seem to require it, this company are under no obligations to consult either New York or the United States. I have not been able to lay my hands upon the contract between Massachusetts and her grantees, and am therefore ignorant of the terms of that contract. But, judging from the interest which Massachusetts invariably manifests upon the subject of the acquisition of these lands; and upon seeing her represented by an agent or superintendent, at every sale of them, I have concluded that she considers herself bound by her contract to either New York or her grantees, and probably to both, for the performance of her superintendency upon such occasions. How this matter stands I know not; but should such information be thought desirable by the Senate, I presume the distinguished Senators from New York and Massachusetts can give it.

Mr. President, in considering the various interests involved in this treaty—the interests of the Senecas, of the citizens of New York, and of the grantees of Massachusetts—the committee have thought it their duty to consider, in connection with those interests, the interest of a fourth party, which is that of the United States. And with a view to understand this complicated affair, the committee have endeavored to trace our relations with the Six Nations of New York, from their commencement up to this day, so far at least as the Senecas are concerned, for the purpose of discovering if there be on our part any undischarged obligations to either of the parties interested in the subject-matter now before us. The first treaty which I have been able to find with the Six Nations of New York, was concluded in 1784. That was a treaty of peace; a relinquishment of territory on their part, and a definition of their boundary lines on ours. In 1789, five year thereafter, a second treaty was made, which is, so far as I have been able to discover, but little more, if any thing, than a recapitulation of the former one.

The third and last treaty ever made by us with the Six Nations of New York, in their confederated character, (unless the one we are now considering should constitute a single exception,) was made in 1794. This was an important treaty, and has governed us in all our intercourse with them ever since. In that treaty, we acknowledged separately, to each of the tribes composing the Six Nations, their individual right and title to certain specific reservations of land; and we guarantied to them separately the possession and enjoyment of their respective reservations; and conferred upon them the right to dispose of their reservations respectively, in whole or in part, to any citizen or citizens of the United States, whenever and however they might choose; and for these rights, the Indians, on their part, engaged, in the same treaty, never to set up any claim to any other lands in the boundaries of the United States, than those granted in that treaty.

This was the last treaty ever made by us with those Indians, collectively or separately, from 1794 up to 1838; a period of more than forty years. From that time oward, to 1838, we acted in good faith, and permitted those Indiaans, according to the terms of the treaty of 1794, so far at least as the Senecas were concerned, to dispose of their New York lands as they chose. Since 1794, the Senecas have disposed of their lands on several occasions. In 1797, they were permitted to sell to Robert Morris of Philadelphia, a portion of their reservations. Afterward, in 1802, the same Senecas were permitted to sell another portion of their lands to Phelps, Bronson, and Jones; and again, in the same year, to Wilhelm Willick and others; and again, in 1823, to Grigg and Gibson. Each and all of those sales were made openly, freely, and voluntarily, and under the guardian care only of the United States on the one hand, and of the agent, or superintendent, of the State of Massachusetts on the other. These lands were transferred by the Indians to their granters, not by treaty, but by the ordinary deeds of conveyance; nor does the transfer of those lands to Ogden and Fellows, in 1838, vary in any degree, but in the prefixture of a preamble to it, from all the other deeds of conveyance which have been made by them subsequent to 1794.

Having then, as we have seen by the treaty of 1794, such ample power to dispose of these lands—a power so often and so satisfactorily exercised by them; and the United states having no interest whatever in these lands, and being constitutionally incapable of having any, and not being bound by compact, as in the case of Georgia, to extinguish the Indian title to those lands, it may well be asked, why have we interfered in this affair? Why have we attempted, with unabated assiduity, for more than two years, with our influence, with our agents, and means, and money, to barter with those Indians for their New York reservations? I will endeavor, sir, to unravel this mystery; it is a curious piece of intrigue and history, which should never be forgotten, as it may be of some service to the country hereafter.

As early as 1818, we find the agents of two small bands of New York Indians applying to Mr. Monroe, then President of the United States, for permission to purchase, with their own means and upon their own account, of the Menomonees of Green Bay, a portion of their lands. The files of the War Department will show that the grantees of Massachusetts were at the bottom of this simple, unpretending, and modest application; and, among other reasons, we find that religion, which is so often prostituted by the designing to cover up intrigue and sinister motives, was the argument used on that occasion to obtain this permission. It will be recollected that the United States will permit no Indian tribe, which they have any thing to do with, to dispose of their lands except to the United States. The authority, therefore, of the United States was indispensable to enable the missionaries, Williams and Hendricks, to make a valid purchase of the Menomonees. Mr. Monroe, not foreseeing the objects in view, and understanding distinctly, as their memorial expressly stated, that these two bands were to pay out of their own means for all the land they purchased of the Menomonees; and further, that they were to acquire, by such purchase, no other or better right than that held by the Menomonees—so understanding it, Mr. Monroe gave his assent to such a purchase. The assent of Congress, or of the Senate, to such an unusual arrangement, was neither asked or obtained. It seems to have been looked upon by Mr. Monroe as quite a small affair. Under his authority, thus obtained, the agents of these two small tribes, as they alleged, made a purchase, and paid for it, as they informed us, the sum of $12,000. This purchase, however, has ever been strenuously denied by the Menomonees, and the contract made between those Indians, whatever it was—if, indeed, there ever was any—is not now to be found where, surely, if in existence, it ought to be found—in either the Indian Bureau or in the War Department. As matters now stand, however, it is but of little consequence for us to know, (unless for the purpose of seeing in what manner we have been imposed upon,) whether such a contract ever existed or not. We all know there was a controversy about it between the parties, and that we were drawn into it. This controversy was settled by us in a treaty with the Menomonees in 1832. Thus we see that this small affair, which originally was to be confined to two small tribes, and which, on our part, was to have been nothing more than a mere naked assent, now loses its insignificance, and begins to swell into a matter of considerable importance. Here we find ourselves placed in a dilemma, which was brought about, as they doubtless anticipated, by the early intrigue of this land company. These small bands, under Mr. Monroe's permission, moved to Green Bay, and as the title to the lands they claimed by purchase was controverted, we were called upon to interfere, and, as we supposed, to benefit the Indians, did interfere and bought out the Menomonees for them, and gave them the lands. And there they are yet. This treaty does not disturb them. This is not all. We have paid back to them, not only the $12,000 they allege to have paid the Menomonees, but we have given them a great deal more. We have given them, besides the lands they claim to have purchased of the Menomonees, for their $12,000, the sum of $40,000; $5,000 to the St. Regis tribe, and $35,000 to the Oneidas, as a remuneration to them for their purchase of, and removal to, the Green Bay lands, under Mr. Monroe's permission. Now, let me ask, if it be not too late, why have we submitted to such imposition? Why have we bought land for these New York Indians, over whom we had no control or jurisdiction? Why have we made large advances to them, without any consideration? We have done so, for the double purpose of gratifying New York and this overgrown and grasping land company. We have thus seen Mr. Monroe's permission, of which I have spoken, first leading to an Indian controversy, and then ending in a settlement of it, by which we have had to buy land and advance thousands of dollars as remuneration (as it is falsely called) to these New York Indians, and all without the pretext of an obligation or consideration on our part.

I will now, Mr. President, take my leave of the Green Bay Indians, and return to the treaty of 1832. In that treaty, concluded in this city with a delegation from the Menomonees of Wiskonsin, we obtained of them, for the sum of $20,000, 500,000 acres of their lands, near Green Bay, for the future residence, not only of those small bands who emigrated under Mr. Monroe's permission, but for all of the New York Indians, then residing in New York. We obtained this land, so far as we were concerned, as a mere gratuity, and without any other consideration, so far as appears to me, than the wishes of New York and this land company that we should do so. New York desired this land secured, not so much for the residence of those then residing in Wiskonsin, for their welfare had ceased to interest her, but for the New York Indians then within her borders, in the hope that her Indians could be induced to move to them, and, in that event, that she would be rid of an Indian population at the expense of the United States, she was most anxious to get clear of; and that the land company would be able, for little or nothing on their part, to get of them their New York lands, mainly, but indirectly, at the expense of the United States also. These were the calculations; and hence we find that, in that treaty, the New York Indians, although apparently so deeply interested, were not parties to it. And why were they not? I will endeavor to inform you, sir.

In the treaty of 1794, the New York Indians engaged to claim no other land within the boundaries of the United States than that particularly described in that treaty. They had modesty and honesty enough to know that there was no treaty ever afterwards made, by which we were pledged or bound to purchase land for them at Green Bay, or any where else. They knew they had no claim of any character upon us; and not desiring any other lands than those they were possessed of, and seeing no necessity for a treaty, they stood aloof, and had no participation in it. And in this same treaty the Menomonees disclaim any right or just claim of the New York Indians to the Green Bay lands. And this is not the only disclaimer. We find, in the printed documents now before us, at page 127, that the Senecas says that "the Senecas have no right or title to that country, (Green Bay,) as we have never accepted or paid for any interest there, nor do we at this time have any claim to that country whatever." And I will add, that, in a letter received last night, I am informed that the Senecas are now holding a council for the purpose of retransferring to you this gratuity, which, given to them in 1832, without their knowledge or consent, you seem determined to force upon them, and which they, on their part, seem disposed just as decidedly to reject—with a full knowledge that the New York Indians, then residing in New York, had no claims upon us for lands any where, and, on the contrary, when we knew they had solemnly engaged, in their treaty of 1794, to set up no claim for any other within the boundaries of the United States than those particularly described in that treaty, yet, with a full knowledge of all this, we made the treaty of 1832.

In that treaty, in which the New York Indians were not parties, it was stipulated, without their consent or knowledge, that they should remove to the lands we purchased for them at Green Bay, within three years thereafter, or else that their right to this 500,000 acres of land should be forfeited, and revert to the United States. This penalty was inserted, under a belief that it would not be disregarded by the Indians, but, on the contrary, would be considered of such consequence as to induce their emigration. If it was not so designed, why was a time fixed for their emigration at all? Of what consequence was it to us, whether those Indians emigrated this year or next year, or never? Sir, the Indians looked upon the whole of these proceedings, in which they had had no participation, with a provoking indifference and nonchalance. They cared nothing for these lands, or the forfeiture thereof. They considered they had comfortable homes in New York, and there they determined to remain. This temper of the Indians was soon found out by those desiring their emigration; and it was, therefore, necessary to get the time for their removal extended, so that the company could have time to apply the proper remedies, and bring about a conversion of the Indians to an acquiescence in their desired policy. Governed by such considerations as these, we were applied to to change this provision in the treaty; and, as usual, we permitted ourselves, like a nose of wax, to be twisted about by this company, and, to gratify them, did modify this provision, by a supplementary article to the treaty, so as to leave the time for their removal to the discretion of the President of the United States. So it stands now. Eight years have elapsed since that treaty was made, and yet the President has not required those Indians to move to their Green Bay lands, or notified them, if they did not, by a given time, that he should exact the penalty, according to the terms of the treaty. The reasons of the President for permitting those Indians to remain upon their New York lands, without exacting the penalty, are doubtless benevolent, humane, and praiseworthy. His forbearance upon this subject, thus far at least, is not considered by me just cause of censure. Yet I should consider it his duty, before a great while, to close up this contingent claim. I think if these Indians do not, within a reasonable time, move to these lands, that they should revert to the United States; and in this reversion they can have no just cause of complaint. Their title to these lands is conditional—dependent entirely upon their removal to them. It was a mere gratuity on our part, and cost them nothing, not even solicitation, or empty thanks; and now, if they will not accept of our proffered gratuity, if they will not occupy those lands, voluntarily tendered to them on that condition, there can be no injustice in exacting their forfeiture, on their failure to comply with the condition.

Mr. President, we purchased, as before observed, in 1832, 500,000 acres of land at Green Bay, for the future residence of the New York Indians. This purchase being on our part, as before stated, a mere gratuity, and, so far as appears from our records, without the knowledge or solicitation of the Indians, five years thereafter, in the year 1837, for what reasons, or at whose promptings, we are left to conjecture, it seems to have become suddenly, and all at once, a matter of vital importance for us to purchase out this gratuity, a gratuity which the Indians considered of so little consequence or value to them, that they would neither move to it, nor have it. But no matter for that: we determined to buy back from them what we had given them as a present five years before; and in furtherance of these views, in 1837 we appointed a commissioner to accomplish for us this all-important object.

A purchase of this Green Bay land was the ostensible object of this mission. The real object, as I shall show you in the progress of this discussion, was to obtain our influence, and our means and money, to assist a dozen or so of land speculators to purchase of the new York Indians their New York lands, for which they held, under Massachusetts, the pre-emption right. And, sir, we have already done so, to some extent. We have purchased out for this company, and for New York, five of the six tribes—all of the New York Indians, except the Senecas, and we have attempted to buy them out also, whether successfully or not, remains to be seen by a decision upon the question now before us.

In 1837, as before observed, we appointed a commissioner, with the ostensible object of purchasing of the New York Indians their Green Bay lands. So soon as this was known, we found much excitement and agitation among the Indians, growing out of their attachment for, and reluctance to leave, their native land. They understood very fully the object of the negotiation. They knew the Green Bay land was but a pretext, and not the real object of the commissioner. They understood all this. They knew the object of the treaty was to get from them, for the land company, their New York lands. To overcome these scruples, and to reconcile them to the measure, the agents of the land company went to work, and I will now show you, sir, in what manner.

"Articles of agreement, made and concluded this 29th day of July, 1837, between Heman B. Potter, of the city of Buffalo, of the first part, and John Snow, a Seneca chief, of the Buffalo Creek reservation, in the county of Erie, of the second part.

"Whereas, in conformity with the declared policy of the Government of the United States, the proprietors of the pre-emptive title of and in the four several tracts of land, reserved by the Seneca tribe of Indians, within the said State of New York, are desirous to induce the abovementioned tribe of Indians to accept, for their future and permanent residence, a tract of country in the territory west of the river Mississippi, appropriated for Indians inhabiting the Atlantic and other neighboring States, and are, also, desirous, by fair purchase, to extinguish the right of the said Indians in and to the lands in this State, so reserved by them:

"And whereas, in furtherance of these objects, and in order to a future treaty by which to effect the same, the said proprietors have authorized negotiations to be opened with the chiefs and other leading men of the said tribe of Indians, and certain offers to be made to them in money as a permanent fund for the nation, and a compensation for their improvements; and have also deemed it advisable and necessary to employ the aid, co-operation, and services of certain individuals who are able to influence the said Indians to accept the offers so to be made to them:

"And whereas, the said Heman B. Potter, the party of the first part, is empowered to act on behalf of the said proprietors, and to contract with any individuals whose co-operation and agency may be necessary and efficient, in accomplishing the abovementioned object; and the said John Snow, the party of the second part, has agreed to contribute his influence and services in the premises; and in case of the extinguishment of the said Indian title to the said reserved lands as aforesaid, to sell to the said proprietors all and singular his improvements, of, in, and to the same:

"Now, therefore, it is mutually agreed by and between the parties hereto, as follows:

"First. The party of the second part undertakes and agrees to use his best exertions and endeavors to dispose and induce the said Indians to adopt and pursue the advice and recommendations of the Government of the United States, in respect to their removal and future location; and on such said terms as the party of the first part, and his associates, in the name of the said proprietors, shall propose to sell and release, by treaty, their said reserved lands; and on all occasions to co-operate with and aid the said party of the first part, and his associates, as he may be, from time to time, advised, in talks and negotiations with the chiefs and other influential men of the said tribe; and in the active application of his whole influence at councils, and confidential interviews, for the purpose of effecting a treaty between the said tribe and the said proprietors, for the extinguishment of the Indian title to the said reserved lands.

"Second. The second party of the second part hath sold, and hereby doth sell, to the said proprietors, all and singular his buildings and improvements on the lands so to be released by treaty, and agrees to accept compensation therefor in the manner hereinafter mentioned; said buildings and improvements in the meantime not to be leased, or in any manner disposed of by said party of the second part.

"Third. In consideration of such efforts, co-operation, and services on the part of the said John Snow, faithfully bestowed in the premises, and of the sale and release of all and singular his said buildings and improvements upon any of the lands aforesaid, without leasing or otherwise disposing of the same, as hereinabove stipulated, the said Heman B. Potter, on his part, and that of his associates, agrees to pay, or cause to be paid, to the said John Snow, the sum of two thousand dollars, within three months after notice of the ratification, by the Senate of the United States, of a valid treaty between the said tribes and the owners of the said pre-emptive title, or their trustees, by which the right and title of the said Indians shall be effectually released and extinguished, in and to the said reserved lands; subject, however, to the following qualification and understanding: that in case the said treaty shall provide for the payment to individual Indians for their buildings and improvements, then and in that case the said party of the second part shall accept and receive, as part payment of the abovementioned sum of two thousand dollars, such sum or compensation as he shall or may be entitled to, by and under the provisions of such treaty, for his said buildings and improvements, and the balance of the said two thousand dollars which shall remain, after deducting therefrom such compensation as aforesaid, and that only to be paid by the said party of the first part, as above specified, within the time abovementioned, or as soon thereafter as the said balance can be ascertained; and in case said party of the second part shall be entitled, by and under the provision of said treaty, to the sum of two thousand dollars and upward, he shall receive the same as may be therein provided, and the said party of the first part shall be discharged from paying any part of said two thousand dollars.

"And the said John Snow shall also be entitled, at a nominal rent, to a lease from the owners of the pre-emptive title, or their trustees, of and for the lot of land actually improved and occupied by him, called the Whipple farm, near the old council house, on the Buffalo reservation, for and during his own natural life, determinable when and as soon as he shall cease to live on and occupy the same; said lease to be executed by the lessors as soon after said treaty as said lands shall have been surveyed and allotted, said lease having reference to said survey.

"This agreement on the part of said party of the first part, being expressly dependent upon a treaty, to be made and ratified upon terms, conditions, and stipulations, to be proposed and offered by the said party of the first part, and his associates.

Witness: O. ALLEN.

"It is understood and agreed that the sum of one thousand dollars is to be added to the within contract.

September 29, 1838.

O. ALLEN,
H. P. WILLCOX.

Their are six other contracts of a similar character, which I will not take up the time of the Senate to read. These eight have lately come to light. How many are yet behind, undisclosed, time will tell.

Here, Mr. President, we have a few illustrations, most liberal and honest and patriotic illustrations, of the means used by the agents of this land company, and under the authority of the proprietors, to induce the leading and influential chiefs to sell the lands of their unwilling constituents. Here we see, under the very nose of our commissioner, and at the moment of commencing his negotiation, ostensibly for the purchase of their Green Bay lands, the sum of twenty-one thousand, six hundred dollars in cash, besides leases, some for a term of years, some for life, some during occupancy, and one grant in fee simple, offered and promised in writing to eight leading and influential chiefs, by this land company, as rewards, or rather as bribes for serving this company faithfully, with their influence in council, and in confidential interviews with the other Indians, so as to effect a treaty with the Government for their Green Bay lands, and so as to effect a release and relinquishment of the Indian title to the proprietors of their reserved lands in the State of New York; and in case of success in these double negotiations, and in the event of their ratification by the Senate of the United States, then these bribes were to be consummated, and not otherwise.

By these dark and midnight transactions, the order of things was to be curiously reversed. The emigrating party were to stay in New York upon their leases, and the non-emigrating party were to be transported beyond the Mississippi. And are these contracts denied? No, sir; they are unblushingly and shamelessly admitted and justified! They are admitted and justified by Seneca White, one of the chiefs, in favor of the treaty and of emigration, in his speech to the Secretary of War last August. They are admitted and justified by N. Strong, another chief in favor of the treaty and of emigration, in his letter to the President, of the 9th of last March. They are admitted by Orlando Allen, a white man, and one of the active agents of the land company, and justified, in his letter to the President, of the 11th of last March. And pray what is the justification?

Mr. Allen tells us, in his testimony, which he communicated to the President last spring, "that he has understood (and believes the attempt was never made to conceal it) that provision was made for some of the chiefs, in accordance with all former usages among the Senecas." Yes, sir, Mr. Allen may well say he has understood that provision was made for some of the chiefs; for I find this same Orlando Allen, who, under oath, speaks so doubtingly, as though by hearsay only, is a subscribing witness to at least two of these contracts. But, as to his belief that there were no attempts made to conceal these contracts—contracts which were for secret influence and confidential services—we of the committee, who have travelled through this whole mass of testimony, will believe just as much of this part of his testimony as we please, and that is precious little of it, if any. While voluntarily furnishing a part of his testimony for the benefit of the President, he would have done but an act of justice if he had given him, in addition, that part of his testimony, taken on the same occasion, which was, that he was an agent of the company, and directly interested in the success of the treaty—Mr. Allen assimilates these rewards, promised and given to these chiefs, in this underhanded and clandestine manner, to the annuity given to Red Jacket, Corn Planter, and others. Sir, there is no similitude in these cases. What was given to Red Jacket, Corn Planter, and to the others he has named, was given in open day, in the presence of the nation, and with the knowledge and approbation of their tribes. But enough of all this, for the present at least.

Sir, the Indians being thus tampered with, and prepared by bribes, in advance, for the occasion, our commissioner entered upon the stage for the performance of his part of the drama. And, sir, not to be tedious, to pass over a thousand details, and to come at once to the result, I will inform the Senate that our commissioner, after a protracted negotiation, did actually succeed in purchasing for us the Green Bay lands. And he got these lands for us for the very trifling and frivolous consideration of $400,000 in cash, and 1,800,000 acres of land, west of and adjoining the State of Missouri. Here is a negotiation for you, which I am satisfied that nothing but patience and perseverance and skill and dexterity and adroitness, aided with good friends to "back his suit withal," ever could have achieved. This $400,000 in cash, 1,800,000 acres of land, is all that our commissioner agreed to give for 435,000 acres of land at Green Bay, which five years previously we gave these Indians gratuitously, and which gratuity they would neither move to, nor accept of us as a present!

Appended to this treaty we find an ordinary deed of conveyance from the Tuscaroras to Ogden and Fellows, of all their title to nineteen hundred and twenty acres of land; and from the Senecas, a similar deed of conveyance to Ogden and Fellows of all their title to one hundred and sixteen thousand acres of land, all lying in the State of New York, and some of it in the neighborhood of Buffalo, and making all together, from both tribes, in round numbers, about 118,000 acres of land, for which Ogden and Fellows agreed to pay the sum of about two hundred and eleven thousand dollars—not quite two dollars an acre. These deeds are honored with a preamble, and recite the important fact, that a treaty had been concluded between our commissioner and these Indians. These deeds are otherwise distinguished, by being approved, not only by the superintendent of Massachusetts, whose duty it probably was to approve them, but they were also approved of by our commissioner, not as a witness, but in his official capacity—and what is still more remarkable, when this treaty came to the Senate, in 1838, for ratification, these deeds came with it.

Well, sir, what next occurred? The treaty was read in the Senate, was properly referred, and then your committee went to work upon it. They found it so essentially defective, that it was out of their power to recommend its ratification. The objections to it were communicated, among others, to the Senators from New York. Some alterations in it were suggested by the War Department, and all agreed, without a dissenting voice in any quarter, so far as I recollect, that it could not be ratified in the form in which it was executed. We amended it, and so thoroughly, as to make nearly a new treaty out of it; and in these amendments the Senate concurred, and I believe with unanimity.

While this treaty was before the committee, we heard many complaints from the Indians and others, against the treaty. Fraud, unfairness, and bribery, of which, at that time, we had no evidence, were charged; and it was stated that a majority of the chiefs neither approved of nor had signed the treaty, although from the preamble it purported to have been executed in council, and properly assented to. To guard these charges, the Senate adopted the resolution of the 11th of June, 1838, which was recommended by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and which is as follows:

"Provided always, and be it further resolved, two thirds of the Senate present concurring, That the treaty shall have no force or effect whatever, as it relates to any of said tribes, nations, or bands of New York Indians, nor shall it be understood that the Senate have assented to any of the contracts connected with it, until the same, with the amendments herein proposed, is submitted, and fully and fairly explained, by a commissioner of the United States, to each of said tribes, or bands, separately assembled in council, and they have given their free and voluntary assent thereto; and if one or more of said tribes or bands, when consulted as aforesaid, shall freely assent to said treaty as amended, and to their contract connected therewith, it shall be binding and obligatory upon those so assenting, although other or others of said bands or tribes may not give their assent, and thereby cease to be parties thereto. Provided, further, That if any portion or part of said Indians do not emigrate, the President shall retain a proper proportion of said sum of four hundred thousand dollars, and shall also deduct from the quantity of land allowed west of the Mississippi, such number of acres as will leave to each emigrant three hundred and twenty acres only."

Thus it appears that we sanctioned the treaty of the 15th of January, 1838, on the express condition that the treaty, as amended by us, should be approved of by a majority of the chiefs of each tribe, separately assembled in open council, and after it had been, by our commissioner, fairly and fully explained in open council, and by a majority of them freely and voluntarily assented to in open council.

Well, sir, what next? With the treaty, as amended, our commissioner was once more despatched to his red brethren, with whom he had previously been so very successful, to obtain their assent to the treaty in its amended form. He received his instructions on the 9th of July, 1838, and was at his post in the month of August following. He succeeded in obtaining the assent of all the tribes but the Senecas. These he found, as usual, a little refractory. He met them in council on the 17th of August, in a council house he had built for the purpose; and as many of the chiefs were absent, he, at the request of the Indians, adjourned the council for three days. On his return on the 20th, he found his council house burnt down—the work of an incendiary. He built him another, and then fully and fairly explained the treaty and the amendments made to it by the Senate. He found the Senecas decided, not upon the subject of selling us the Green Bay lands, but upon the subject of emigration, which to us was a matter of no consequence. He gives us the decisions in the tribe, in a very minute and satisfactory manner. He then tells us that "It will be recollected that at the time of making the original treaty, providing new homes for these Indians at the West, and the means of removing and subsisting them, that another treaty was signed between this tribe and the pre-emption owners, under the supervision of a superintendent from Massachusetts, conveying the Indian rights to their several reservations in New York. That treaty of sale was ratified by the Governor and Council of Massachusetts. At the late council, it was the sale under this treaty, and not the advantages secured under the one negotiated by me, that formed the principal subject of consideration. The Government treaty was generally conceded to be liberal and advantageous; still there appeared to be a settled purpose on the part of some to misrepresent the value of the advantages secured under it, as one means of defeating the other."

Here, Mr. President, we have the whole story, fresh, full, and complete, from the lips of our frank and candid commissioner. It was the sale to the land company, brought about, as I have shown you, by bribery and corruption, that has occasioned the failure of our commissioner in perfecting, from this tribe, the purchase of their Green Bay land. Our treaty, he tells us, was considered liberal and advantageous, and with it no fault was found, and, I confess, it would have been passingly strange to me, if there had been any objections to it.

And now let me ask, if our real object had been to purchase the Green Bay land, why was our treaty embarrassed by negotiating with them for their removal beyond the Mississippi? Why not let them remain? they are not in our way. We are not bound, in any manner that I know of, to purchase their lands for these pre-emptioners. What have they done for "the State" that we should give them a million or so of dollars, in cash and land, to aid them in their speculations. Sir, our commissioner desired honor, and glory, and promotion; and he was taught to believe, and no doubt truly, that if, by negotiation, he could succeed in getting those Indians out of New York and over the Mississippi, at the expense of the United States, that glory, and honor, and promotion would be his reward.

Sir, the Green Bay lands, if ever the subject of serious discussion at any time, were all along considered but a trifling matter with either the Indians or our negotiator. But I proceed, for I have yet, sir, a good deal of ground to travel over.

The commissioner tells us, that, "at an early period of the council, that Marius B. Pierce, then an opponent of the treaty, in public council proposed to me the following questions:"

"1. If the amendments of the treaty were not now assented to, whether I could adjourn the council; and whether, if not adjourned, it could be again convened?

"2. Whether the Senate could recede from its amendments?

"I was also asked, at about the same time, by others in council, whether the deed to the pre-emptive purchasers, being ratified by the Governor and Council of Massachusetts, was obligatory upon the nation, without further action on the part of the nation? Also, whether the Senate of the United States had any legal jurisdiction over the subject?"

To those questions the commissioner declined giving any answer; and as he has not condescended to tell us why these questions were asked, I will endeavor to supply his omissions as I feel myself able to do, from the testimony before us. The first question was asked because the opponents of the treaty then had a majority in council against the treaty, and were able to vote it down, and he was apprehensive that the commissioner might keep adjourning the council from day to day, until a majority might be got in some way or other to assent to the treaty. He and his friends were then neglecting their private affairs; were poor, without money, and depended for their bread upon their daily labor. They wanted to see the council closed, that they might go home; they were unwilling that the council should be kept open any longer, or convened again, after it was closed. These were Pierce's reasons for asking the first question.

He asked the second, because he had been told, as an inducement for their agreeing to the treaty, that the Senate would, if necessary, recede from its amendments, and that the treaty would be ratified as originally made, and then, in that event, they would lose the rewards and life-leases, &c. which they then had it within their power to obtain from their friends, the generous and liberal minded pre-emptioners.

The third question was asked, because they were told the New York land was gone at any rate—that their deeds had been approved by the Governor and Council of Massachusetts. The commissioner also declined answering this question; but afterwards, "learning that General Dearborn had expressed a different opinion," (from that expressed by the head of the Indian bureau, and by Mr. Ward, a clerk of that bureau,) "I informed the council of it, and General Dearborn gave Governor Everett's reasons for his opinions. The Indians were then left to form their own conclusions on the question of title and probable action of the Senate. I then informed the Indians that, if the interests of the Indians required it, I believed I had the right, and should adjourn the council to some future day." Yes, sir; and he did adjourn the council. The opinions of Governor Everett, respecting the validity of the sale, produced this result. The pre-emptioners could no longer frighten them "with the scarecrow" that their lands were gone. This being the case, it became necessary for the pre-emptioners to change their mode of attack; and time was necessary to agree upon the modus operandi: and therefore the council was adjourned.

The next entertainment we have of the commissioner is as follows:

"Learning from the discussions in council, that many desired to remain longer than five years on their reservations, I induced the agent of the pre-emptive owners, on the 26th of September last to authorize me in writing, to say to the council that he would, on behalf of the pre-emptive purchasers, agree to allow them to occupy their farming lands ten, instead of five years. His proposition is marked No. 30. This offer did not, as was anticipated, produce unanimity of feeling. Some said it was their desire to remain for their lives; but that they were willing others might remove if they chose to do so. In connection with General Dearborn, I requested the agent to offer life leases, free of rent, to all who chose to remain. His offer to do so is marked No 31. Without consulting with a single individual, a chief in the opposition, by the name of Israel Jemison, rose and stated that he was authorized to say that the opposition unanimously declined the proposition. Knowing that no one had authorized him to speak on a subject but that moment named in council, I did not consider his statement entitled to any respect. No one of the opposition rising to set him right in such a case of palpable falsehood, I became satisfied of the truth of the allegation so often made, that many dare not speak their minds in council, and that compulsion was used to prevent chiefs from signing."

He talks of fear and compulsion! Why should they fear? Why should Indian warriors manifest a timidity which, in a virtuous cause, would disgrace even their squaws? They fear because they are in a minority, and know they are doing, from base and mercenary considerations, what a majority of their people disapprove of. Their fear is but the palpable evidence of a guilty heart! An honest man, red or white, fears nothing! Cowardice and trembling are the attributes of a guilty conscience!

He tells us that—

"Immediately after communicating and explaining the offer of life leases to all who desired them, I presented the manuscript copy of the amended treaty, to which I had attached a written assent. I informed the council that those who chose to do so could sign it there, and those who from fear, or other cause, preferred signing at my room in presence of myself, the superintendent from Massachusetts, the agent, and such other persons as might be present might do so. I then received sixteen signatures, and subsequently at my room, in presence of General Dearborn, thirteen, and two other signatures at the rooms of chiefs who were too unwell to attend council, making in all thirty-one chiefs."

Yes, sir, with all the bribery I have previously alluded to, with life leases, free of rent, for all who chose to stay, embracing the whole tribe, we yet find the commissioner unable to get, in open council, as he was required to do by the resolution of the 11th June, 1838, but sixteen signatures of assent, out of eighty-one, to the amended treaty; and, in addition to these sixteen, he obtained afterwards, not in council, but at his private lodgings, the signatures of assent of thirteen more, and at their own residence the signatures of two others, making, in all, but thirty-one, obtained, as before stated, out of eighty-one chiefs belonging to the Seneca nation. Finding this to be the case, he then, on the 2d of October, after laboring, if not praying and fasting, for upwards of forty days in the wilderness with the heathens, he informed the agent of pre-emptioners, (not the Indians with whom he was negotiating,)

"That he should adjourn the council, as there seemed to be no more disposed to sign the assent. A question having been raised, (he tells us) whether the assent had been sufficiently signed or not, (that is, whether thirty-one, if there had been no objection to the manner of obtaining their signatures, was a majority of eighty-one,) he (the agent of the land company) desired me to adjourn to a future day, and that, in the mean time, I could report to you."

He adjourned the Council to the 15th of November.

"On adjourning the council, I read them a talk, which is marked No. 39. The Indians who are opposed to emigration did not object to this adjournment, and, in making it, I did what I thought due to them and to the purchasers. If the assent is not sufficiently signed, it may be done at a future day, and the emigration party, who have listened to the advice of the Government, may be saved from the oppression which would otherwise await them. If there were not signatures sufficient to meet your approbation, and it should turn out that the legal title is in the purchasers, then the condition of the Senecas would be deplorable. They would be without a home, though one had been freely offered to them."

Poor Senecas! how stubborn and stiff-necked they are! Why will they not listen to the pathetic advice of the Government, so eloquently delivered, and save themselves from oppression? Why will they not see that if it should so happen that the title to their lands is vested in the purchasers, how deplorable will be their condition? Why will they not see (what no one else but the commissioner could perceive) that if the treaty should not be assented to, that they would be without a home—without even their Green Bay lands, which they refuse to sell us? What insanity! How unreasonable they are in desiring to retain their ancestral homes and fire sides! How cruel and hard-hearted they are, in refusing to gratify the humane and benevolent, and Indian-loving, and God-serving pre-emptioners! Oh, Senecas! Senecas!! How you astonish your grey-headed fathers of the Senate!

Mr. President, we now find our commissioner laying aside his poetry and his predictions, and talking mathematically. After stating the number of chiefs who signed the treaty, and their manner of signing it, he then puts the question to the Secretary of War to know if it be necessary to have the assent of all the chiefs upon the reservation.

"If so [he says] it was not sufficiently signed in my presence. [And he might have added it was still less sufficiently in open council, as it was required to be done by the Senate's resolution.] If not, need it be signed by more than a majority of all who, at any time, attended the council. [He then reminds us of what we would not otherwise probably have thought of, that] this is what is usually required in legislative bodies, and reasoning from analogy, the assent is sufficiently signed. If it requires a majority of all who may have been, from time to time, for short periods, at council, it is not in my power to give you the necessary facts whereon to decide."

Now, sir, our most worthy commissioner, (who is an ex-member of Congress, and who, on that account, should be presumed to be familiar with the proceedings of deliberative bodies,) has lost sight of one very important point in his analogy, which is, that the official acts of members of Congress, out of their respective houses, (alias, the councils,) are nugatory. Does he not know that if members of Congress were to sign their assent to the passage of bills, or if Senators to the ratification of treaties, at their private rooms or lodgings, as this Indian assent (in part) was signed, that it would be nugatory, nonsensical, and unconstitutional? I leave the question to himself to answer. Speaking of analogies, I will go a little farther, and as he has said it better than I can say it, I will avail myself of the remarks of Gov. Everett upon this subject:

"The treaty making power [says the Governor] is granted by the Constitution in general terms. No modification of its exercise, in reference to Indian tribes, is recognised, as it would certainly be unconstitutional for the President of the United States to attempt to treat with individual members of any foreign State or Government, (not duly authorized to represent such body,) or to attempt to obtain the ratification of a treaty by means of the assent of individuals of the Senate, not duly assembled and acting as such." "I remain of opinion that the constitutionality of attempting to obtain the assent of individual Indian chiefs to the amended treaty, in the manner in question, is doubtful."

Sir, were ever these old, safe, rational, and salutary rules dispensed with by our Government, in treating with any nation, foreign or domestic, civilized or savage? I know of no dispensation of those time-honored and customary forms in any case whatever. I hold, that if it be necessary to treat at all, that we should treat according to the ordinary and constitutional forms.

The commissioner concludes his report by telling us, what we could well have imagined, that all the expenses of the amended treaty had been defrayed by the United States; and thinks if any further expenses are to be incurred, that the pre-emption purchasers should pay their part of it. He ought to have said the whole of it, as it would all be for their private benefit.

The report of General Dearborn to General Everett corresponds, in the main, with that of Mr. Gillett, and therefore I shall not be considered, I hope, as treating that able State paper with disrespect, if I dispose of it very briefly.

General Dearborn tells us that,

"Among the numerous and very cogent reasons which were urged by the commissioner for inducing the Indians to assent to the amended treaty, during the progress of the long protracted deliberations, he observed that he had been directed by the officer at the head of the bureau of the Indian Department, to state, as his opinion, that the contract of the Indians for the sale of their right of possession to the Ogden company was complete, and might be carried into effect, whether the treaty with the United States was ratified or not.

"As this was the only statement made by the commissioner to which I did not fully concur, I informed the chiefs it became my duty to announce to them that the Governor of Massachusetts entertained a different view of the subject; and was authorized to state, that unless the amendments made to the treaty were assented to, he considered the contracts, for the sale of their right of possession, null and void; but that he did not undertake, peremptorily, to decide a question of such great importance; that it was one which required the most grave and deliberate consideration, and must ultimately be referred to the highest judicial tribunals of the country, if it should be insisted on by the pre-emptioners.

"It was, therefore, for the chiefs to determine how far their decision was to be influenced by the doubtful position in which the subject was placed, from these conflicting opinions; for if they should reject the treaty, and the contracts for the sale of their reservations were declared binding, they would be left without a home."

This disclosure needs no comment. The unfairness and reprehensibility, on the part of the commissioner, of the use of such terrible and unsound arguments to the ignorant Senecas, is obvious to all. The General also tells us, that

"The commissioner was induced to afford the last named accommodation, in consequence of having been informed that there were several chiefs who were in favor of emigration, but were afraid to sign the treaty publicly, as they had been threatened with fatal consequences if they did. Intimidation has been extensively used by the leaders and their partisans in the opposition, for the purpose of defeating the wishes of those who are desirous of removing to the West. The commissioner was informed by the chiefs of the Tuscaroras, that threats had been sent to them from the Tonawanda reservation, to deter them from ratifying the treaty.

"It had been repeatedly represented, during the last council and the present, that there were a number of Indians, and especially among the aged, who were desirous to remain here, and who often observed: 'Let the young go to the new country, beyond the great river, if they wish, but we are too old to begin new establishments; we had rather live and die where we have so long resided, on the land of our fathers.' To obviate this objection to the ratification of the treaty, the commissioner recommended to the pre-emptioners that they should offer to give again for life, free of rent, to such Indians as were anxious to reman, and I concurred in opinion as to the propriety of that measure, believing that it would not only be just towards the Indians, but considered as beneficent, magnanimous, and liberal on their part, let the result be what it may; that I considered it important it should be done in open council, and made general in its operation, to preclude every ground of complaint or misrepresentation.

The pre-emptive agents having been finally induced to adopt that measure, a communication was made to the commissioner, for carrying it into effect, which he laid before the assembled chiefs immediately after he had concluded his remarks on the method in which the assent was to be given to the treaty.

"One of the chiefs, in behalf of those in the opposition, then rose and stated, that they did not desire to avail themselves of the offer which had just been made by the pre-emptive owners; and observed that they wished the council might be kept open, after those had signed the treaty who were present, as they desired to execute, in the presence of the commissioner of the United States and superintendent of Massachusetts, a written declaration of their dissent. The commissioner replied that he was not authorized to authenticate any document other than such as he had been specially directed to submit for their consideration, and therefore could not with propriety keep the council open for the purpose which had been stated.

"I was then reminded by another chief of the opposition party, that I had informed them on the opening of the council, although I was not instructed to advise them either to remain where they were or to emigrate to the Indian Territory in the West, I had been sent there by the Governor of Massachusetts to see that impartial justice was done to the Seneca nation of Indians, and that I had observed, on another occasion, I should not be deterred by the flash of the tomahawk or the crack of the rifle in the independent and honest discharge of my duty; and as I should be a witness to such of the chiefs as were in favor of emigration, who signed the treaty, 'MY HEAD WOULD NOT BE STRAIGHT' unless I also verified their proceedings; and then asked me if I would remain for that purpose.

"I answered, that I considered it my duty to comply with all proper requests, from any portion of the Seneca Indians, so far as it was in my power to do so; that I should, with great pleasure, remain and witness the signatures to the declaration which it was proposed to execute, after the commissioner of the United States retired from the council house.

"As many of the emigration chiefs were absent, only sixteen names were affixed to the treaty, in council, on the 28th ult.; and immediately after the adjournment, the written declaration of the chiefs opposed to emigration was produced and signed in my presence."

Here we find that our commissioner refused to receive the list of the names of the dissenting chiefs, or what they called their protest, which was tendered him in open council. But General Dearborn, who is a military man—a man of mettle—who is not, as he informs us, to be "deterred from a faithful discharge of his duty by the flash of the tomahawk or the crack of the rifle," did receive and witness this dissent, or protest; and he forwarded it, according to the request of the Senecas, to Governor Everett. This protest contained the names of sixty chiefs, out of eighty-one, and is to be found in our printed document, at page 174. Here ends my review of the reports of Messrs. Gillet and Dearborn, upon their first embassy. They had another, which I will briefly dispose of; but, before doing so, it will be necessary to notice the official action of the head of the Indian bureau, upon our commissioner's report. Let us now see how Mr. Crawford viewed this matter. Mr. Crawford says, in his letter to the Secretary of War, of the 29th of October, 1838:

"The only difficulty in the way of regarding the acts of the Indians as meeting the resolution of the Senate, that appears to me insuperable, concerns the assent reported to have been given by the Senecas. There are in this band seventy-eight chiefs. The assent of sixteen was obtained in council, of thirteen at the room of the commissioner, and of two others at their own quarters, making thirty-one; and, since the arrival of Mr. Gillet in Washington, he has received the written assents of five more, properly authenticated, making an aggregate of thirty-six. The commissioner reports that not more than sixty-one chiefs attended the council at one time, and that thirty-six is more than one-half of the number of chiefs that probably gave their attendance in council at all the meetings; two of the chiefs, it is said, hold a questionable authority, and two have removed from the country. Is this an assent of the tribe by the chiefs? The authority of the band resides in all the chiefs; and although uniformity in their views can scarcely be expected, at least a majority of the chiefs, not of those who appeared in council, but of all upon the reservation, it strikes should consent to constitute the "free and voluntary assent" of the tribe. Deduct the two who, it is represented, exercise a doubtful authority, and the two who have removed, and seventy-four chiefs of the Senecas remain, of whom, including the five whose assents were not attached to the modified treaty, but transmitted by mail, and we have thirty-six only. The last five, in my opinion, cannot be reckoned; but I have not noted more particularly the defective manner of their assenting, because it was, in the view taken, unimportant. Perhaps, too, it was intended by the Senate that they should consent in council. Mr. Gillet states in his report that a printed copy of the treaty and amendments was handed him, to which was affixed the signatures of thirty-five chiefs and one hundred and seventeen warriors, declaring their assent thereto. This writing is dated six days before the assent in council was obtained, preceded, as I presume, the full explanations of the commissioner, and, although witnessed by James Stryker, United States sub-agent, and H. P. Wilcox, and no doubt fairly obtained, (for it embraces the names affixed to the assent prepared by Mr. Gillet, and four additional ones,) can scarcely, it seems to me, be considered as within the intent of the Senate. If, however, you should think differently, the four chiefs added to the whole number first mentioned, would give forty assenting chiefs out of seventy-eight. Even if the legal right was as clear the one way as it appears to be the other, would it be expedient to act upon it? The Senecas are evidently divided into two very nearly equal parties, the one for and the other against the treaty, splitting on the subject of emigration, which is much to be regretted. Their own true interest and the liberal views of the Government they do not comprehend, and however desirable it is that they should leave New York, which would be the probable, but not the necessary consequence of the ratification of the treaty, one-half of them appear to be otherwise determined for the present. The report and accompanying papers show that much excitement prevails among them on the subject, and makes it too certain that but for bad advice they would accede to the proposed terms, which perhaps a renewed application might find them willing to do. For this last purpose the door is still open, as the council was adjourned to the 15th of November next."

This letter of Mr. Crawford construes, and properly construes, the Senate's resolution of the 11th June, 1838. Having submitted his letter to the Secretary of War, containing his opinions, &c. the Secretary advised upon the subject, and gave Mr. Crawford instructions for future operations, and these instructions Mr. Crawford embodied in his letter to Mr. Gillet, of the 30th of October, 1838, and which is as follows, viz:

"SIR: Your report and the treaty with the New York Indians, assented to as amended in the Senate of the United States, have been submitted to the Secretary of War. He is of opinion that the consent of a majority of all the Seneca chiefs must be obtained, but that, as you have heretofore met the requirement of the Senate, by full explanations to them in council, you may proceed to the Seneca reservations, and there obtain the assent of such Indians as have not heretofore given it.

"You are accordingly authorized and requested, at your earliest convenience, to proceed to the Seneca reservation in New York, and to carry out the above views. Your service among the people qualifies you fully for the discharge of this duty, and gives assurance of its fair, honest, and capable performance.

"Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,
T HARTLEY CRAWFORD.

"Hon. R. H. GILLET, now at Washington."

Here we have, sir, what I consider a false step in this negotiation, which was not warranted by the resolution of the 11th of June, 1838, nor sanctioned by usage or sound policy, in making treaties with any nation or Indian tribe whatever. Here, sir, is the red book, which contains all of our Indian treaties from the earliest period to the present day, and I boldly challenge any Senator to show me in it a single treaty ever made by us with an Indian tribe, which was not made with them in council, or else by delegates, duly authorized by the council to make such treaty. Sir, the McIntosh treaty, which was made at the Indian Spring, in Georgia, forms no exception to the principle I have here laid down. That treaty purported to have been made in council, and to have been assented by a majority of the chiefs, and to have been agreeable to a majority of the Creeks. These important, and leading, and controlling facts, were vouched for and asserted by our commissioner, on that occasion, in his report. Relying upon the truth of that statement, the Senate ratified that treaty—and what followed? McIntosh was murdered, and his followers were driven, for refuge and safety, out of the Creek nation into the white settlements. President Adams refused to carry that treaty into effect; and, at the following session of Congress, laid the facts of that treaty before the Senate—and what did the Senate do with it? The Senate investigated it, and, finding it had been made by a minority of the chiefs, and by bribery and unfair means, the Senate declared it null and void; and yet, sir, with a knowledge of the proceedings of the Senate upon that treaty, we find, by Mr. Crawford's instructions to Mr. Gillet, which I have just read, that our commissioner was authorized to proceed, for a third time, to the Seneca reservation, and there obtain "the assent of such Indians as had not heretofore given it."

This mode of hunting up Indians, and of getting their signatures, out of council, in the woods, or any where, wheresoever they may be found, seems not to have been very cordially approved of by General Dearborn; and upon ascertaining this fact, we find Mr. Crawford addressing another letter to Mr. Gillett, of the 19th of November, 1838, in which he says: "The instructions given you when here, it seems to me, would justify your assembling of the Senecas, should you deem it necessary. But to remove any doubt, I am directed by the Secretary of War to say, that if General Dearborn desires it, you are authorized, at your discretion, to hold such council."

Here we find it a matter of doubt whether Mr. Gillett's instructions would authorize him to convene a council, and is stated that he is not to convene the council, unless General Dearborn should desire it, and not even then, unless at his discretion. And he never did convene the council, although it will be remembered that, on the 20th of October previous, the commissioner had not closed the council which he was then holding, but had publicly adjourned it to the 15th of November. This public pledge, which we find studiously violated, seems to have given the parties concerned in it no sort of uneasiness, or to have needed any sort of apology. This violation of a public pledge by a duly authorized commissioner, is justified, though not avowed, on the ground, I suppose, that we are not bound, according to modern ethics, to keep faith with heretics or infidels; and we are called upon, as the high priests of the United States, on the alleged, but fallacious, pretext of expediency, to endorse this code of morality.

Mr. Gillet says, in his report upon this mission, that "he visited such places on the reservations as he was desired to by any of the chiefs. Eight of the signatures were received at his room in Buffalo—one at his former lodgings at Buffalo creek, and one at the residence of the sub-agent." These ten, added to the thirty-one before received, makes forty-one altogether, which is a majority of one, and then he insists that the treaty had been assented to; if not according to the resolution of the Senate, it was assented to according to the instructions of the War Department.

General Dearborn's report, in the main, varies but little from that of Mr. Gillett. He states, however, that he thought there ought to have been a council, but seems to have acquiesced in the other mode, as Mr. Gillett showed him the instructions he had received of Mr. Crawford of the 13th of October, by which he considered himself prohibited from calling a council. It is denied that Mr. Gillett said any thing to General Dearborn about his subsequent instructions of the 12th of November, 1838. As Mr. Gillett no doubt intended to avail himself of the discretion these instructions gave him, and finding the pliant New Englander acquiescing in his views of expediency, he never did inform General Dearborn of those instructions. General Dearborn, in his letter to Gov. Everett of the 19th January last, says, he never saw or heard of the instructions of Mr. Crawford to Mr. Gillett of the 12th of November, 1838, and yet the credulous General, after he had found out the existence of such secret instructions some time after the negotiation was ended, and after the whole proceedings were published, seems to take no offence at the circumstance, but states that he believes (a belief, to say the least of it, which shows on his part, a marvellous credulity) that his not seeing those instructions was undesigned and accidental.

Mr. Crawford, in his letter to the Secretary of War of the 15th of January, 1839, upon the subject of the last reports of Mr. Gillett and General Dearborn, says:

"That ten additional assents had been obtained, but that two of which are not manifested, by the party appearing and signing in person. The reasons given for their not appearing and signing in person the treaty as modified, are, that one of them was absent, and the other prevented from doing so by the acts of chiefs opposed to the treaty."

These are important details, and are not to be found in the printed report of Mr. Gillett, before whom these transactions occurred, and which probably accounts for the fact that several of the chiefs, whose signatures appear to the treaty, deny ever signing or assenting to the treaty, or of authorizing any other person to do so for them. I say important, because it will be observed that those two, signing by attorney, constitute what is claimed as a majority of the chiefs. Mr. Crawford concludes his letter by submitting the treaty, signed in the manner we have seen, by forty-one chiefs, for the consideration of the Secretary of War.

The Secretary of War reports upon this treaty to the President, of the 19th January, 1839, and recommends the President to submit it to the Senate. Here let me remark, that the President is authorized by the terms of the resolution of the Senate of the 11th of June, 1838, to promulge this treaty, without again consulting the Senate about it whenever he is satisfied that it has been assented to according to the true meaning and intent of the resolution of the 11th of June, 1838. The Presiden deemed it advisable, for reasons set forth in his message to the Senate of the 21st January, 1839, not to promulge this treaty, but he submitted it again for our advice. By doing so, he has shown that our confidence had not been misplaced. He has shown, most abundantly, that though he appreciated the wishes and interests of New York and of Massachusetts, that he was, at the same time, not disposed to gratify even those two powerful States, at the expense and sacrifice of the just claims of even a small fragment of wretched and miserable Indians. He had the power to speak but a single word, and close up this controversy forever. But, sir, he wisely preferred adhering to the immutable and eternal principles of justice, to the pecuniary gains of Massachusetts or New York; he preferred preserving, with scrupulous fidelity, our national character, and honor and honesty, to the contemptible spoils and laurels which might be gathered in triumphing, by forced and unlawful means, over a handful of ignorant savages. Sir, he resisted importunities, and refused to promulge the treaty, and sent it back to the Senate, to his impartial constitutional advisers, for their consideration. And how did the Senate dispose of it? Let the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the last session, and of the resolution of the 2d of March last, founded upon that report, answer the question. What is the resolution of the 2d of March?

"Resolved, That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the assent of the Seneca tribe of Indians has been given to the amended treaty of June 11, 1838, with the New York Indians, according to the true intent and meaning of the resolution of the Senate of the 11th June, 1838, the Senate recommend that the President make proclamation of said treaty, and carry the same into effect."

Sir, we adopted that resolution for the purpose of giving the parties interested another opportunity, which they desired, to get the treaty assented to by the Senecas. This was done on the 2d of March, the day before we adjourned the last Congress.

On the 7th of that month, four days after the adjournment, and before the treaty we had thus disposed of had left the Secretary's office, so far as I know, but certainly before it had left the War Department, we find Nath. T. Strong, a Seneca chief, in a letter to the President, misrepresenting the views and proceedings of the Senate upon that treaty, and urging him to ratify it. On the 9th of March, we find Mr. Allen, the agent of the land company, of whom I have before spoken, in his letter to the President, urging him to ratify the treaty, which the Senate had refused to do, but seven days before. He furnishes the President the same list of chiefs we had had before us, which he contended was a majority of the Senecas.

On the 11th, we find Mr. Wilcox, another prominent individual throughout the whole of this long protracted negotiation, in his letter to the President, urging him to ratify the treaty, and endorsing the truth of Allen's statement relative to the number of chiefs.

On the 11th, we find Mr. Stryker, the sub-agent, in his letter to the President, furnishing a list of the chiefs, with the same view.

On the 4th of April, we have a letter to the President, from the Ogden land company, with the same view; and on the 6th of March, two days after we adjourned, we find that two of our brother Senators, Messrs. TALLMADGE and NORVELL, furnished to this same Mr. Allen, for the purpose of showing (what they no doubt believed, and for which I attach no blame) that the requirements of the Senate, by the resolution of the 11th of June, 1838, that the treaty should be assented to in open council, was dispensed with by the resolution of the 2d of March. I can only say that that was not my understanding of the resolution of the 2d of March. What is that resolution? The resolution of the 2d of March authorized the President to make proclamation of the Seneca treaty whenever he should be satisfied that the amended treaty had been assented to, according to the true intent and meaning of the resolution of the 11th of June, 1838 And how was that resolution of the 11th of June construed? Let the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs answer. And how was it construed by the commissioner, and by the War Department, until it was found expedient for them to give it a different construction? Let the history of this negotiation, which the published documents fully furnish, answer the question. How was it construed by the President? Let his message of the 14th of January last answer the question.

Construing these resolutions as we did, the President refused to promulge the treaty, notwithstanding all the efforts made to induce him to do so. He despatched the Secretary of War, last August, to Buffalo, for the purpose of submitting the amended treaty to the Senecas, containing the views of the Senate, as re-affirmed by the resolution of the 2d March. He convened a council for this purpose, and what was the result? The Secretary has given us nothing but the speeches of himself, of General Dearborn, of the agent, and of the Indian chiefs, for and against the treaty. But the President, in the message of the 14th of January last, transmitting this treaty again, and for the third time, to the Senate, for ratification, has given us the result of the Secretary's negotiation in three italicised lines, (multum in parvo,) which is, that "no advance towards obtaining the assent of the Senecas to the amended treaty, in council, was made, nor can a majority of them, in council, be now obtained."

I have now, sir, endeavored to give the Senate a full and impartial, though I fear a tedious, history of what I consider the important points of this whole matter, from the beginning up to this day; and in doing so, I have based my statements upon the official published documents emanating from the public agents and officers of the Government. I have not relied, because such testimony, however unjustly, in some instances, might be cavilled at, upon Indian statements and Indian affidavits. Nor have I relied, for any thing I have said, upon the written statements of the Quakers, who are viewed by some gentlemen as officious intruders and intermeddlers in this affair—not because I do not consider their statements as entitled to the fullest belief, but because I have not found such reliance necessary.

Now, sir, having wholly failed, after two years of expense and trouble, of trials and tribulations, backed by the potent influence of New York and Massachusetts, and of the active members of the land company and their rewarded chiefs, to obtain, in open council or otherwise, the voluntary assent of a majority of the Seneca chiefs to the very liberal treaty we are now considering—a treaty by which we agree to give to the Senecas, for their part of the Green Bay lands, their portion of the $400,000 in cash, and their portion of the 1,800,000 acres of land west of the State of Missouri—having failed in all this, what shall we do? Shall we throw our treaty in the fire, and take by force what we have been unable to accomplish by negotiation? It is a grave question for the Senate to decide. If history is to be credited, it is not an unusual occurrence for the weak and helpless to be robbed and preyed upon by powerful civilized communities professing Christianity. Sir, when Cæsar demanded the public treasure of Rome, he scorned the production of any other warrant than his sword. And if we really want the lands of the Senecas for our masters—for this huge and overgrown land company—we have but to use a similar argument, and no doubt it will be attended with similar success. Sir, if we decide upon such a step, let us accomplish our purpose in the bold spirit of the valiant highwayman, and not by the trick and trap, the shuffling and legerdemain of a spurious treaty? If we have determined to give up our honesty, I hope we shall at least preserve our reputation for courage.

By a census of the Senecas, which has been furnished us, it appears that not only a majority of the chiefs, but also, about fourteen-fifteenths of the whole population, are against the treaty, and opposed to emigration. This proportion, we find existing now among them, after all the influences I have before alluded to have been brought to bear upon them for upwards of two years. And, sir, what is more, after endeavoring, in addition to all this, to starve them into submission, by withholding from them until late in the summer of 1838, their annuity of 1837, I will read to the Senate, for their information, the letter of Mr. Harris of the 14th of March, 1838:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Office of Indian Affairs, March 14, 1838.

"SIR: In regard to the inquiries contained in the honorable Mr. Marvin's letter of the 2d instant, referred by you to this office for a report, I beg leave to observe, that it is known here that the Senaca annuity for 1837 has not been paid. Remittances were made for the purpose in June last; but owing to various causes, among which were the absence of an exploring party to the West, the pendency of a negotiation with the New York Indians, and the engagement of the disbursing agent in the suppression of the hostile movements on the Canada border, the payment has not been made. The sub-agent, now here, informs me that it is not desirable it should be made until the return of the delegation now in this city.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,
C. A. HARRIS, Commissioner.

Hon. J. R. POINSETT, Secretary of War.

Sir, the Indians now are, as they have been from the beginning, agitated, excited, and unhappy, about this treaty; and I now hope that, on this day, the Senate will quiet their agonizing apprehensions by finally disposing of it—by ratifying or rejecting it.

I had thought the treaty an advantageous one to the Indians. I think so still. But I am not disposed to force upon them a measure, though calculated, as I believe, to redound to their advantage, which they literally abhor. Whenever they may manifest a disposition to go westward, I, for one, will be willing to give them a home. But, in any future treaty we may have with them, should this one be rejected, I hope we shall have nothing to do with the Massachusetts land company. Let this company extingussh their right of occupancy themselves. And I here call upon those Senators who are so opposed to monopolizing companies and corporations—so averse to paying State, or company, or corporation debts, with public money or public lands, for objects of State or company purposes exclusively, to stand by me on this trying occasion, and prevent such a conversion of the public treasure to such unworthy purposes—to local purposes in which we have not a shadow of interest.

We have had before us a great mass of testimony (ex parte always) upon both sides, criminating and recriminating each other. We have looked over it all; and we of the committee congratulate ourselves upon being able to make up our minds upon the merits of this treaty from the fullness of our official documents, without relying, in any great degree, upon this ex parte testimony.

I conclude, Mr. President, by expressing the hope that the Senate will adopt the resolution reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, which is a resolution to reject the treaty.

REMARKS OF MR. BUCHANAN.

Mr. BUCHANAN said:

He had a few words more to offer, though he did not consider it necessary to prolong the controversy. He had already done himself ample justice, and placed himself in his true position before the country.

When, on Tuesday last, said Mr. B. I introduced my complaint before the Senate, I spoke of the Senator and his speech in a spirit of candor, and with no purpose whatever except that of defending myself. He then replied to my remarks, and the subject passed away without leaving behind one unpleasant feeling, so far as I was concerned. The Senator slept upon what he had said. It appears his friends had misunderstood him, and he deemed it necessary to renew the debate. I did not misunderstand him; and in preparing my remarks for the press, I should have carefully suppressed every expression which could have given him pain.

At his request, I have delayed to publish the remarks which I made on Tuesday last, until he could have an opportunity of being again heard in reply. He has now enjoyed that opportunity to the fullest extent, and what has been the result? My charge against him was, that he had over and over again asserted, nay, that he had made it the very foundation upon which a great part of his speech rested, that I had advocated the Independent Treasury bill, because it would destroy the banks of the country, introduce an exclusive metallic currency, prostrate credit, check importations, and reduce the value of property and the wages of labor. This was the character which the Senator said had been given to the measure by myself, and, alarming as these doctrines were, he was rejoiced that they had been frankly avowed. Has he established the truth of any one of these assertions? No, sir; no. He has scarcely even made the attempt; but has endeavored throughout to evade this distinct issue. He knew perfectly well that it was impossible for him to maintain the allegations which he had made. I shall not enter into a woman's war of words with him. It is enough for me to have fixed upon him the charge of having, throughout his whole published speech, misrepresented my arguments. This charge will stick to him as closely as the poisoned shirt of Nessus. He will never be able to relieve himself from it.

But the Senator, well knowing that the ground which he occupied in his published speech would not sustain him for a moment, has attempted to slide off from it, and has seized, with a desperate grasp, upon a single sentence uttered by me, for the purpose of proving that I am the friend of an exclusive metallic currency. Even if he could establish this fact, which is impossible, that is no part of the question at issue between us. In order to establish his position, he must not only prove that, in the abstract, I am a hard money man, but that I contended that the Independent Treasury bill would convert this into a hard money country. I used the sentence to which he refers with no reference whatever to any effect which might be produced by the bill. It is contained in that portion of my remarks which relate exclusively to the fatal consequences to domestic manufactuces which flow from the enormous amount of our paper issues at the period of our greatest bank expansions. To what extent I was willing to proceed in reducing "our nominal to the real standard of prices throughout the world," I had over and over again explained. I had declared that it was my desire to reform, and not to destroy, the banks—to place them in such a condition as always to secure to the country a currency convertible into specie; and the extent of this reform was pointed out by me in the clearest and most distinct manner. I shall not again trouble the Senate with an enumeration of the reforms in our banking system which, in my humble opinion, ought to be adopted by the State Legislatures, who alone possess the power. A large portion of the framework of the Senator's speech consisted of his reiterated assertions that I had imputed to the Independent Treasury bill the fatal consequences which I have already enumerated; and he is now reduced to the necessity of escaping from these assertions by quoting a single sentence of mine, which, on its face, has no connection whatever with this bill. Such is his unhappy condition.

The Senator complains to-day that I did not state on Tuesday last the particular misrepresentations of my speech which I charged against him. In this he is mistaken. I stated them then as explicitly as I have done to-day. All the Senators who heard me on that occasion must recollect, that I then charged the Senator with having put into my mouth, as arguments in favor of the Independent Treasury bill, the very strongest objections which had ever been urged against it by its enemies. I specified the particulars of which I complained, and read extracts from the Senator's speech, to prove the truth of these specifications. I now cheerfully appeal to the Senate and to the world, to decide what ought to be thought of a Senator who has, over and over again, reiterated the assertion in his printed speech, that I had supported the bill on principles which I not only did not hold but had expressly disavowed.

The Senator says I complimented him on his speech after he had delivered it. What passed between us on the occasion to which he refers, was this, according to my best recollection. As I had not heard his speech, I asked him if he had done me justice in stating that I was not the advocate of a pure metallic currency, but was friendly to well regulated State banks. He replied that he had; and I may then have complimented him for this cause, because I then considered that he had acted towards me in a fair and candid manner. I am sorry that I have since been compelled to change my opinion of his conduct.

I regret, as much as the Senator can do, that I delayed so long to expose his misrepresentations; but I performed this duty, which I owed to myself, at the very first moment an opportunity presented, after they were brought to my knowledge. Until Saturday evening last, when I first read his speech, I was slumbering in security, not even dreaming that the misrepresentations of my remarks with which the country was filled, had proceeded from his published speech. If my speech had circulated with his; if the antidote could have accompanied the bane, there is no candid man in the country who who would not have done me justice. His speech, however, has been extensively circulated; and those by whom it has been read, and who have never had an opportunity of examining my speech, will believe that the arguments which he has attributed to me in favor of the Independent Treasury bill, were actually urged by me on the floor of the Senate. If I had suffered his misrepresentations to pass unnoticed, I should have done myself great injustice.

The Senator has to-day manifested a very bad temper and spirit. He has attributed to me "language which is unparliamentary, ungentlemanly, and untrue." I have but one word to say in reply to him; and that is, that his remarks, as applied to me, are "flagitious," and that he is unworthy of the courtesy which one gentleman owes to another.

I ask the pardon of every other member of the Senate for using such an expression; but I cannot ask that of the Senator from Massachusetts.

CUMBERLAND ROAD BILL.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

THURSDAY, March 26, 1840.

The bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road, in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was taken up for consideration; and the question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. NORVELL, making appropriations for other roads, harbors, and rivers,

Mr. NORVELL said, that when, the other day, he had submitted to the Senate the amendment now before it, the motion to print it and postpone the bill for one day had been inflexibly resisted by the Senators from Indiana [Mr. SMITH] and Illinois, [Mr. YOUNG] This course, on their part, was probably very natural. It was characteristic of gentlemen "feeling power and forgetting right." They felt conscious of their strength on the Cumberland road question; and their impatience, with regard to any obstacle which might be presented to the success of their exclusive demands upon the Treasury, was in due proportion to their consciousness of power. Another Presidential election was approaching; and always, on the eve of such an event, it was perhaps to be expected, that a few States, having interests in common, pursuing a common object, elated with the importance of their electoral votes to both parties, and aware of the anxiety of both to secure them, should combine to press, under circumstances so auspicious, a favorite measure to their section of country. It was to be anticipated that they would be unwilling to embark their fortunes with the kindred claims of other States, whose weight was not so commanding as theirs in the political scale, or who would not present so compact an object, so exciting an interest, for the appropriating patronage of the Government. In this view of the matter, they were not willing to extend the same measure of liberality to other sections of the country, which they so importunately claimed for themselves. He trusted, however, that the Senate would take a different view of the subject, and would act upon principles of a more enlarged and comprehensive policy. Another Senator from Indiana, [Mr. WHITE,] had indulged in expressions of strong disapprobation of all combinations for the purpose of carrying measures through Congress. That Senator had perhaps forgotten that the very measure which he, with others, was now pressing through the Senate with so much zeal, relied for its success, to a great extent, upon this principle of combination, and upon the artificial force which that combination brought to bear upon a great pending political question. A system of log-rolling, of combining interests, to effect an object, was no worse in principle, no more to be condemned in practice, than a system of scrambling, in which all the liberal feelings of the human heart were suppressed, and selfish, local and personal objects alone were sought to be accomplished, without regard to any other consideration, social or national. Society was founded upon combinations and a reciprocity of interests. Governments grew out of the mutual wants, necessities, and dependence of men upon each other. And he could perceive no reason for passing sentence of condemnation on legislative combinations for the promotion of various and extensive interests, legitimate and beneficent in their tendency, when that union and compromise were the principles which pervaded the whole social and federal compact. He could not see that one bill, containing large appropriations, could be more extravagant in effect than a number of bills embracing the same objects and the same amount of money in separate enactments. He considered suggestions of this sort to be but shallow devices to excuse the inequalities and injustice of local, sectional, and exclusive appropriations.

But, say the honorable Senators, the Cumberland road had always stood upon its own merits: it had always been kept separate and apart from other objects of appropriation. This assertion was a great mistake. He had examined several of the acts in which appropriations had been made to the Cumberland road. He had limited his examinations to a few years. These had been sufficient to disprove, in the most signal manner, the declarations of the Senators from Indiana and Illinois, and to serve as a warning to gentlemen against the loose assumption of things to be true, in the very face of recorded facts. By an act of Congress, passed in May, 1828, upwards of three hundred thousand dolars were appropriated for the improvement of harbors, piers, light-houses, and roads, and for surveys, and a continuation of the Cumberland road. By an act of the 31st of May, 1830, appropriations were made for roads in Michigan, roads and a canal in Florida, and for the further construction of the Cumberland road. By an act of the 3d of July, 1832, upwards of one and a quarter million of dollars were appropriated for harbors, rivers, the Delaware breakwater, and for the continuation of the Cumberland road. In June, 1834, the civil and diplomatic bill was loaded with the Cumberland road. As late as March, 1837, an act made appropriations for geological and mineralogical surveys in the Indian territories, for roads in Florida, surveys of the Atlantic coast, and a continuation of the Cumberland road. Here, sir, was not one instance only, in which this rickety child of the honorable Senator had been put out to nurse, but five several times, within a few years, it had to be sustained by incorporation with other objects, such as his amendment, now before the Senate, embraced. He had thus proved to demonstration the fallacy of the declaration that the Cumberland road had always stood upon its own merits, and was too strong and too sacred to be mingled with other objects more constitutional and national in their character. He had shown that often had that work been intruded into other company to prevent the termination of its existence. Frequently had it been engrafted upon other appropriations by Senators who were so pure, at times, as to revolt from the idea of associating even kindred subjects in the same act. All these pretences had been put to flight by a brief reference to the records of our legislation. They had not a platform left to stand upon. It was not, however, at this time, his intention to wage fresh war upon the Cumberland road. His object was to clear the way for his amendment, by showing that the only plausible consideration urged against its incorporation into this bill—that of its having always been kept by itself—was entirely destitute of foundation.

What was his amendment? It embraced no new work. It comprised works long in the progress of construction or improvement; works which had often been examined and re-examined by the most scientific officers; works, the estimates for which had frequently been subjected to the most rigid scrutiny by the appropriate committees. All affectation of objection, founded upon the absence of these examinations and scrutinies, vanished at the touch of truth. It was an objection interposed, to answer present purposes, by those who were at heart opposed to the improvements suggested in his amendment. It was a difficulty raised up by those unfa-formed of the nature, geographical position, and value of the works, or started to excite the more determined opposition of the enemies of such improvements. The amendment, based upon official estimates from the War Department, had nothing complicated about it. The objects were familiar to every Senator who had ever turned his mind to the examination of such matters; and certainly every Western Senator, qualified for his duty, was bound to understand before he interposed difficulties and obstacles of a frivolous nature to such appropriations. By the amendment it was proposed to appropriate 48,000 dollars for examinations and surveys east and west of the Mississippi; 262,947 dollars for the improvement of roads other than the Cumberland road; 854,500 dollars for removing obstructions to the navigation of rivers; 200,000 dollars for the further construction of breakwaters; and 924,031 dollars for the continued improvement of harbors, principally upon the lakes and Western waters. The whole of the proposed appropriations amounted to 2,289,478 dollars. The sum was tolerably large, but not greater than the importance of the improvements would justify. Besides, he had separated the items for the purpose of taking the sense of the Senate upon each; and Senators who might favor one class of works, and not another, could vote accordingly. They could reduce the appropriations, or strike out such as they disapproved altogether. They might cut down the amount to one million, or to half that sum. For his part, as an American Senator, he considered himself bound, while looking specially to the interests of his own State, to extend his views over the whole Union. The co-States of Michigan were entitled to an equal consideration with her in our Federal legislation. In this amendment, however, she had a deep interest. It contained appropriations for the continued improvement, both of her roads and her harbors; and he should feel himself recreant to his duty to her, if he did not, upon all occasions, earnestly seek, by every lawful and honorable means, to promote those vital objects of improvement which, without embarrassing the Treasury, would so essentially conduce to her prosperity. His amendment was not a substitute, but an addition to the Cumberland road. To oppose it, on the ground of a collision between them, indicated nothing but a want of any correct and just knowledge of the course which things had taken here. At any rate, if he stood alone in his vote, he should insist upon taking the sense of the Senate on the subject, until he found that any further perseverance would be useless. The Cumberland road, after it left the river Ohio, had become a sectional, rather than a national improvement; and viewed, as it was, as a sectional measure, it had no special claim to the favor of a Michigan Senator. Its tendency was to facilitate immigration not into that State, but into the States south of her. It would promote their settlement and cultivation; and while he contemplated their march to prosperity with pleasure, he could not consider it the part of wisdom to hasten that march, while they continued to exhibit a disposition to withhold from his State the means of adding to her advances in agriculture, navigation, commerce, and population. He was not satisfied with professions; he wanted votes.

Many of the works embraced in the amendment, were dilapidating for the want of money to continue their improvement. The lakes and other navigable waters, which flow into the St. Lawrence and the king of rivers, were declared, as he had on former occasions said, to be the common highway of all the people of the United States. The States through which they passed would impose no impost, duty, or tax whatever, for their improvement. These provisions were to be found in the ordinance of 1787; an ordinance which had always, except in one case, to which he would not more specially refer at this time, been considered as sacredly binding on the parties to it. Sir, you are bound, solemnly bound, after declaring the lakes to be the free and common highway of the nation, and after inhibiting to the lake States all the means of rendering that common highway safe to the ships, commerce, and mariners that move upon their waters, to construct harbors, to build light-houses, and to do whatever else may conduce to that safety. How can you escape from the performance of this duty? You cannot, sir, without a sacrifice of some of the highest obligations which, as a Confederacy, you owe to the States more immediately concerned.

War was among the possibilities even of the present year. Your lakes and Northern frontier will be its principal theatres. There, on the great inland seas of this continent, has your navy, in squadrons, shed undying glory on your arms, bound your brows with the wreaths of victory, and emblazoned your national character with fresh lustre. There, on that frontier and on the lakes, your future battles will be fought with the colossal power which bestrides one half of the globe. There will you need harbors of shelter and protection for your public vessels and seamen; and there will you require, in winter especially, military roads for the conveyance of troops and munitions of war to the forts so important to the defence of the country.

After some remarks by Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, and Mr. DAVIS, in opposition to the amendment,

Mr. PORTER said: I feel extremely reluctant to detain the Senate by a participation in this discussion; but, in voting against this amendment of my colleague, which I intend to do, I wish, if possible, to place myself in a light to justify that vote, especially as many of the items of appropriation embraced in it purport to have for their object expenditures on public works, in which the people of Michigan have a deep and vital interest. I allude to the improvement of harbors on the great lakes. I shall vote against his amendment, sir, not because I am hostile to these appropriations, but because I am friendly to them. I am ready to do any thing that I can with honor to promote the great interets of Western trade, which I believe to be essentially interwoven with the fate of this harbor policy. I speak particularly with reference to the harbors on these lakes, because it is in respect to them I am somewhat minutely informed, and it is particularly my duty to speak. If my colleague is prepared to vote for all the items in this amendment, requiring appropriations to the amount of nearly two and a half millions of dollars, extending not only throughout our sea, gulf, and lake coasts, but to rivers in various parts of the United States, he has greatly the advantage of me in a knowledge of this branch of topography. I am aware, sir, that all these items are embraced in the estimates of the Topographical Bureau, (a fact, however, affording no evidence of their exclusive merit,) sent here in documentary form, as the result of surveys and examinations made by civil engineers, and that they have all heretofore been objects of appropriation in a greater or less degree. But for myself, sir, inasmuch as we have not the conclusions of a committee on this subject to enlighten us, and as I have enjoyed no means of being advised in detail of the merits of all these works, I am left to the inference which, in the absence of information I must draw, that there may be some for which further appropriations would not be demanded by high considerations of public utility. A suspension may be advisable as to some, and an entire abandonment as to others. I believe, sir, this want of information in detail pervades almost this entire Senate. I do not believe it is prepared to act advisedly on this complicated amendment; and this fact would of itself be fearfully portentous of the fate of the harbor bill, were it dependent alone on the vote about to be taken.

This Cumberland road bill, my colleague tells you, is a "rickety child," and he cites an instance in which it was itself once the subject of an amendment to a special appropriation bill to help it along. In my judgment, sir, this is a most unfortunate personification for my colleague. If the Cumberland road bill be indeed "a rickety child," I am unwilling to give it an opportunity of imparting any of its infirmity to the harbor bill. An inseparable union of the two will lead to a common fatality. They must go to the tomb of the Capulets together. Equally certain, too, for reasons I have stated, would be the doom of our favorite local policy, were his amendment to be pressed now as a substitute, and the vote on it to be final and conclusive.

I deprecate, sir, any course of legislation calculated to jeopardize the great interests of which I speak, by subjecting them to decision on a false issue. I wish the harbor bill (and as before, sir, I mean particularly the lake items of it) to stand on its merits alone; for I know not, at this time, of any internal policy with which it could be connected, in the process of legislation, that would be calculated to aid its passage through Congress. But how can it so stand, sir, with my colleague's amendment added to the original bill, on a final vote? We all know there are gentlemen in both Houses whose opinions in respect to the power of Congress to appropriate money for the Cumberland road are such as to forbid the hope that their votes can be had for its continued prosecution at the national charge. The naked question comes up, sir, for I take it as granted that the two per cent. fund is no longer a fountain at which constitutional sins may be washed away. The number of these gentlemen is by no means small; and, while the entire bill, with amendments, is sure to encounter their opposition on this ground, and while we are, by embarrassing the action of the Senate on the Cumberland Road bill, unnecessarily inviting the hostility of its immediate friends to our measure, in case theirs fails through our act, we have "the hope of despair" to look to, that Senators will vote for us in the dark (for they must do so, if they vote at all in our favor) on this voluminous, complex, uninvestigated, (except in the figures of the Topographical Bureau) amendment of my colleague.

Our harbor bill is not embarrassed by these doctrinal difficulties which beset the Cumberland road bill. The friends of the latter measure are our friends, and if we present claims to the liberality of Congress equally meritorious with theirs, which I believe we can do, we shall assuredly, at the proper time, have their support. I am willing, and I believe it safe, sir, to trust the policy of lake harbor appropriations to their sense of what is due to the great interests of Western commerce on the great lakes; and I am willing and desirous, too, that every item of appropriation for which we may ask should be subjected to rigid scrutiny. I desire the Senate to know what they are about (and they do not know now) when the subject is properly presented, either by themselves or through the able Committee on Commerce, of which my colleague is a member; and, if we then fail, I shall attribute the failure, not to a want of merit in the claims of the lake harbors, but to considerations arising out of the present condition of the public finances.

But, Mr. President, while this system of improvement—which I so ardently desire to favor—reaches, by immediate contact, the interests of six States and one territory of this Union, I can speak of it emphatically in view of those of my own State—even of the very city of my residence; although, as is well known, she asks nothing from Congress in the way of direct local appropriation, to add to her commercial facilities, so far as they are connected with navigation. Yes, sir, even Detroit is deeply interested in these lake works, and were I to look to her welfare alone, I could find abundant reason to deprecate any unfortunate step in the forms of legislation which should put the harbor bill to the extent of the interest I, in part, immediately represent in it at hazard.

The city of Detroit is regarded as one of the most eligible points on the great lakes, above the Falls of Niagara, for owning and controlling lake shipping. Occupying an intermediate point in this great chain of navigation—having a natural harbor of unsurpassed excellence and unlimited capacity—she adds the important advantage of being one of the first to be emancipated from the icy fetters of winter. The business of the season with the upper ports, both of Lake Erie and the lakes above her, she is among the first to participate in, and employment is, in many instances, for weeks, given to her shipping, while at other important points it is locked up with ice. And this feature in our position is becoming more and more important as the trade of the West increases. In proof of the real existence of these peculiar advantages,

I might add that, of the entire tonnage of all these lakes, about one-fourth is licensed and enrolled at the port of Detroit, and this, too, without her enjoying the benefits of being a terminating point of a far-reaching inland communication. The interest that Detroit then has, sir, in these harbor improvements, is not directly local as to herself. It consists in the security they will afford to her shipping, which is every where abroad upon and whitening these great inland seas, and to the lives, not only of passengers, but of her hardy, intrepid mariners, whose perils and hardships in the vernal and autumnal seasons are far greater than those encountered on the ocean.

But, of the local interests of the people in different parts of our State, it is unnecessary for me to speak in order that my line of duty may be apparent on this interesting subject. A glance at our map is sufficient to "define my position" here, sir, and I believe it will not be misunderstood. I speak of these interests as local, with a view to present object, which is, not to discuss the merits, in whole or in part, of the harbor bill, not now as a bill before us, but which I hope soon to see here, properly digested, as it doubtless will be, by the Committee on Commerce. When that shall appear, I doubt not my colleague will do it justice by a far more able elucidation of its general benefits than it will be in my power to bring to its aid.

I will take occasion, Mr. President, while I am up, to say to the friends of the Cumberland road, that I am with them. I shall vote for all necessary and judicious appropriations for its continuation, let them be what they may, unless objections I do not now anticipate shall present themselves. I regard it as a great national improvement. I admire the wisdom of its conception, and commend the zeal with which its friends have pressed, thus far, its onward march towards completion. I belong to that school of constructionists who believe in the power of the Federal Government, with the assent of the States whose territory is occupied for that purpose, to construct works of internal improvement of this character; and I cannot regard that work as "sectional" which, like this, will, in its completion, penetrate more than one-fourth of the States of this Union, and, by direct or indirect means, contribute to the common benefit of all.

I will only add, sir, that I do not believe the zeal of my colleague for these harbor appropriations to be less earnest and devoted than my own. We only differ as to the time and mode of presenting the subject to the consideration of the Senate, and, if I do not greatly mistake the indications around me, the vote about to be taken on this amendment will show that I have judged correctly.

The question was then taken on the first branch of the amendment proposed by Mr. NORVELL, and it was rejected.

Mr. NORVELL then said, that as he perceived an indisposition in the Senate to favor his amendment, he would withdraw the residue of it.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama then moved to strike out all of said bill after the word "dollars," in the 11th line, which is in the following words:

"Which said appropriations are made upon the same terms, and shall be subject to all the provisions, conditions, restrictions, and limitations, touching appropriations for the Cumberland road, contained in the act entitled 'An act to provide for continuing the construction, and for the repair of the Cumberland road,' approved the third day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven."

Mr. C. said, the part of the bill which he had moved to strike out, referred to and proposed to continue the conditions, limitations, and restrictions, contained in an act making appropriations for the same road, which was approved on the 3d day of March, 1837. In order to understand those conditions, limitations, and restrictions, it would be necessary to refer to that act; and the most important would be found in the fourth and last section, which was in the following words:

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the several sums hereby appropriated for the construction of the Cumberland road, in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, shall be replaced by said States respectively, out of the fund reserved to each for laying out and making roads under the direction of Congress, by the several acts passed for the admission of said States into the Union, on equal footing with the original States."

Mr. C. said the section he had just read had reference to what was commonly called the 2 per cent. fund, reserved by the compacts for the admission of the States named, to be applied to the making of a road, or roads, leading to the said States, under the direction of Congress. The clause of the bill, which he had moved to strike out, referred to this condition, amongst others, and declared, in effect, that the appropriation now about to be made, should be "replaced by the said States respectively, out of the fund reserved to each for laying out and making roads under the direction of Congress." This declaration distinctly implied, (Mr. C. said) that there existed such a fund, out of which this large appropriation could or might be "replaced," or refunded to the United States. Mr. C. said that any such assertion or implication was untrue; that it had no foundation in fact; and was, consequently, calculated to deceive, and impose upon the country. He said the Senate should take care that their records and laws should be founded in truth, and contain nothing false and delusive. Mr. C. said he was now prepared to demonstrate the correctness of the position he had assumed, by official documents.

He said he would, in the first place, bring to the notice of the Senate a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, responsive to a resolution he had offered some days before, which would show the amount of the two per cent. fund which had accrued upon the lands sold in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, up to the latest returns; and would also furnish data on which to estimate the amount of the fund hereafter to accrue. The aggregate original quantity of public lands in those four States was 114,104,652 acres. Of that quantity 46,649,322.29 of acres had been sold; and upon the amount for which it sold, the entire two per cent. of the four States on the nett proceeds was but $1,096,012 18.

Now, said Mr. C. to ascertain how the account stands, let us inquire into the amount of appropriations which have been applied to making roads leading to those States. According to document No. 65, in the second volume of the Senate documents of 1835–6, there had then been appropriated by various acts $5,169,407 76, which was about four millions of dollars more than the amount of the two per cent. which had then accrued in all the four States. It might have been supposed, with the knowledge of such facts, further expenditures on this road would have been abandoned. But, he said, strange as it might appear, such was not the fact. Congress had been still going on, at every session except one, ever since, making large appropriations for the same object, and pretended to be reimbursable out of the same fund. By the act of 2d July, 1836, he said there had been appropriated the round sum of $700,000. By the act of March 3d, 1837, there had been appropriated $390,000. By the act of May 25th, 1838, there had been appropriated the sum of $450,000. All those sums, added to the amount which had been appropriated, up to January, 1836, make the grand aggregate of appropriations for the Cumberland road, at the present time, $6,609,407 76—and that grand aggregate exceeded the amount of the 2 per cent. fund of the four States, which has accrued up to the latest returns (and which alone was subject to be applied to making roads leading to them) by the enormous sum of $5,513,395 58!!

Now, (said Mr. C.) notwithstanding Congress has expended this vast amount in the construction of a road leading to and through the States named in the bill, over and above the amount stipulated by the several acts for their admission into the Union, we are again called on for further appropriations to the amount of $450,000, and the attempt is again made to keep up the delusion, that we are to be reimbursed from the two per cent. fund, when every man in the Senate knows that fund to be exhausted more than six times over, and that, from it, we never can be reimbursed one half the amount already expended, and, of course, not one dollar of this, nor of any future appropriation. Mr. C. said he was prepared to prove this, beyond dispute or doubt, by the same response of the Secretary of the Treasury, to his resolution, from which he had before quoted. That report, Mr. C. said, had been laid on the desk of every member, and he invited gentlemen to examine it, and they would find that the aggregate quantity of public land remaining unsold, in the same four States, was but 57,044,342 71 acres. What were the quality and value of those lands? He said it would be recollected that it had, again and again, been asserted and proved, year after year, for a long time past, that nearly all the unsold lands in those States had been offered at public sale, much had been subject to private entry for many years, and had found no purchaser at the minimum price, or $1 25 per acre. It had been shown, by a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, made some two years ago, that there were then about 8,386,772 acres of land remaining unsold, in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, which had been subject to private entry and unsold for twenty years and unwards; 11,590,623 acres, which had been subject to private entry, and had remained unsold for fifteen years and under twenty years; and 7,279,580 acres which had been subject to private entry, and had remained unsold for ten years and under fifteen years.

Without going further with the report, or showing the quantity that has been offered for sale, and remained unsold for a less period than ten years, we have already no less than 27,266, 976 acres (nearly one-half of all the unsold lands in the four States) that have been subject to private entry for a longer period than 10 years; and nobody will take them at $1 25 per acre. Besides this, a report from the General Land Office, made some years ago, carefully compiled from the reports of district land offices, represented (and he believed truly) that millions of acres of the lands then unsold, were unfit for cultivation. The truth of this report, too, had been confirmed on the floor of the Senate repeatedly, for some years past, perhaps by every member from those States. How often have we heard the expression, "refuse lands;" and how truly has that character been fixed upon them by the testimony of honorable Senators, as well as by official documents?

Then, sir, (said Mr. C.) is it not manifest, from this statement of facts, that we can never expect to realize the minimum price for the fifty-seven millions of unsold public lands in those States? He ventured the assertion, that no member of the Senate, however anxious he might be for the success of this bill, could, or would, say that he could ever obtain for those unsold an average price of $1 25 per acre. It was impossible, in the nature of things.

But, for the sake of the argument, said Mr. C. let us suppose that every acre of the unsold public lands in the four States, will command $1 25 per acre. To what would they amount? The answer is $71,305,428. On that sum two per cent. would only be $1,426,108 56. This sum, added to the two per cent. already accrued, would make in all, $2,522,120 74—less than one half the amount we have already appropriated! Is it fair then to say—nay, sir, is it true—as the section referred to by the clause proposed to be stricken out asserts, that the money appropriated by the bill "shall be replaced out of the fund reserved to each for laying out and making roads under the direction of Congress?"

No, sir, said Mr. C. it is untrue, deceptive, and fraudulent. Every gentleman who will turn his attention to the facts, and the figures, must know it to be untrue—must be conclusively satisfied, that the clause of the bill, in question, asserts in substance, that the United States Government is to be reimbursed out of a fund, which has no existence now, and never can exist.

Mr. C. said, it being, then, clearly established, that the idea of reimbursing the Government from the two per cent. fund which had accrued, or might hereafter accrue, in the four interested States, was wholly fallacious and unfounded; and going on the presumption that the Senate would not willingly place or leave upon its records, bills, or other proceedings, that which was at variance with the truth, he should expect his motion to be sustained. The naked question would then fairly come up, whether the General Government possessed the constitutional power to make internal improvements within the limits of the States? Upon that question, he said, as well as the expediency of exercising such a power, his mind had been long made up, and he was prepared to meet it. He said, moreover, in the present state of things, when the National Treasury was exhausted, when we should be compelled to borrow the money which was to be expended on this road, and when, too, we saw the proposition distinctly made that we should hereafter add to the expenditures already made about $8,000,000 more, it was peculiarly proper that we should strip the subject of all disguises, and march up to the true question, and meet it with manly firmness.

The further consideration of the bill was postponed until to morrow.

FRIDAY, March 27, 1840.

After some remarks from Messrs. YOUNG and TAPPAN, in opposition to the amendment,

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said, before the question was taken on his amendment, he must ask the indulgence of the Senate for a short time, to enable him to reply to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. YOUNG.] He said the Senator to whom he referred had endeavored to elude the force of the facts which he (Mr. C.) had on yesterday brought to the view of the Senate, establishing the total exhaustion of the two per cent. fund, six times told, resulting from the sales of lands in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, by a construction which was entirely new, and most extraordinary. The Senator from Illinois had insisted that, by the terms of the compacts between the United States and those several States, on their admission into the Union, the General Government was bound to make, that is, as Mr. C. understood him, to complete, a road leading to each. Mr. C. said such a construction was a palpable perversion of the meaning of the language employed in every one of those compacts, as could be shown by a moment's recurrence to them.

The first of the compacts was that with Ohio, on her admission into the Union; and the clause under consideration was in the following words:

"That one twentieth part (equal to 5 per cent.) of the nett proceeds of the lands lying within the State, sold by Congress, from and after the thirtieth day of June next, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be applied to the laying out and making public roads, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same; such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the road shall pass." By the act of Congress, approved March 3d, 1803, after Ohio had been admitted into the Union, and obviously with her consent, and on her own proposition, 3 per cent. of this fund was surrendered to her, to "be applied to the laying out, opening and making roads within the said State, and to no other purpose whatever," &c. The passage of this act left no other fund "to be applied" under the direction of Congress, except 2 per cent. of the nett proceeds in making a road, or roads leading to that State. To prove the correctness of this view of the subject, Mr. C. said it was only necessary to refer to the acts for the admission of other new States. For example, the corresponding clause in the act for the amission of Indiana, is in the following words:

"That 5 per cent. of the nett proceeds of the lands lying within said Territory, and which shall be sold by Congress, from and after the first day of December next, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be reserved for making public roads and canals, of which three-fifths shall be applied to those objects within the said State, under the direction of the Legislature thereof, and two-fifths [shall be applied] to the making of a road, or roads leading to the said State, under the direction of Congress."

Now, said Mr. C. can it be pretended that, under this agreement, Congress is bound to do more than faithfully "to apply two fifths to the making of a road" leading to either of those States? If it had been intended that Congress should make the road, that is, complete a road leading from the navigable waters of the Atlantic to either State, for what purpose was the amount to be expended, for that object limited to two per cent. of the nett proceeds of the public lands? The cost of such a work was wholly unascertained; and if it had been intended that it should be done, regardless of expense, it was altogether absurd to limit or name the amount to be expended.

Moreover, said Mr. C. it is a sound rule of construction, to take all laws, in pari materia, or on the same subject, into consideration, to ascertain the meaning of a legislative body. Pursuing this rule, I call your attention to the clause on the same point in the act for the admission of Illinois into the Union, which is in the following words: "two-fifths [of the 5 per cent.] to be disbursed under the direction of Congress in making roads leading to the State." Now, is not this manifestly a mere undertaking to expend the two per cent. in aid of, or toward, the construction of a road leading in the direction stipulated? The two-fifths are to be so "disbursed," and no more. If Congress had intended that such a road should be made at all events, according to the construction of the Senator from Illinois, the language should, and doubtless would, have been to this effect: and so much of the nett proceeds as may be necessary to make a road leading to said State, shall be applied to that object, under the direction of Congress. But, sir, it must be apparent to every one, who has paid the slightest attention to the subject, that all Congress ever intended to do, in this matter, was to aid in making roads leading to the new States, to the extent of two per cent. of the nett proceeds; and this has been faithfully done, and far more, as I shall show before I sit down. It is unnecessary for me to detain the Senate by reading the compact with Missouri; it is substantially the same with those which have been already examined.

But, sir, (said Mr. C.) the Senator asks, is the road which was contemplated made to Illinois? Is it made to Missouri? How much has been applied toward the fulfilment of the compacts with either of those States? And he insists, in substance, that the amount of the two per cent. fund, arising on sales of public lands, in either of those States, has not been applied by Congress, according to the terms of the acts for their admission into the Union. Now (said Mr. C.) I have gone through all the acts of Congress, making appropriations for this road beyond the Ohio, since the adjournment of the Senate on yesterday, and am prepared to prove, by facts and figures, that we have not only performed our duty, in good faith, toward those States collectively, but we have done so toward each separately.

Mr. C. said: I assume the position, as now well established, that the General Government was only bound to expend two per cent. of the nett proceeds of the lands sold after the adoption of their respective Constitutions, in aiding the construction of roads leading toward those States. He said it was, moreover, apparent that we were not bound to anticipate the two per cent. fund an hour, but only bound to "apply," or "disburse," it as it accrued. Now, sir, how stands the account with the four States collectively? Why, sir, (said Mr. C.) as I showed you yesterday, the aggregate amount of the two per cent. which has accrued to all those States, up to the last returns of lands sold within their limits is but . . . $1,096,012 18

We have appropriated for the Cumberland road, in all, east and west of the Ohio, ... 6,609,407 76

Balance in our favor on the general account, . . . $5,513,395 58

And, sir, [said Mr. C.,] that balance in our favor—that mere excess, over and above the fund, as far as it has accrued, as I showed yesterday, is more than double the sum to which the two per cent. can ever amount, if, contrary to all reasonable expectation, every acre of land, including mountains, swamps and morasses, could be sold for the minimum price!

Well, sir, (said Mr. C.) let me now direct your attention to the separate accounts of the several States. I will not consume your time by enumerating every distinct appropriation, although I have made out, and have before me, full statements. I will assume, (as I believe may be safely done,) that the whole sum of the various appropriations for the Cumberland road has been, in round numbers, $7,000,000.

Of that sum there has been appropriated for the road leading to the State of Ohio, about	$3,500,000
Her two per cent. fund is - -	340,467 47
The balance in our favor against Ohio - - - -		$3,159,532 53
There has been appropriated for the road leading through Ohio to Indiana - -	$1,648,650 00
Her two per cent is	335,007 36
Balance in our favor against Indiana - - - -		1,313,642 64
There has been appropriated for the road leading through Indiana to Illinois -	$1,085,000 00
Her two per cent. fund is - -	259,587 88
Balance in our favor against Illinois - - - -		825,412 12
There has been appropriated for the road leading through Illinois to Missouri, including expense of the survey -	$747,265 00
Her two per cent. fund is - -	160,949 47
Balance in our favor against Missouri - - - -		585,315 53
Making an aggregate excess of the whole two per cent fund, which has accrued to the four States of		$5,883,902 82

This, too, is without adding the interest on the appropriations made in advance, which would greatly augment the amount.

These calculations, said Mr. C. may not be precisely accurate. I have had time to go over them only once; but they are, in the main, correct, and must be regarded by all candid men as a conclusive answer to the allegations and complaints made by the Senator from Illinois. He trusted that gentleman would consider this response to his question, "how much has been appropriated to each of those States," entirely satisfactory, until he could show some other claim to the public treasure, than the two per cent. fund arising out of the compacts for their admission into the Union.

But, said Mr. C. the Senator from Illinois says this is a great national work, in which many States are interested. He denied this position in every particular. It was neither a national improvement, in the proper constitutional sense of the terms, nor were many States interested in its further prosecution. He said, if the Senator from Illinois meant that it was a great national work, because it was a long road, and much of the national treasure had been expended on it, he would agree with him. This, however, would not do; for upon those principles a road of equal extent, and equally costly, through any other part of the Union, would equally deserve the character of national, and in that way all roads might be rendered national. Such a position, he presumed, would be too absurd even for a friend of the Cumberland road to maintain. Mr. C. said he could imagine no road to be properly national, unless within the constitutional power of Congress; nor did he know how that could be the case, as there was no such distinct, substantive power granted us by the Constitution, unless it could be made an incidental one, necessary and proper to carry some delegated power into effect. He said he had supposed it might be incidental to the war power—that is, the power to defend the country against invasion—and that Congress might constitutionally appropriate the national funds to the construction of a road leading to some portions of our maritime or inland frontier, if considered so vulnerable as to render indispensable such facilities for the transportation of subsistence for our troops, and arms and munitions of war. He had thought he should feel himself called upon to vote for such a road as he had alluded to, if its necessity, or great utility, for such purposes, was clearly made out. But no such case is here presented. This road leads to no frontier, either bordering upon any Indian tribe, upon the possessions of any foreign Government, or to any point on the Atlantic, or Gulf of Mexico. After it reaches the Ohio, that river, which runs a great portion of its distance nearly parallel to it, affords easier and cheaper transportation for troops and all the munitions of war, than the Cumberland road. No one would ever think of hauling along this road, through the interior of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to the Mississippi, the articles necessary for the subsistence of an army, when the majestic Ohio river, with her hundred steamboats, runs along the Southern boundaries of those States the entire distance, and in the same general direction. Nor, said Mr. C. is it a commercial road, more than any other road that leads from town to town, through the interior of the country. Then how can it be called a great national work in any other sense than the amount of the public treasure that has been squandered upon it? And how many States are interested in it? Four out of twenty six! With the exception of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri—through the first three of which it passes, and leads to the last—it cannot be said to be used by, or even useful to the citizens, generally, of any other State. What interest have the States south of the Potomac and the Ohio in the Cumberland road, west of that river? As States, none whatever. An occasional traveller from some of them may pass over it, but no considerable number of the citizens of either of them What interest has New York and the six New England States in it? Just about as much as those of the South and Southwest. Yet, Mr. President, (said Mr. C) all the other States are to be taxed to make a great road for the convenience of parts of four only. The citizens of Tennessee, and Alabama, and Mississippi, and Louisiana, are to be taxed to raise a half million of dollars annually—it will probably soon be a million or more each year—to construct a great road, to run through a few counties in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, which does not lead in the direction of either, and will never be used by one out of a thousand of their citizens. Not one of the merchants of either of those Southwestern States will ever, in all probability, have a bale of their goods hauled over the Cumberland road, west of the Ohio. And, sir, the citizens of Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia, are to be also taxed, to keep up the expenditures upon this (to them) useless and extravagant work. They have even less interest in this road, if possible, than those of the four Southwestern States before named. Nor can the citizens of New York, nor the six New England States, derive any benefit from this expensive improvement. It has no connection with their trade, or commercial intercourse; and, even when they emigrate to the West or Northwest, instead of the tedious, laborious and expensive land travel, by way of the Cumberland road, they will take the more economical and expeditious route by way of the Hudson and Erie Canal, and the lakes. Yet, sir, they too are to be taxed to carry on this work, or, with the West and Southwest, contract a national debt, by borrowing money for the same object. Sir, said Mr. C. this is unequal, unjust, and ungenerous; it is not that equality and fairness which lies at the foundation of all our institutions. I protest against it, as not warranted by the letter or spirit of the Constitution.

But, sir, said Mr. C. the Senator from Illinois [Mr. YOUNG] has thought proper, by way of sustaining this unwarrantable and iniquitous measure, to attack my consistency. Mr. C. said he was not prepared to admit that his own consistency, or inconsistency, or those of any other person, had, legitimately, any thing to do with the merits of the question before the Senate. If he had ever pursued a course inconsistent with that he was now pursuing, it did not prove that such a measure was right; but he was willing to give the gentleman the benefit of whatever aid he could fairly derive from that source. Sir, said Mr. C. the Senator from Illinois asks, with a triumphant air, alluding to me, "Did not the Senator from Alabama vote for the Maysville road bill?" With all candor and frankness. I answer, I did. But let me state the considerations which influenced and determined that vote, before the gentleman shall either avail himself of its imagined support, or condemn me for inconsistency. Sir, I repeat, I did vote for the Maysville road bill; but remember, at that time, and even now, not one dollar of the two per cent. fund arising upon the sales of the public lands, either in Alabama or Mississippi, had, or has yet been appropriated to making roads, according to the terms of the acts for their admission into the Union. Each of those acts held the same language, "that five per cent. of the nett proceeds of the lands lying within" each territory, sold after a certain day, fixed in each, "be reserved for making public roads and canals, of which three-fifths shall be applied to those objects within the said States, under the direction of the Legislatures thereof, and two fifths to the making of a road or roads, leading to the said States, under the direction of Congress." Now, sir, although Mississippi had at that time been a State between twelve and thirteen years, and Alabama between ten and eleven years, and much of the public lands had, in the mean time, been sold in each, and although the two per cent. fund of each had become considerable, and was continually accumulating, yet no road leading to either had been made or commenced, by or under the direction of Congress, nor had one dollar of that fund been applied, according to the terms of the respective compacts. The Maysville road (commonly so called) was a link in the great road, proposed to be made from Zanesville, on the Cumberland road, by way of Maysville and Lexington, Kentucky, Nashville, Tennessee, and Florence, Alabama, to New Orleans, which, Mr. C. said, (if he was not greatly mistaken,) had been laid out, with the approbation of the then Chief Magistrate, by the engineers of the United States. From what he had stated, Mr. C. said, it would be apparent that the Maysville road was a part of the great road contemplated, which led to, and through, Alabama and Mississippi, to the city of New Orleans; and, as the whole 2 per cent. fund of Alabama and Mississippi which had then accrued, or might thereafter accrue, was unappropriated to any object contemplated by the compacts of those States with the General Government, he thought he was sustained and justified in the vote which he had given, and which had attracted the animadversion of the Senator from Illinois. However, (said Mr. C.) if the circumstances stated do not sustain my vote on that occasion, I have another answer to give, which ought to be satisfactory to every ingenuous mind—that is, if not so justified, I frankly admit my vote was wrong. He said he regarded a confession of error one of the best modes of atonement. But (said Mr. C.) does all this prove that the Senator from Illinois is right, in pressing upon us a claim for an expenditure of money so prodigal and unwarrantable? He would leave the Senate to decide.

Mr. C. said it was due to himself that he should say, that if the Senator from Illinois would look through the journals of the House, during the session of 1829-30, (at which the Maysville road bill had passed, and the first Mr. C. ever served in Congress,) he would find that he (Mr. C.) had voted against every other similar project; and, if not very much mistaken, that Senator might extend his search through the journals of both Houses, up to the present day, and not find his vote recorded in favor of another road of the kind This was some evidence, Mr. C. thought, that if he had sinned at all upon this subject, he was not a very great sinner.

However, said Mr. C. in the Senator's embarrassment, and want of grounds to sustain himself, he again charges that Alabama is to have her two per cent. a bill having passed the Senate to relinquish to her that fund, and, consequently, would have it inferred that Illinois, and her co-States in this business, must have all they may think proper to ask. He said this seemed to be singular reasoning; he would examine it for a moment. Is Alabama to receive, or have expended, her two per cent. fund before it accrues? Not so, said Mr. C.; so far from the fact, it has been accruing for more than twenty years, and now the bill, as passed, does not entitle her to receive all that has accrued at once, but only in quarterly payments, and as she may expend corresponding sums, derived from other sources, upon the contemplated improvement; and she can only receive the balance as it may hereafter accrue. Not one dollar of that fund is to be anticipated or laid out for her benefit until after it shall have been first received into the Treasury of the United States. How different with Illinois and the other Northwestern States! They have not only anticipated the receipt of every dollar of the two per cent. fund by appropriations before it accrued, but the General Government has expended for their benefit millions of dollars beyond the largest amount that ever can possibly accrue. Alabama has asked, and expects to receive, no other favor than the mere privilege of applying the amount of the fund (not one cent more) to making railroads connecting the Tennessee river, in the northern part of the State, and the Chatahooche, on her eastern boundary, with the navigable waters of Mobile bay, instead of making a road or roads leading to the State. To such a change, merely in the application of the fund, the General Government cannot object, because we ask no more money, and its interest or convenience cannot be affected. Nor can the interests of the adjoining States be affected: they will be more benefited by such an application, than if laid out according to the provisions of the original compact. A railroad, from the Tennessee river to the navigable waters of Mobile Bay, will open to all East Tennessee and a portion of Middle Tennessee, one of the finest markets in the world for all their rich and manifold productions. Even West Tennessee, up through the channel of that river to the Northern terminus of the railroad, may come in, and participate in the advantages of the same market. So the people of Georgia, from the country lying on the Chattahoochee, around and above West Point, will find ready and easy access to Mobile; and derive advantages from the railroad already in progress in that quarter, far greater than from the expenditure of the fund on a road within the limits of their own State. Those are the only States, that can be considered directly interested in the application of the two per cent fund of Alabama; and the Senators from neither of them have hitherto objected to the bill, to which the Senator from Illinois has alluded. If they do not object, and this Government is to give no money, and lose no advantage, who has a right to complain? Mr. C. said it must be apparent, that the bill to change the application of the Alabama two per cent. fund bore no analogy whatever to the bill now under consideration, and could not aid the gentleman in sustaining his claim to the appropriation which it proposed.

The Senate then adjourned till Monday next.

REMARKS OF MR. DANA,

OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, Friday, April 3, 1840—On the amendment offered by Mr. HAND to the bill for the relief of Bailey and Delord, proposing to pay a gross sum in full.

Mr. DANA said he wished to trouble the House with a few words on the subject of this claim; that he had no knowledge of the facts but what he obtained from the documents before the House. His attention was first attracted to the subject from finding the name of an old acquaintance among the witnesses; and on an examination of the documents, which he made in consequence, he became satisfied of the justice of the claim, and hoped to be able to impress on a majority of the House the same opinion. A part of the evidence had been submitted to a committee of the House in 1836, and the claim reported against. The additional documents presented at this session, it appeared, had not been sufficient to induce the committee to dissent from the former report. He deemed it unfortunate for the claim that the whole evidence had not been presented at once. The first report, made on a part only of the proof, may have been correct, and the additional proof might not be sufficient to require the committee to overrule the former report, and yet it might be very possible that the committee, uninfluenced by the first report, would have decided in favor of the claim. The error of the report is in considering Bailey and Delord as sutlers. They were not sutlers, but merchants, entirely unconnected with the army, except in the single transaction whence this claim arises. They made their advances not on the credit of the soldiers, but at the request of the commanding officers, and on the credit of the Government. This clearly appears by all the testimony, and will not be disputed. The only question was, whether the officers in this case had a right to bind the Government. As a general rule, the officers of the army have not this power; it is only in cases of necessity that this power devolves upon them. That there were cases in which the Government was answerable not only for the contracts, but even for the torts of officers and soldiers, had been repeatedly decided by the House. Where the army was in want of quarters or of provisions, they might seize on either, and the Government would be responsible. Within a week or two, this House had passed a bill to compensate the owner of a dwelling which had been occupied as quarters by the troops, and burnt accidentally after their departure, by the fire left in it by the soldiers. Where a foraging party seize provisions, or a body of troops take possession of quarters, it could make no difference whether it was done with or without the consent of the owner. If the property of two persons were thus appropriated to the use of the public, one of whom generously and patriotically consented, and the other resisted, so that force was required to obtain possession, the consent of the one could not weaken, nor the refusal of the other strengthen, his claim to compensation. A different doctrine would proscribe patriotism, and offer a premium for selfishness. There are, then, cases in which it must be conceded that the officers of the army may bind the Government. Necessity confers the power, and the power must exist whenever the necessity occurs. In this case the exigency was pressing. By the default (not intentional) of the Government, the army was destitute of the means of subsistence; they were in a state of suffering. They were consequently mutinous; one corps had stacked their arms. To preserve the army it was necessary to obtain supplies. The officers appealed to Bailey and Delord to make advances, and assured them they should be paid when the money arrived to pay the troops. They did make the advances, and the army was thereby preserved; but before the money came, the troops were marched away and dispersed, leaving the claimants unpaid. If there can be a case in which necessity gives the right to bind the Government, this seems to be the one. There is another principle which, as between individuals, would give Bailey and Delord a legal claim. They paid the debt of the Government to the soldiers, at the request of the public officers; and if the Government, after notice, paid the debt again to the soldiers, they did so in their own wrong. The mere fact of payment, by consent and notice, would, as between individuals, create a liability; but as to the Government, the rule ought to be held, with many grains of allowance. Here, however, the payment was not merely by consent, but by the procurement of the officers of the Government, under such circumstances as to imperiously require it. This claim, therefore, appears to be just, and ought to be allowed and paid.

LOSSES SUSTAINED BY INDIAN WARS.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,
MARCH 12, 1840.

The bill to provide for the payment of damages sustained by individuals in the wars with the Indian tribes since 1830, being taken up for consideration,

Mr. HUBBARD remarked, that when the bill was before the Senate on a former day, he discovered that its passage was to be opposed. He had therefore with much care, and with much attention, examined its provisions, compared them with the provisions of the act of 1816 and 1817, and he hoped to be able to satisfy the Senate that there was no new principle asserted in the bill now under consideration—that it was in truth a measure founded upon the great principles of immutable justice.

Before he proceeded to give an analysis of the bill, he would state, for the information of the Senate, that, at the last session of Congress, a member of the Committee on Claims, now no more, [General Tipton, of Indiana,] had, by direction of the committee, reported a bill substantially the same as the one now before the Senate. No action was had upon that bill during that session. At the commencement of the present session, that same bill was referred, by order of the Senate, to their Committee on Claims, and he had reported back to the Senate the bill, with sundry amendments. It will be recollected that individuals having claims against the United States for property lost during the war with the Seminoles, had preferred them here for allowance. These claims, if paid, according to the exhibits of the claimants themselves, would necessarily require the expenditure of a large amount of the public money. Many of their private claims had at a former, and have at the present, session of Congress, been horoughly examined by the Committee on Claims, and had received their favorable consideration. Bills for the relief of many of the claimants were reported to the Senate at the last, and the same bills, with some others, had been again favorably presented to the Senate at the present session. He had asked the early attention of the Senate to the general bill, which embraced the same, and no other principles, but what were distinctly embodied in the special bills to which he had referred. He had done this to the exclusion of those private bills, and he well knew that he had done it against the wish of those individual claimants. He had done this because a sense of justice demanded this general measure at the hands of Congress. They were claims of that character which required, in his judgment, more prompt action than experience shows would be bestowed by the uncertain and tardy operations attending the progress of private claims before Congress. They were claims of that character which should be examined by a tribunal constituted for that purpose. This was due to the claimants, and it was equally due to the Government. Having said thus much, he would now undertake to show what were the provisions of this general bill.

The first section declares "that any person who, since the year 1830, may have sustained damage by the destruction of his or her house or building, by the enemy, in the late wars between the United States and the Indian tribes, or any of them, in consequence of the same being occupied as a military deposite, for military or naval stores, or as barracks for the military forces of the United States, under the authority of an officer or agent of the United States, shall be allowed and paid the amount of such damages." Is there any thing wrong in that? Is it not right in itself? Is it not compatible with our notions of equal justice?

The section declares not only that the building should be destroyed by the enemy, but it particularly declares that the destruction should have been made in consequence of the same having been occupied as a military deposite for military and naval stores, or in consequence of the same having been occupied as barracks for the army of the United States; and that occupation, too, under the authority of an agent of the United States. The great and leading principle embraced in this section is, that individual property shall not be taken for public use, without making proper remuneration—a principle lying at the very foundation of a representative Government.

The owner parts not with his own voluntarily; he surrenders not his substance of his own free will. But the Government take it; it divests the proprietor not only of the property but of the possession, and disposes of it for the use and benefit of the United States. The Government says to the owner, this building is wanted for public purposes, for barracks for the army; it must be abandoned by him, and given up for the sole use, and subject to the exclusive control, of public authority. While thus used, the enemy lay it waste; while in the occupation of the American army, it is attacked; the occupants are driven, by the force arrayed against them, from their possession; and the torch is at once applied, until the whole is reduced to a pile of ruins. Shall the individual owner be compelled, by the stern and severe regulations of his paternal Government, to bear the loss, occasioned by no fault of his, but occasioned solely by the interposition of a power over which he had no control? For one, he would not be guilty of such flagrant injustice. Even should it require the last dollar in the Treasury, he would appropriate it for such an object. Nor is there any thing new in this principle—it is as old as our Government; and our legislation has heretofore been based upon this same great principle, that private property cannot be taken for public use without compensation. He had carefully compared that section with former acts of Congress upon like subjects, and he was most happy to add, that there was nothing new in principle in this whole bill. After the close of the last war, an act was approved on the 9th April, 1816, "to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed, by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes." The 9th section of that act provides that any person, who, in the time aforesaid, has sustained damage by the destruction of his or her house or building by the enemy, while the same was occupied as a military deposite, under the authority of an officer or agent of the United States, shall be allowed and paid the amount of such damage, provided that it shall appear that such occupation was the cause of its destruction."

This was to provide for property destroyed on the Northwestern frontier during the last war with Great Britain; and here is an express authority for the bill before the Senate. The section quoted, is substantially like the first section of the present bill; but if those opposed to this measure should be of opinion that the committee had extended the provisions of the ninth section of the act of 1816, he would refer them to the act of the 3d of March, 1817, by which a legislative construction was given to the act of 1816, wherein it is declared to mean to extend to the very description of occupation as is set forth in the first section or the bill now before the Senate. The committee have used, in this section, the very terms of the act of 1817.

He thought, then, he had shown, most conclusively, not only the entire justice of the measure itself, but a precedent in terms for the bill, when Congress was attempting to make provision for property destroyed, in the manner specified, upon the Northwestern frontier.

This is all that he wished now to say with reference to the first section of his bill.

The second section provides that, where the property, having been in the occupancy of the troops of the United States, shall be destroyed by the order of an officer of the United States, the owner shall be allowed and paid therefor.

This section is equally founded in justice. The property is taken, without the consent of the owner, for public purposes, occupied as public barracks, the United States authority exercising absolute and exclusive control over it—and for public purposes it is destroyed, not by the act or neglect of the owner, but by the express order of an United States officer. In such a case, where would be the equity, the justice, the right, of withholding full compensation to the owner? There would be none. And in the cases embraced, as well in the first as in the second sections, the owners, in his judgment, would seldom, if ever, be made whole by any allowance they may obtain by the agency of Congress.

The third section of the bill also finds its warranty in the act of 1816. In the fifth section of that act a provision is contained precisely similar to the one set forth in the third section of the bill before the Senate. And this also seemed to him to have its foundation in justice and right. The first, the second, and the third sections rest upon the principle that private property is sacred—that when, and when only, the interest of the public demand, can it be invaded; and then it may be disposed of to meet public exigencies, or used to meet public purposes, provided that a full and adequate consideration shall be yielded therefor. He rested, then, this bill on that principle. It had been wisely and justly incorporated in the acts of 1816 and and 1817. He trusted that the present was a fit occasion for its re-enactment.

The other parts of the bill were mere details. The last section gave authority to the Third Auditor to decide on all cases under this act. He had great confidence in the industry and faithfulness of that officer; but if Senators preferred a different tribunal for auditing these claims, he would not object. He felt well assured that the duty might safely and properly be confided to the Third Auditor—he would not say that it might not be as well confided to another. This was not the great matter with him. His object was to have the principles embraced in the first three sections of this bill, become the law of the land. Who should be charged with the examination and adjudication of the claims, was a secondary object. It will be recollected that the examination of the claims of a like character, under the acts of 1816 and 1817, were ultimately confided, by the act of Congress of 20th April, 1818, to this same officer.

He could not well conceive what objections would be urged. He was aware that the Senator on his right [Mr. GRUNDY] was prepared for battle. He was hoping that the distinguished Senator would lend him his aid in perfecting this bill; but he should wait and see what objections would be started. He would say in advance, that he was not tenacious for this particular bill. If any Senator could devise a better measure to reach the object aimed at, he should be most happy to adopt it.

The time had come when something should be done; the honor of the Government, as well as justice to the individuals concerned, demanded that something should be done, and done speedily.

Can it be possible that a single member of this Senate will vote against allowing an individual claim, if clearly brought within the provisions of the ninth section of the act of April, 1816? He trusted not. It may be again said, by way of objection, that the Senate had already passed a bill providing for the settlement of private claims, and that the passage of this bill was therefore uncalled for. It may be said, as it was said on a former occasion, that a different rule ought to prevail in the allowance of claims for property destroyed in a war with an Indian tribe from that which should govern Congress in passing upon claims for property destroyed in a war with a civilized nation; that the practice of an Indian enemy, it is alleged, is "an indiscriminate and wanton destruction of private property," and that the Government ought not to provide any more for the payment of property of individuals, taken for the use of Government, than for other property lost by the fate of war. He would examine briefly these objections. And first of all, he must say that the statement that it was the habit of an Indian enemy indiscriminately to destroy all property, was not correct in fact.

As to the first objection, Mr. H. said, it was true the Senate had already passed a bill for the establishment of a Board of Commissioners to settle private claims; and if that bill had passed the other branch of Congress, we shou'd not urge the passage of the present bill. But what is to be done? Is the Senate to wait until the last hour of the session, when they may be informed that the House have not concurred in the bill which has already been passed by the Senate, for establishing a Board of Commissioners, and when it will be too late to originate and perfect such a measure as is now before the Senate? No: the proper course is for the Senate to do its whole duty; pass the bill, send it to the House, and the effect may be to secure the passage of one or other of the general bills. He would not delay action, for the reason that the Senate has already passed one bill, which, if it becomes a law, might render this bill unnecessary. This objection would apply with equal force against taking up and considering any private bill upon the calendar. And what would be said by a Senator, who had a private bill, in the passage of which he felt a deep interest, to be told that there would be no propriety in acting on it, because the Senate has already passed a general bill providing for the adjustment of all private claims. He was of opinion that such a reply would be wholly unsatisfactory. Again, he would urge upon the Senate to do what it ought to do with all the bills, public and private, upon their calendar; and let the House act according to its own discretion and sense of justice. If the bill now before them should be passed, any further action upon this bill, and upon all private bills, will be unnecessary. Should that bill not find favor in that branch, it is to be hoped that this may. If both should be rejected by the House, then Congress is left to pass upon such private bills as in their judgment should be perfected.

There was another objection stated, which merits some notice. There was an error in supposing that, by applying the principles of the acts of 1816 and 1817 to a savage war, the committee had based their act on unsound principles, and had introduced into the bill a new principle. It will be seen by a reference to the act of 1817, that the provision of that act, and of the act to which that was an amendment, (the act of 1816,) "were extended to the cases of property lost, captured, or destroyed in the wars with the Indian tribes," &c.

Here, then, is direct authority for this very bill. The acts of 1816 and of 1817 were extended to property lost in Indian wars; but even if those acts did not embrace property destroyed or captured in wars with Indian tribes, he would ask where is there any semblance of justice in making the distinction? The United States, for public purposes, engage in a war with the tribe of Seminole Indians. In the prosecution of that war, they take private property for public use—they convert the dwellings of individuals into barracks for our troops, or into depots for military or naval stores; and in the progress of the war, this description of property is destroyed by the enemy. Its owner learns that, that while the houses of his neighbors have been saved from destruction, his own has been sacrificed by his country's enemy, in consequence of its military occupation by his country's troops. And it would indeed be a sorry comfort to him to be told, that for all this he can receive no remuneration, because the property was destroyed in a war with an Indian nation. The act of his Government is the same in both cases—the consequence to the owner the same in both cases. The property of individuals has been taken in both cases for public purposes; and in his judgment justice demands payment in the one as well as in the other. He would again say that he would not object to any change in the details of his bill, which would more effectually promote his object; but he would be better pleased to have the co-operation of friends, rather than of enemies, in perfecting this measure.

It may not be unprofitable to take a cursory examination of the cases which have come to the knowledge of the Committee on Claims, and which have induced them to recommend to the Senate the adoption of this general measure for the ultimate relief of suffering claimants.

What were the facts? What had taken place, calling imperiously upon Congress for legislative action? He would briefly state. The officers of the American army, during the present war with the Seminole Indians, and during recent hostilities with the Creeks, had taken possession of the houses and property of individuals, and disposed of them for barracks and for the other uses of the army; and while thus occupied, the property was utterly destroyed by the enemy. Are Senators acquainted with the facts as they transpired in the cases of General Hernandez, Gen. Clinch, and Jno. J. Bulow, jr.? cases clearly within the acts of 1816 and '17, which have already been cited. It had been his painful duty to make himself familiar with the history of these, as well as other cases of a like character. In one memorable case, not only was the dwelling and the house of the owner taken and converted into barracks for the American troops, fortified by a breastwork made from his own cotton bags, but he himself was impressed into the public service, and by reason of which his life was sacrificed. He alluded to the case of Bulow. Will the Senate refuse to do justice—full, ample, entire justice—to his heirs? He could not believe it. This is but one case. The evidence had all been detailed before the committee, and there was no room to question that property, thus taken, controlled and possessed by public authority, was destroyed, and became wholly lost to the owners by the act of the enemy, in consequence of such occupation. In other instances, provisions and personal property of other descriptions had been taken for the subsistence and necessary use of the army, for which no compensation was made at the time, or has ever been made since.

These were some of the facts presented to the committee, and they could not hesitate a moment to render what justice they could to the claimants. It is true that they have reported special bills, as well as the general bill now under discussion—so that if the latter should be rejected, the former, he hoped, might be passed. He did not believe that the amount which would necessarily be withdrawn from the Treasury, would be as large as many Senators had supposed. He had not, from the evidence, discovered any thing alarming in the amount. He was persuaded that if the act was faithfully executed, every claim coming within the provisions of the bill, might be satisfied within the amount specified in a report he had made to the Senate at the last session, which, if he rightly recollected, was less than one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. But the amount of the claims had no terrors to him, nor would it deter him from doing, what he believed, most conscientiously, to be his bounden duty.

It is a fact known to him, that some of these claimants had been reduced from independence to penury by the act of this Government, by the destruction of their plantations for public purposes. These were the very claimants who had long been knocking at the door of the Senate, and asking justice at their hands. Can the Senate turn a deaf ear to their petitions? No: every consideration of equal justice, of right, and of humanity, forbid it. He then would appeal to the Senate to pass this bill, which looks to a remuneration to these claimants for the loss, which they have, without their agency, been compelled to endure.

Mr. WRIGHT inquired whether the bill already passed by the Senate to establish a board of commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States would not reach the cases alluded to by the Senator?

[Mr. HUBBARD said undoubtedly the bill would reach some of them.]

Mr. W. then thought that, if this bill were passed, it would be a kind of duplicate legislation. There was one bill already sent to the other House of a general character, and before that was acted on, here was another of a general specific nature, (if he might be allowed to use such a phrase,) which might have a tendency to embarrass the other.

Again: The same difficulty that had presented itself to his mind, when the bill for the relief of John J. Bulow was discussed, still existed, and he thought the committee had not based the report on sound principles when they sought to apply the recognised usages of civilized to that of savage warfare: they were diametrically opposed in every respect. In the one case, persons who had property were anxious to have the troops kept as far as possible from their domicils, lest the enemy might be provoked to destroy them; but in a war with savages, who destroyed indiscriminately, the case was entirely reversed, and it was at all times desirable to have the property occupied, that it might be guarded from destruction. In the instances before them, so far from the property being destroyed in consequence of occupation, it was protected so long as the troops had it in possession, and hence he was not disposed to lend his sanction to a measure that would make the Government responsible on principles so essentially opposed to each other. Mr. W. thought, too, that if such a principle as that laid down was once established, it might lead the way to other Indian wars, besides opening the doors of the Treasury to an almost indefinite extent.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama expressed his surprise and regret that the bill under consideration should be met by such opposition as it had encountered. He could not reconcile his mind to the idea that the amount of claims should be a bar to the passage of a law, when justice was on his side. Could it be admitted for a moment that a citizen of this country should not be paid the amount of a just claim, because the amount was large? Did the amount of a claim, whether large or small, have any thing to do with the question whether it was just? He could not agree to any such proposition.

Equity and justice should be the considerations to guide us in such matters.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] seemed to think that property destroyed by a savage foe could not come within the principles recognised in civilized warfare; but was such a doctrine correct, or could it be sustained? Should it ever be said that this Government would refuse remuneration for property destroyed when in the occupancy of our troops, or by the orders of its own agents, without the consent of its owners? He hoped never to see such principles recognised. Nor (said Mr. C.) does the bill under consideration involve any new principle; the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] has shown precedents for all its provisions in the legislation which followed the war of 1812.

Mr. C. then went into an examination of the several provisions of the bill, in order to show the several classes of claims which it embraced. The first section, he said, provided that "any person who, since the year 1830, may have sustained damage by the destruction of his or her house or building by the enemy, in the late wars between the United States and the Indian tribes, or any of them, in consequence of the same being occupied as a military deposite for military or naval stores, or as barracks for the military forces of the United States, under the authority of an officer or agent of the United States, shall be allowed and paid the amount of such damages."

Mr. C. said the language of this section was specific and guarded. To entitle the owner of property to compensation for damages, the injured property must have been employed, under the authority of an officer or agent of the United States, for military purposes—for purposes connected with the defence of the country, or the prosecution of the war in which she was engaged. The officer or agent of the Government must have occupied the house or building of a citizen "as a military deposite, for military or naval stores, or as barracks for the military forces of the United States"—that is, as a place for the preservation of your munitions of war, or the means of subsisting your army or navy; or for the protection of your troops, and the better defence of the country. And shall we be told that the property of a private individual shall be thus used for important public purposes, and if, "in consequence" of being so used, it is injured or destroyed by the enemy, no compensation shall be made to the sufferer? Why, sir, (said Mr. C.) such doctrine would not only be at variance with every principle of ordinary fairness and justice, but it would be in conflict with the spirit, if not the letter, of the 5th article of the Constitution, which, amongst other things, contains the guarantee: "nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation." And, sir, (said Mr. C.) is there any difference in principle, when our officers or agents have so used private property for public benefit and convenience, whether the enemy who injures or destroys it belongs to an Indian tribe or a civilized nation? Has it been less useful or beneficial to the public, or will its loss or injury be less seriously felt by the individual owner, in one case than the other? Certainly not. The character of the enemy neither affects the right of the public to the use of private property, nor the claim of the individual to compensation. The only material question is, whether the citizen's property has been injured or destroyed in consequence of having been taken for public use. If that question must be answered affirmatively, the claim to compensation necessarily follows.

Mr. C. said the whole argument of the Senator from New York seemed to be directed against the first section of the bill. It certainly did not apply to either of the others; and he could not well imagine that any argument could be offered against the other provisions. What were they? The second section directed compensation for the destruction of a house or building, "by order of an officer of the United States, commanding in the wars aforesaid, or (as Mr. C. proposed amending it) by the occupancy of the same by the troops of the United States." Mr. C. could not suppose that any one would refuse to make satisfaction for an injury done to private property in either of those ways; and having heard no argument against the provision, deemed it unnecessary to consume time by further remarks upon it, at present.

The provisions of the third section, Mr. C. thought still less obnoxious to objection or cavil. It provides "that when any property has been impressed or taken by public authority since the period aforesaid, for the use or subsistence of the army, during the wars aforesaid, and the same shall have been destroyed, lost, or consumed, the owner of such property shall be paid the value thereof," &c. Now, it seemed to Mr. CLAY, that it was sufficient to state the proposition contained in this section, to secure the assent of every mind. Would the Senator from New York, or any other gentleman, contest the obligation of the Government to pay for property impressed, or taken without the consent of the owner, and which was "destroyed, lost, or consumed" in the public service? Mr. C. could not believe that any one would deny the justice of such a claim, or the expediency of paying the amount. He said that much the largest class of claims embraced by this section, would turn out to be for the subsistence of our troops, and the horses in the public service. Going into the enemy's country, long distances from the dense settlements and the means of supply, and often with very inadequate means of transportation, our officers and soldiers were compelled to suffer the greatest privations, and were sometimes in danger of starvation. Hence they laid hold of the means of subsistence for themselves, and forage for their horses, wherever they found it, to whomsoever it belonged, and with or without the consent of the owner. Nor were they to blame for so acting under such exigencies. And, Mr. C. inquired, could the justice of a claim for property, so consumed by an army, be denied? No, he said, the people of this country would revolt at the injustice of refusing payment in such a case.

But, Mr. C. said, he not only contended that the bill, in its present shape, involved no new principle, but he should endeavor to make it still broader in its provisions, by engrafting on it the principle of the law of 1802, regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes. He could show, by reference to the law alluded to, that this Government had given a pledge of indemnity for injuries arising out of Indian hostilities, going far beyond the provisions of the bill as it now stood; and he should call on the Senate to redeem the public faith by the adoption of an amendment which he should presently offer.

[Mr. C. here read so much of the 14th section of the "act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," approved March 30th, 1802, as relates to indemnity for property destroyed by the Indians.]

Mr. C. then went on to remark, that it had been seen by the section of the act which he had just read, that complete indemnity was designed by its framers for all injuries and destruction of property "by any Indian or Indians belonging to any tribe in amity with the United States." The act intended to discriminate between injuries perpetrated by marauding parties, while their nation was at peace with the Government, and those resulting from a general war. In such cases the act of 1802 made it the duty of the citizen or inhabitant to make application to the superintendent, or such other person as the President of the United States should authorize for that purpose, whose duty it then became, under the direction of the President, to make application to the nation or tribe to which the offending Indians belonged, for satisfaction; and if the tribe or nation neglected or refused to make satisfaction, upon notice from the superintendent, the President was bound to take such other steps as might be proper to obtain satisfaction for the injury; "and in the mean time, [says the law,] in respect to the property so taken, stolen, or destroyed, the United States guaranty to the party injured an eventual indemnification."

Here, then, said Mr. C. is the faith of the Government pledged, that "eventual indemnification" shall be afforded to any citizen whose property may be "taken, stolen, or destroyed, by any Indian, or Indians, belonging to any tribe in amity with the United States." Nor did the enactment stop here. In a subsequent clause of the same section, it is provided "that it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to deduct such sum or sums as shall be paid for the property taken, stolen, or destroyed, by any such Indians, out of the annual stipend which the United States are bound to pay to the tribe to which such Indian shall belong." Now, said Mr. C. all I ask of the Government is to redeem its pledged faith, by providing the means, and granting the indemnity, contemplated by the act on which I have remarked, for the same class of injuries. To accomplish this object the more certainly, Mr. C. said he had prepared an amendment, to come in as the fourth section of the bill under consideration, which he would then read for the information of the Senate. He then read the following section, as the amendment offered by him:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall be made appear, by satisfactory proof, that any house, building, or improvement, or personal property within the limits of any State, has been destroyed since the said year 1830, by any Indian or Indians belonging to any tribe or nation, the Government, or majority of which, shall have been, at the time of such destruction, at peace with the United States, the owner or owners of such property shall be allowed and paid the amount of damages thereby sustained.

Mr. C. said it would be seen that his amendment corresponded substantially with the 14th section of the act of 1802. It was clearly within its principle, and differed in nothing material, except that it did not require an application by the injured citizen to the superintendent, or such other person as the President might authorize in the first place. He would briefly explain the reason of this departure from that feature of the act of 1802. It would be found his amendment contemplated satisfaction for the destruction or injury of property "within the limits of any State." It was intended to cover injuries perpetrated by the tribes once living East of the Mississippi, but now, carried West of that river; and more especially the losses sustained by the citizens of Alabama and Georgia, by the depredations of the Creeks and Cherokees, before the removal. Mr. C. said he did not know that there was any superintendent, of either of those tribes, to whom the application, contemplated by the act he had referred to, could have been made. It was known that, owing to state of things, existing before the removal of the Creeks and Cherokees, they had necessarily been hurried off in great haste, not affording time, then, for such a proceeding; and now there was no superintendent on this side of the Mississippi. Under such circumstances, Mr. C. said he had thought it better to omit that feature of the section; but he had obviated any good objection on that ground, by requiring that the injury "be made appear by satisfactory proof." Under such a requirement, with a competent officer to investigate and determine, it would hardly be possible that the Government could lose unjustly. In the mean time, he said, it would open the way for many meritorious and much injured citizens, whom we were bound to protect in the enjoyment of their rights, to come forward and obtain redress.

Mr. C. thought the claims of the citizens of Alabama to the proposed indemnity, were peculiarly strong. It would be recollected that the Government of the United States had purchased all the lands claimed by the Creek Indians, lying within that State, granting to heads of families, and chiefs, reservations, which they were authorized to sell in fee simple. The Indians sold their reservations, and the Government surveyed and sold the remaining lands; thus inviting a white population among the Indians, who were not removed, as they should have been, as fast as they sold out. Mr. C. said it must be admitted by all, that, by the circumstances to which he had referred, the Government was under increased obligations to protect those who had purchased and settled in the territory purchased of the Creeks. Instead of removing the Indians, as fast they sold their reservations—for they had no right to remain a day after such a sale, according to his view of the treaty—they had been permitted to remain, year after year, contracting all the vices of most profligate white men, until many had become dissolute and abandoned. Perhaps the goadings of want, as well as the absence of all moral restraints, had led them to commit depredations on the property of our unoffending citizens. In the mean time the Government had kept no adequate military force stationed amongst them, to restrain them from the perpetration of trespasses or crimes, though repeatedly appealed to upon the subject, and urged to furnish the necessary protection. Now, sir, said Mr. C. can a just Government refuse remuneration for injuries, sustained by citizens, who were settled on land sold to them by you, or by your authority; and who were not only entitled to your guardian care, but who warned you of their danger, again and again, and claimed your protection? He said this was the question upon which the fate of his amendment turned; and, until compelled by a vote of the majority of the Senate, he could not lose confidence in the justice of his country.

Mr. GRUNDY did not object to the justice of the claim; on the contrary, he had no doubt that many of them were so; but he objected to the bill for several reasons. One was, that it recognised the principle that property destroyed in savage warfare came as much within the principle of the law of 1817 as though it were destroyed in civilized warfare, (if indeed there was any such thing as civilized warfare,) when it was a well known custom of the savage to destroy indiscriminately all within his reach, never asking whether it had been in the occupancy of regular troops or not. Another objection was, that the business was to be placed in the hands of the Third Auditor, thus adding to his duties, when the business of his office was already one or two years behindhand, and could not be brought up with all the force he possessed. He had every confidence in the Third Auditor, but not when he had no time to examine matters fairly. Again, it was opening the Treasury to be plundered by ex parte testimony. He was for paying what was justly due, and did not object on the score of amount; but the very magnitude of the claims ought to make them more careful, and compel them to act with caution and with judgment. The other bill, which had gone to the House, was general in its character, and he thought it ample in its provisions, and a better guard on the Treasury than the one before them.

Mr. HUBBARD was not tenacious of the second section, giving the business to the Third Auditor; that could be stricken out if the Senator could give it his support. That officer had been selected for his peculiar fitness, from his long and well known assiduity and care in settling claims.

Mr. LUMPKIN said, in reply to Mr. GRUNDY: Mr. President, my honorable friend from Tennessee, with his usual ability and ingenuity, has made many remarks calculated to disparage the merits of this just and salutary measure. Yes, sir, a measure so obviously demanded by every principle of equity and justice, that even its opponents are forced to admit on all sides that relief, in some form, ought to be extended to the claimants intended to be provided for by this bill. Allow me to say, sir, that the arguments of my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] and the mode and manner of his opposition, appear to me to be better suited to the lawyer than to the Senator. The Senator has criticized the phraseology of the bill, and attempted to show that its provisions could not be carried into effect without endangering the interest of the Government, as well as that of the individual claimants. He therefore seems to feel himself justified in opposing the measure in all its parts. Now, sir, this kind of opposition becomes the attorney, who is under obligations to his client to make the best of his case—who feels bound to lessen the liability of his client to the lowest possible amount of which the nature of the claim will admit. But, sir, I would respectfully ask, is this the proper course of a legislator, when applied to honest, fair claimants, who are admitted to have just demands against their Government—claims for the simple reimbursement of the value of their property, taken without their consent by the strong arm of the Government, for the purpose of aiding the Government in the execution of its legitimate measures of warfare against a savage foe?

The Constitution of the United States makes it the imperious duty of Congress to provide for and pay the claims of our citizens, for property taken from them for the use of the public service of the country; and it is such claims as these which our suffering citizens now present, and which it is intended by the friends of this bill to provide for.

If it be admitted that the bill, in its present shape, is imperfect, and susceptible of amendment—if it can be relieved of any supposed vagueness, or ambiguity of language, and the provisions for the faithful execution of the true intent and object of the measure can be improved—I would then, sir, invite and ask the aid of the Senator from Tennessee in effecting an object which is as desirable to the friends of the measure, as it can be to those who oppose it. We have a right, sir, to ask and claim the aid of every Senator in perfecting this measure, who makes the admissions which we hear from every speaker, to wit: that many just claims do exist, of the character contemplated to be provided for by this bill.

But, sir, without questioning the purity of the motives, or the acuteness of the comprehensions, of the Senators from New York and Tennessee, [Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. GRUNDY,] I must be permitted to say, that the course of their opposition to this measure, to my mind, has the appearance of hostility to these claims altogether. Their policy, according to my apprehension of its effects, amounts to a rejection of these claims.

What is the course of argument by these Senators? One of them, Mr. WRIGHT, in his lucid manner of communicating his ideas, draws distinctions between the claims of citizens for property in the occupancy of the army of the United States, as well as property taken for the public use of the army, when thus occupied and taken in a war with civilized and savage nations. He seems to think that the legislation of Congress in 1816 and 1817, providing for claims, precisely similar to those now under consideration, was all right and proper, because the United States incurred these liabilities while engaged in a war with Great Britain, a civilized nation: but when the property of a citizen is taken for public use, in aid of prosecuting a war against a savage people, the case is then altered and changed, and that similar legislation in the two cases is not demanded for the relief of the injured and suffering citizen.

I would ask, sir, are these distinctions reasonable; are they just? Shall we take private property for public use, and refuse, or even delay, to reimburse the suffering citizen? But, sir, the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] and, I believe, the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] both admit the justice of some of these claims. They say they ought to be provided for, and whatever is right and just ought to be done. Yet, sir, the friends of this measure have thus far failed in every attempt to present these just claims in an acceptable form, to those who throw obstacles in the way of their speedy adjustment. When bills have been presented—restricted to individual claims—we have been told this was partial legislation. We have been advised to bring in a measure of a general character, which would place all the claimants on an equal footing. And, sir, I have been inclined myself to favor this suggestion. As the friend of equal political rights I have felt no disposition to give more speedy relief to claimants who are capable of presenting and prosecuting their claims, with the requisite intelligence and efficiency—persons who have public character, standing, and friends, here and elsewhere. No, sir, my object is, and has been, to administer equal and exact justice to all these claimants, regardless of their respective conditions in life. Therefore I now appear as the advocate of this measure, in preference to urging individual claims which have been confided to my care; and for the payment of which I feel much solicitude, as I have examined the evidence in support of the claims placed in my hands, and am fully convinced of the justice of a portion of them. But now, sir, that the honorable chairman of the Committee of Claims [Mr. HUBBARD] has presented to the Senate a general bill, which he has prepared with great care and consideration, and has supported and elucidated every thing connected with the subject, with an ability and perspicuity that leaves but little which is necessary to be added by his friends, who concur in his views, we are advised by some of the opponents to the payment of these claims, to introduce private bills for the relief of each individual claimant.

Others contend, that the bill which has already passed the Senate during the present session of Congress, and which has been sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence—"Establishing a Board of Commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States"—amply provides for the settlement of the claims under consideration, and therefore the present bill is useless or superfluous.

Thus it appears, sir, clearly, that these suffering claimants are made the sport of various expedients. The hope of relief is held out in various forms, and the variety of the modes of relief is at the same time made the efficient means of delaying and withholding justice.

Now, sir, what we would claim, and what I think we have a right to expect in behalf of these claimants, is, not longer to delay the demand of justice. We are by no means partial to any specific form, over all others which may afford ample provision for the adjudication of these claims. We desire the payment of no doubtful claim. We ask only for even-handed justice.

A more meritorious class of claimants have never presented themselves to this Government than many whose names will be found on the present list of claimants—men who are patriotic, high-minded, honest, ever ready to make every necessary personal sacrifice upon the altar of their country's honor and interest. Shall we, sir, longer keep them in that harassing state of suspense which is even more than an arbitrary and prompt rejection of their just claims upon the Government of their country?

Mr. WRIGHT spoke at considerable length in defence of the positions assumed by him in his first remarks.

Mr. PRENTISS also spoke at some length against the bill in its then shape, and held that if the principles recognised by civilized nations did not apply to savage warfare, then the bill ought not to pass.

Mr. HUBBARD again defended the bill with much animation, replying at large to the objections urged against it.

Mr. KING held it to be the imperious duty of Congress that something like substantial justice should be done to these claimants, whether their property was destroyed through want of energy on the part of the General Government, or in consequence of occupancy by our troops. These claimants had not only lost their property, but had lost that which they never could be compensated for: their families had been broken up, their property and their prospects destroyed, and in many instances health, and even life itself, had been sacrificed, &c. He would not say that these claims should be allowed to the full extent of the sums claimed; but he would say that something should be done, and that promptly. When the bill was discussed on a prior occasion, for the relief of Bulow's heirs, he had thought it better to wait the operation of a general law; but he was now convinced of the propriety of acting at once on this measure.

The bill was passed over informally, and the amendments offered by Messrs. CLAY and HUBBARD were ordered to be printed.

And the Senate then adjourned.

SPEECH OF MR. WEBSTER,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In Senate, Monday, March 30, 1840—On the bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes.

I regret, Mr. President, that the chairman of the committee is absent, as he might probably have made use of this occasion, not only to show the necessity of raising this sum of five millions, for the immediate use of Government by some extraordinary means, but also to state his opinions upon the public revenue, both in regard to its present state and its prospects for the future.

The sum and substance of the measure now before us is, to borrow five millions of dollars, for two years, if necessary, and to pay therefor any rate of interest not exceeding six per cent. This borrowing is to be done by means of issuing Treasury notes, bearing interest; and, so often as they shall be received at the Treasury, they are to be reissued, so that the whole sum of five millions may be kept out. And the authority to issue and reissue is to last one year. The consequence of this is, that one year from the date of the bill, if the whole five millions be not then outstanding, the balance may be issued, redeemable in a year from that time. It is a power, therefore, to make a loan for five millions, with an authority to continue that loan, by borrowing to-day to repay the sum borrowed yesterday, and to continue this process, in effect, for two years. This is the substance of the bill.

Mr. President, at the opening of the session, the President of the United States informed Congress that the financial operations of the Government for the past year had been very successful.

The Secretary, too, in the very first paragraph of his annual report, stated, with much satisfaction, that the revenues of the Government had been increased, and the expenditures diminished.

That the resources of the country are abundant, no one can doubt. Its wealth, its activity, its commerce, and its freedom from burdensome taxation, render it able to raise, with entire facility, a revenue quite equal to all the just wants and necessities of the Government. But, notwithstanding these congratulations of the President and Secretary, I cannot but entertain a doubt whether, under the operations of provision now actually existing, and under the expenditurees which have been made, and are making, or are in anticipation, it is prudent to indulge in sanguine hopes of an overflowing Treasury This doubt receives countenance from the fact, that the bill before us is to authorize the borrowing of five millions, in the form of Treasury notes, and under such circumstances as leave no reasonable hope, as I think, of their redemption within this year. I do not oppose the bill, but I propose to say a few words on the state of the Treasury, and on the history of its receipts and disbursements, for the last three years.

We learn from the Secretary's annual communication that, at the commencement of this year, there was in this Treasury no more that a million and a half of dollars, available for the purposes of Government. I omit fractions, and use round numbers, for the sake of brevity. At the same time the Government owed, on outstanding Treasury notes bearing interest, two millions and three quarters, or two million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

This was the State of the Treasury January 1, 1840, as near as the Secretary could estimate or ascertain it in December. It turns out, from the paper just read, that in fact there was a few hundred thousand dollars more in the Treasury in January than the Secretary's estimate, but from what funds or sources does not appear, and this circumstance does not effect the general view which I propose to take.

Let us now go back to January 1, 1837. In 1836, there being a great surplus in the Treasury, the deposite law was passed, by which five millions were to be reserved in the Treasury, in aid of accruing revenues, that should be in the Treasury January 1, 1837, to meet future demands, and the rest of the money divided, in deposites, with the States, by four quarterly payments or instalments

As the Secretary was obliged to make his calculation a little before the 1st of January, and could not say, exactly, what amount might be in the Treasury at that time, he made a safe allowance; and it happened, in the end, I think, that six millions and more were retained in the Treasury instead of five. At the commencement of 1837, then, the Government had on hand six millions; and it had before it the whole accruing revenue of the year. But the year was out, that is to say, in the September session, Congress suspended the payment of the last or fourth instalment, or fourth deposite to the States. This measure retained in the Treasury a further sum of nine millions, thus raising the reserved aggregate up to fifteen millions. Subsequently, the Treasury received from the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States five millions of dollars, as part of the property, or capital, of the United States in the former bank. This swelled the amount to twenty millions. So that since January, 1837, the Treasury has had full twenty millions of former receipts, as well as all revenues arising since.

Now, it is apparent that these twenty millions have been expended, within the three years, in addition to all the revenue which has accrued in the mean time; with one deduction, which I shall state. It is true that, in September, 1837, Congress suspended or postponed the payment of certain custom-house bonds; but the time of that postponement has long since expired, and the bonds have been paid. It is true, also that the deposite banks, in 1837, held certain sums belonging to Government, which they wished time to pay. But before the commencement of this year, these debts had been brought down to a million of dollars, or thereabouts. The true account, then, stands thus:

Reserved under the deposite act -	$6,000,000
Amount of fourth deposite held back from the States - - -	9,000,000
Received from Bank of the United States - - - - -	5,000,000
Borrowed on Treasury notes, outstanding January 1, 1840 -	2,750,000
	$22,750,000
Deduct amount in Treasury January 1, 1840 - - -	1,550,000
	$21,200,000
Deduct amount still due from deposite banks - - - -	1,000,000
Balance - - -	$20,200,000

Twenty millions two hundred thousand dollars, then, appear to have been expended in the three years, between January, 1837, and January 1840, besides all the receipts from the custom-house, and and offices, and all other sources.

If there be any error in this general statement, I hope that some gentleman will point it out, and I shall cheerfully make the necessary correction. My object is to be acurate as well as distinct. But if there be no error, if this statement be true, as I suppose, then the result certainly is, that for the last three years, the Government has expended almost seven millions a year beyond its income; and has supplied the deficiency out of funds previously acquired or received. The six millions reserved under the deposite law, the nine millions afterwards withheld from the States, the five millions received from the bank, all these were funds previously acquired, and none of them any part of the income or revenue of 1837, 1838, or 1839. All the income and revenue of those years have been expended, and these twenty millions more.

This general state of the Treasury, and the history of revenue and expenditure for the last three years, may well awaken attention. We have no twenty millions more in crib to go to. Our capital is expended. There will be two millions and a half due from the Bank of the United States in September, and there is a small balance still due from the deposite banks; both together not exceeding three millions and a half; and, for the rest, we are to rely on the usual sources, the custom-house and the land-offices.

Now, then, the important questions are, does the Administration expect an augmentation of income?

Or, does it expect such a reduction of expenditure as shall keep in within the income?

Or, does it contemplate loans, either in the form of Treasury notes or otherwise to make up deficiencies?

And, if the last, to what extent?

The present measure is to authorize the immediate issue of five millions in Treasury notes, for the purpose of being paid out to persons having claims on Government, or used as means of borrowing money for the necessities of the Treasury.

I do not propose to oppose the passage of the bill, because I think it quite clear that the money is needed, in order to carry on the Government. There are, indeed, objections to this form of borrowing money; for it is a borrowing of money, to all intents and purposes. The Secretary, indeed, in a recent communication to the Senate, does not call it borrowing. He avoids that word, and if he were afraid it would burn his mouth. He call it only "exchanging Treasury notes for specie" This falls under that form of statement now usually called humbug The Secretary receives money, gives for it his Treasury notes, payable a year hence, and bearing an interest of five or six per cent. But this, he thinks, is not borrowing money; it is only exchanging his notes for money; a sort of exchange, I believe, which most borrowers are obliged to conform to. The authority, and the only authority, under which he makes this marvellous "exchange," is a section of the law of 1837, which authorizes him to "borrow money."

I cannot say that I think the communication of the Secretary, to which I have referred, is a very full or clear answer, to the call of the Senate. But we learn from it, after all, what I was sure must have existed, and which it may be of some importance to show. He admits that deposites have been made, to the credit of the Treasurer, in certain banks; and that thereupon such banks have received Treasury notes to a corresponding amount. And the Treasurer, in a letter accompanying the Secretary's report, says that these funds are drawn for as other funds and not specifically. The Secretary says these deposites are special, and in specie. All that is humbug again; for all deposites in banks are regarded as specie deposites while banks pay specie, and the Treasurer, as I have remarked, says expressly that these sums, thus deposited, are drawn for, when needed, in common with other funds, and not specifically or separately. This idea, or this delusion, or this pretence, for it hardly deserves a respectable name, about special specie deposites, was sufficiently dissipated by the examination last year, into the conduct of the banks connected with the New York custom-house. When the banks pay specie, a special specie deposite is nothing but a deposite in specie or its equivalent; and the amount is paid out, on draft, in specie or its equivalent. And this is the case with all other deposites of money, unless it be left in kegs or bags, and not carried into the general account of the bank. Any one may see how this is, and has been, who will recur to the evidence of the cashier of the Bank of America, on the occasion which I have referred to. As I have already said, the Treasurer informs us that these deposites are mixed with other funds belonging to the United States, in the same bank. That is to say, they all stand together, to his credit, on the books of the bank, and he draws as he has occasion, just as is done by any other dealer with the bank. This is the whole of it. Special specie deposite is a nonentity.

Now, it is easy to see that this mode of obtaining money from the banks may be of very considerable profit to them. Suppose a bank deposites a million of dollars to the credit of the Treasury, and receives therefor a millions of dollars in Treasury notes, bearing an interest of six per cent. Interest immediately accrues to the bank, of course, on the whole of this sum; but it may be many months before it is all drawn out. The Treasury may give out its drafts slowly, and these drafts, when made, may be sent to distant parts of the county, and be some considerable time in reaching the bank. When they arrive, the bank will generally pay in its own notes; but, besides this advantage, it will make a clear gain, because it has been receiving interest on more money than it has parted with.

Under the law of 1836, the deposite banks were required to pay interest on Government deposites. The present system looks very much like making Government pay the banks interest on its own deposites.

There are objections, I repeat, to the use of Treasury notes as means of borrowing money. In the first place, the interest must be higher than on a loan contracted in the common manner. The greater part of all the Treasury notes issued since 1837 have borne an interest of six per cent. whereas my information is, and I have little doubt of the correctness of it, that United States stock, bearing 4½ per cent, interest, could be readily sold at par abroad, not having any great number of years to run; or it could readily be sold at home, with a view of sending it abroad.

In the next place, Treasury notes, bearing a high interest, and redeemable at any time upon two months' notice, issued under the present circumstances of the country, are very likely to absorb a considerable portion of the money now so much needed for the relief of trade and commerce and the revival of business. It strikes me that the whole operation is likely to make money scarcer than it is already; since the Treasury is coming into the market as a borrower, offering a high interest.

Again. I am aware that a use may be made of Treasury notes which is quite opposed to the spirit of the Constitution; that is, to issue them without interest, or with a mere nominal interest, and to attempt to force them into circulation as money. Any such attempt ought to be strenuously resisted; being neither more nor less than an attempt to establish a system of Government paper money.

But Congress has sanctioned long ago, and under better auspices, the occasional issue of Treasury notes, and I do not feel at liberty, therefore, to withhold my assent on the present emergency from that mode of raising the sums which the state of the country requires, as no other mode is proposed. Both the President and Secretary would seem excessively anxious to distinguish the issues of Treasury notes from the creation of a debt; but I think this distinction is without a difference. A note issued, bearing interest, and payable hereafter, has created a debt as much as any form of stock could create it. A national debt was actually commenced at the very first session of Congress, under the present Administration, and it never has been paid, except as one obligation has been discharged by borrowing money on another. Like other debtors, we have renewed our notes, and renewed them often, sometimes paying high interest, but we have never extinguished the debt. The first Treasury notes were issued in the autumn of 1837. The amount outstanding January, 1838, was, I think, four or five millions; in January, 1839, it was also large; and in January, 1840, as I have already said, the Secretary states it at two millions and three quarters.

One object of the present bill is to enable the Treasury to pay off the unpaid part of these two millions and three-quarters by borrowing again. So that it is true that, from the first session of Congress under this Administration to the present day, the Government has been in debt for borrowed money, and has been, every hour, paying interest for such borrowed money. This is a public debt. What this debt may amount to by March, 1841, I cannot say. It depends on measures to be adopted by Congress, and on those changes and fluctuations in trade which cannot be foreseen. But if no new means of revenue are supplied, and Congress should make such appropriations, as it usually has done, and no great improvement in the state of affairs should take place, I cannot see how it is likely to fall short of eight or ten millions. But this is a mere estimate. Whatever the amount may be, however, in March, 1841, it will be a debt, created by the present Administration. I do not say unnecessarily created. I am not now speaking to that point. But I say it will be a debt—a public debt—a national debt—begun under this Administration—a debt existing in the least economical and the most inconvenient form—a debt bearing an interest, and a high interest—and a debt which, if cast on the Administration of 1841, whoever may be at the head of that Administration, must be provided for. I say this, sir, merely to preclude, ab ante, the idea that if a national debt shall be found existing after March, 1841, it will be the debt of the Administration of that time, and not of the present.

My real ground of complaint against the present Administration, and I think it a very just ground, is, that it has not come out in a manly manner long ago, and told Congress that there was a necessity to make further provision for revenue.

The President, in his message of the 2d December, observed that all the Treasury notes then outstanding would have been redeemed before that time, "if the Treasury could have realized the payments due to it from the banks." What banks? The outstanding Treasury notes amounted, at that time, to two millions and three-quarters. The deposite banks owed the Government only a million, or a million one hundred thousand dollars. The President must have included the bond of two millions and a half of the Bank of the United States. But that bond is not, by the terms of it, due till September next. There could have been no disappointment, therefore, in not realizing the payment of that bond before the date of the message. The President makes very just observations upon the impolicy and danger of commencing a public debt in a time of peace; of the fearful rapidity with which such debts are apt to be increased; and upon our duty to struggle against such debts at the threshold. But all this does not prove that money borrowed and still owed on Treasury notes is not a national debt. All this does not prove that we have not been borrowing money on the strength of the public credit, paying high interest for it, and having an immediate prospect of being obliged very considerably to increase its amount. I know no way of keeping out of debt but by bringing the revenue up to the expenditure, or bringing the expenditure down to the revenue. If we owe for borrowed money, it is puerile to talk about the form of our obligation, as if one form was less a debt than another. It would be much more wise to set ourselves at once about getting the means of payment. Good aphorisms, upon the subject of a national debt, should be followed, I think, by direct and responsible recommendations, to Congress of such measures as are necessary to prevent the evil.

Let us now, Mr. President, look to the Secretary's estimate of means and of expenditures for the present.

And, first, of the means. He thinks the receipts into the Treasury from custom, lands, and miscellaneous sources will not exceed eighteen millions six hundred thousand dollars, - $18,600,000 00
Amount in the Treasury, January 1, 1840, - - 1,556,385 00

20,156,385 00

Expected to be paid on United States Bank bond, - - 2,526,576 00
Due from deposites banks - 1,149,904 00

$23,832,865 00

But the Secretary does not deem it prudent to rely on the collection of these debts—and as to the receipts from the custom-house, the great source of expected income, I presume his hopes are not stronger now than they were at the commencement of the year.

Let us now turn to the other side of the account, and see the estimate of expenditures.

Now, on this head he says that if Congress should make appropriations to the extent desired by the different Departments, the expenditures of the year will amount to - - $20,000,000 00
Besides the payment of outsanding Treasury notes amounting to - 2,750,000 00

22,750,000 00

This would leave an apparent balance in the Treasury, at the beginning of next year of - 1,082,865 00

But this sum is less than the amount due from the deposite banks, the payment of which, he says, ought not to be relied on. If no part of that should be paid, the Treasury according to this statement, will be minus at the close of this year. Probably some part of it will be paid, but at best, and if the Secretary's hopes should all be fulfilled, it will be, upon his showing, a touch-and-go affair.

But as he does not rely on receiving these debts from the banks, what does he propose? He speaks always of Treasury notes as being a temporary expedient only, and that they are to be redeemed within the year? I do not think this, at all; but that is his ground. How then does he propose to provide for the deficiency, in case these bank debts shall not be collected?

Why, sir, he says very gravely that one mode of avoiding difficulty will be to reduce the appropriations by postponing some, and lessening others. We need no ghost to tell us that. But what appropriations will he reduce? Where shall the lessening take place? or where shall the postponement take place? On what head shall the blow fall? Shall it be in the civil list, or the army, or the navy? He says in a early part of his message, that he thinks a reduction can be made, without essential injury to any useful objects, "for reasons which will be afterwards enumerated." I have looked through the whole paper carefully, and cannot say that I have met with that enumeration of reasons. Perhaps the chairman of the committee, if he were here, could tell us where those reasons are to be found. He does say, indeed, in a subsequent part of his communication, that it may become necessary to diminish the compensation of all officers, civil, military, executive, judicial, and legislative. But he states no proposed rate of reduction; and, indeed he does not recommend reduction at all. He says it may become necessary. Does he think it has become, and is now necessary? Does he recommend it? Is that his reliance to eke out his ways and means? And what amount of reduction does he suppose such a process would accomplish? It is better to do this, he says, than to expose the Treasury to bankruptcy. Does he mean that the Treasury will be exposed to bankruptcy if this be not done? Does he mean to say that the Treasury will be forthwith bankrupt, unless the pay of the President, heads of Departments, judges, members of Congress, and military and civil officers, be immediately reduced? It is acknowledged that our finances are in this condition? If so, why not recommend the measure at once? Why not tell us, distinctly, what is necessary? Why leave Congress to grope in the dark, amidst many various, and sometimes inconsistent propositions and suggestions? When the report begins with such a flourishing paragraph about the great prosperity of the Treasury, one is not prepared to see the Secretary come to this complexion of bankruptcy quite so soon.

But, Mr. President, there is, at least, an apparent inconsistency between the President and the Secretary. The Secretary says the appropriations may be reduced below the estimates, so as to leave two millions in the Treasury at the beginning of next year. This will require a reduction of one million, if he reckon on collecting all the balances due from the deposite banks; or, if not, then a reduction of a million and as much more as shall equal what may remain unpaid of these balances. He supposes, then, that these estimates of appropriations may be safely cut down at least one or two millions. This would be a very important saving.

But what says the President? The President says that he "has directed the estimates of 1840 to be subjected to the severest scrutiny, and to be limited to the absolute requirements of the public services."

Now, sir, if his directions have been followed, if these estimates have been subjected to the severest scrutiny, and are limited to the absolute requirements of the public service, where is the reduction to be made? The Secretary, as I have said, specifies nothing, and recommends nothing directly. Where would he have us lop off? Will he spare us one or two millions from his own Department? Will the Secretary at War spare a million from his? Or the Secretary of the Navy from his? Why, I ask, should Congress, when called on to appropriate the public moneys, be left in such clouds and such darkness?

Sir, one word as to the manner of making estimates of expenditures for the consideration of Congress. It is a plain and simple business, though, from its nature, it cannot be very precise, and I cannot see any necessity for enveloping it in so much obscurity and uncertainty.

Appropriations are of three classes.

In the first place, there are certain existing or standing appropriations, which need not be renewed annually. Such is the sum of 200,000 expended every year for arming the militia; and such are some of the classes of pensions, and a few other small charges.

In the second place, there is the large class, in which the charge is created by law, but annual appropriations are required to enable the Treasury to disburse the sums necessary for its payment.

This includes the Army and Navy, the civil list, and a list of miscellaneous objects.

In the third place, there are, as we all know, many appropriations made by Congress for special objects, public or private, and these often amount to considerable sums. Private claims, roads and canals, building of light-houses, Indian treaties, many objects recommended by the Executive itself; all these require every year, a greater or less amount of money from the Treasury. The Secretary says that the expenditures of this description, which may be sanctioned by Congress annually, are very uncertain in their amount. This is true; but then, as these expenditures, in every year, amount to a considerable sum, and have done so from the very beginning of the Government, can any just or comprehensive view of the probable necessities of the Treasury be presented which shall leave all such out? It is quite impossible that some such expenditures should not be made. Now, in these estimates and recommendations, I find no provision whatever for any objects of this kind. The estimates are strictly confined to the Army, the Navy, and the civil list. I find no allowance for a single dollar which we might vote away here upon a private claim. Yet the Secretary tells us that, if we will keep within the estimates, the means will hold out. But he must know, I should have thought, that we cannot keep within the estimates. It is more than probable, judging from the past, that he himself, before the session is out, will call for appropriations not within the estimates. And does he mean, in that case, to throw the blame of any deficiency which may arise on Congress, by saying that Congress did not keep within the estimates?

If we may believe the President and if the Secretaries have fulfilled his directions, there is nothing in any of these estimates which is not required by the absolute wants of the Govenment. But we know, sir, that there are things, not in the estimates, in regard to which the wants will be absolute; for instance, the private claims, upon which we are passing here every day, and for many of which we must provide, if we mean to do justice. Besides, do we not see, and know, that in all human probability various other occasions of appropriation will arise? Will there be no contingencies for the war in Florida? No expense for Indian treaties? Is it not possible that events may arise on the Northeastern frontier involving heavy charges?

And again, sir, does the Administration abandon he Cumberland road? Here is no estimate for a dollar on that head of expenditure. Yet I trust an appropriation for that object will be made. I shall certainly vote for it myself. And harbors on the lakes—are provisions for those places of refuge and safety to lake mariners to be again postponed? They are not in the estimates. If no improvement of any other harbor, no new light-house, and nothing else, which the protection of Atlantic or inland commerce may require, to be undertaken or provided for? Or, since these things are not within the estimates, if Congress should provide for them, is Congress to be reproached for its conduct, and made answerable for deficiences?

I repeat, sir, that the Executive Departments must well know that, for some of these objects, appropriations will of necessity be made; and I repeat, therefore, that it seems to me to have been their duty to have presented such a plan for receipt and expenditure, as should have embraced them, and provided for them. The amount, I agree, could not be well foreseen. But it must have been foreseen—it could not but have been foreseen —that something would be necessary; and yet the estimates make allowance for nothing.

There is, sir, in all these Executive communications, a constant repetition of sound general maxims about the importance of economy. I hope the virtue will be practised as well as preached. But in my opinion there is no just economy in refusing appropriations to important, necessary, and use ul public objects. Let economy begin by cutting off useless objects, and diminishing the expense of accomplishing such as are useful. Let us push its reform to the reduction of the cost of collecting the revenue. Let is take care of expenditures, by trusting the public moneys to honest hands. Let it reduce offices, wherever they can be reduced. In all these, and other like things, let it exert its salutary influence. But is the Cumberland road to stop from an impulse of economy? Are the lakes to be without harbors, from considerations of economy? Are important contingencies in public affairs not to be reasonably provided for, from reasons of economy? What sort of economy would that be?

Sir, I take that great public virtue, true economy, to consist, not in an undistinguishable neglect or refusal to appropriate money, but in a careful selection of important and necessary objects of expenditure, in the frugal application of means to accomplish these objects, and in enforcing an exact and punctual discharge of duty by every officer charged either with the collection of mon y, or with any expenditure, great or small. This is my idea of wise and practical economy, such as it becomes us to exercise, and such as the country will approve. But it is of little value, or no value at all, that Executive communications should rehearse to us general economical maxims, un'ess they show us what objects of expenditure may be disregarded, or in what other way savings may be made. And it would be especially edifying if these general admonitions should be accompanied and enforced by some striking and brilliant examples set by the Heads of Deparments themselves. I presume that no injustice towards Congress is intended, but I must say that in many of these communications there are things which seem calculated to assert great merit for economy in the Executive Departments, and which are but too well calculated to throw upon us an apparent want of that virtue. If it be required of Congres to keep its approbations within the estimates of the Departments, these Departments ought, in their estimates, to comprehend all objects which they know or have reason to believe Congress must provide for.

Mr. President, I do not know the opinions of other gentlemen, and speak only for myself, but my opinion is, that our existing provisions for revenue are not adequate. I am aware that one branch of expenditure, that of pensions, is rapidly decreasing; but others are quite likely to increase, and we all know what a fall in duties is to take place, in no great length of time. Looking to the many useful and important objects, which I think ought to engage the attention of Congress, it seems to me to be time that further provisions for income should be made. And we have the means at hand. There are articles of import on which we might, immediately, in my opinion, lay a considerable duty. The first of these is silks. The importation of this article is enormous. In 1839 it exceeded twenty-one millions of dollars. Think of that. An annual consumption of an untaxed imported article, of mere luxury, of twenty-one millions of dollars! Those silks clothe no poor man, nor his wife, nor his children. The whole use and consumption is by the affluent. Is there a fairer subject of import duty in the world? Our table is loaded with petitions on this subject, by those who are attempting the making of silk among ourselves. This, itself, is a good reason for taxing the imported article. But, as a subject of revenue, nothing can be fairer or more proper. Good would come every way from a duty on silk. Suppose the importation should be a little lessened by it; that would favor the efforts of our people, and obtain revenue also. Suppose the importation should hardly be diminished at all, as perhaps it might not be; then we should receive the more revenue, and should collect it on an article of the merest luxury. Sir, if such a measure could originate in this House, I would move, this hour, to bring in a bill laying a duty on imported silks.

The next article is wine. Wines were imported last year to an amount exceeding three millions of dollars. Why should not wines pay a duty? I know, that in regard to French wines, we are limited, by the treaty with France, until 1842. But still, within those limits, we might lay a considerable duty on the wines of France. But I should have no desire to lay duties on the red wines, or the cheaper wines, of France. Such wines are consumed, extensively, in the South and West, are suited to the habits of the people, and supposed to be suited also to the climate. Until more necessary than at present to tax them, they might be received untaxed. But other, and costly wines, such as are regarded as luxuries only, might well be subjected to a reasonable duty.

I would lay no duty on tea or coffee, because they are very generally used, have become in some degree necessaries of life, and contribute largely to promote comfort, temperance, and happiness among all classes. I may add that the general use of these articles is one of the most striking things wh ch distinguish the laboring classes of of this country from the same classes in other countries.

Such, sir, would be my resort, if I could have my own way, for revenues, such as are necessary for the support of Government.

As to the public lands, I have been, and still am, in favor of dividing their proceeds among the States, upon fair and equitable principles. Perhaps this should not be done till the census, which is to be taken this year, be finished; as that will then be the surest means of making a just and proper division; but, at a proper time, I am for the measure. In addition to other reasons which have been so often urged, it may be said, with force, that the income from this source is too unsteady and fluctuating to be relied on as an essential branch of public revenue. But a few years ago, it amounted to twenty-four millions. For this year, it is estimated but at three and a half. I should, therefore, assign this income to the State, whatever it might be, and rely for our revenue on those others sources which I have mentioned. In addition to silks and wines, there are some articles, called the protected articles, such as woollen fabrics, on which in my opinions, the duties ought to be raised. I would not hasten, indeed, the discussion of the general tariff question, but that question is now before us, not far off, and must soon be upon us.

Mr. President, our imports, the last year, reached the unprecedented amount of one hundred and fifty-seven millions of dollars, exceeding by nearly fifty millions the import of the year before. Yet even this seems not to satisfy us all. Public men appear to have ruling passions or strong tendencies of preference towards particular objects. It seems to me that our Government, and many of our people, have imbibed an extravagant and morbid love of importation. They seem to judge of the prosperity of the country, and the happiness of its people, exclusively by the quantities of foreign merchandise which they annually consume. With all respect, the President himself, I think, has feelings with this tendency. I find this paragraph in his last annual Message:

"Our people will not long be insensible to the extent of the burdens entailed upon them by the false system that has been operating on their sanguine, energetic, and industrious character; nor to the means necessary to extricate themselves from these embarrassments. The weight which presses upon a large portion of the people and the States is an enormous debt, foreign and domestic. The foreign debt of our States, corporations, and men of business, can scarcely be less than two hundred millions of dollars, requiring more than ten millions of dollars a year to pay the interest. This sum has to be paid out of the exports of the country, and must of necessity cut off imports to that extent, or plunge the country more deeply in debt from year to year. It is easy to see that the increase of this foreign debt must augment the annual demand on the exports to pay the interest, and to the same extent diminish the imports; and in proportion to the enlargement of the foreign debt, and the consequent increase of interests, must be the decrease of the import trade. In lieu of the comforts which it now brings us, we might have our gigantic banking institutions, and splendid, but in many instances profitless, railroads and canals, absorbing to a great extent, in interest upon the capital borrowed to construct them, the surplus fruits of national industry for years to come, and securing to posterity no adequate return for the comforts which the labors of their lands might otherwise have secured."

Now, sir, I would ask most respecfully whether any one can mention any railroad or canal more profitless to the country than this enormous importation of foreign luxuries? Or, I would ask, what those imported comforts are, of which we get so much less than we ought to desire? Does our comfort require a greater importation of silks or wines? Or should we be better off by adding to the six or eight millions or imported woollen fabrics further to depress and distress our own manufactures? Or is the aggregate of one hundred and fifty-seven million of dollars, of imported merchandise, not enough, on the whole, to satisfy our eager appetite for foreign productions? Inasmuch as we lay and collect no duties on silks and wines, we are likely to fall short of sufficient revenue; inasmuch as we are likely to fall short of revenue, we refuse all appropriations to the Cumberland road, and to harbors on the lakes. It would seem to follow, from this, that we deem silks and wines more a necessity of life than a good road through a new country, or ports and havens, in which ships, employed in useful commerce, can take shelter for the preservation of lives and property.

Mr. President, it is remarkable, that this spirit for importation should become so strong, just when our own occupations and employments are most depressed. The cotton manufactures, practically, are in a worse state than they have been for twenty years. It is supposed that at least one-half the woollen machinery in the United States has ceased to work, and many of the establishments might be purchased at one-third their cost. The iron trade and the coal trade suffer with the rest. If the condition of Eastern and Northern manufactures be as I have stated, I doubt whether one would receive much more favorable accounts, if he were to inquire into the condition of trade and business, at Pittsburgh, at Wheeling, or at Cincinnati.

Under the circumstances of the country, sir, I confess I do not comprehend how any man should desire to see a greater importation of foreign commodities.

The Secretary of the Treasury expresses sentiments, if not entirely like those which I have been considering, yet such as seem to belong to the same general system of policy. He says, in his annual report:

"Should the States not speedily suspend more of their undertakings, which are unproductive, but, by new loans or otherwise, find means to employ armies of laborers in consuming rather than raising crops, and should prices thus continue in many cases to be unnaturally inflated, as they have been of late years, in the face of a contracting currency, the effect of it on our finances will be still more to lessen exports, and, consequently, the prosperity and revenue of our foreign trade."

Foreign trade is here presented as the prominent object of national pursuit, and a reduction of prices at home clearly intimated as a measure of reform. These armies of laborers now employed on public works, it is here distinctly recommended, instead of thus consuming crops, should go to raising them. This, I think, is rather cold comfort, at the present prices of agricultural products.

Gentlemen around me know the prices at which wheat and flour are selling in the Northwestern States, and in Pennsylvania and New York. Carolina corn, I notice, is selling in Boston for fifty cents a bushel. I doubt whether any of the producers think these prices unnaturally inflated, or whether they will warmly sympathize with the Secretary in the opinion that there ought to be further reduction.

Mr. President, my own opinion of our condition and of our true policy is quite different from all this. I hope the States will be able to go on, and that they will go on, with their public works, unless in cases where the objects are plainly beyond the ability of the State. I hope they will keep good heart, use the strictest economy, persevere, and not lose the benefit of all they have done already.

I am for bringing about no reduction in the price of labor. On the other hand, I regard of high rates of labor as the surest of all proofs of general prosperity.

I have no desire to see a greater or a more unrestrained importation of foreign goods.

On the contrary, I am for laying a tax on imported luxuries, thus securing an adequate revenue to Government.

And with this revenue I am for defraying the ordinary expenses of Government, making reasonable provisions for unexpected contingencies, and for accomplishing important and useful works, for which we have been so much solicited, and which, in my opinion, the several parts of the country have a right to call on us not longer to neglect.

REMARKS OF MR. NORVELL, OF MICHIGAN.

In Senate, Monday, March 24, 1840.—In Executive session, on the treaty with the New York Indians.

Mr. NORVELL briefly addressed the Senate: My honorable friend, said he, from Arkansas [Mr. SEVIER] is a candid man; but, with all his frankness, he is a great tactician in legislation. The conclusion of his speech upon this subject demonstrates the skill and address which he can bring into a debate in which his feelings and his judgment are enlisted. That Senator has very adroitly maintained that the sanction of this treaty involves the assumption of a State debt; and he has invoked the Senators who are opposed to the principle of assumption to resist every effort to carry the treaty into effect. I thought that I perceived the captivating impression which this argument made upon the mind of my distinguished friend from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] This led me into an examination of its soundness. Sir, the argument has no foundation to sustain it. The treaty contains not the remotest bearing to justify the allegation that it assumes or pays a State debt. The simple provision of the treaty is, that, for the sum of four hundred thousand dollars, to be paid very gradually by the United States, the Seneca and other tribes of Indians resident in New York agree to leave their abodes in that State, and to remove west of the Mississippi, near the location of the Indians who have been removed to the same quarter from other parts of the Union. They surrender to the United States, in consideration of that sum, and of the grant to them of lands for their new homes, about four hundred and thirty-five thousand acres of rich and valuable land near the Fox river, a little above Green Bay, in the Territory of Wiskonsin. This property will more than reimburse the sum to be paid to the New York Indians under the treaty now before the Senate; and the sales of those lands will probably be effected before the money will be drawn from the Treasury in accordance with the provisions of the treaty. It is idle to say that the New York Indians have no claim to that land. Legally and technically, perhaps, they have not; but you will never take it from them. You will never, badly as you have always maintained your faith with the aborigines, so far forget all the principles of equity, all the feelings of humanity, as to divest the New York tribes of their Green Bay possessions, without granting to them, either in money or other lands, a fair equivalent.

But, sir, has the State of New York come here to ask you to assume any debt for her? Has she contracted any debt with these Indians? Is not this treaty your own act? Did she solicit you to make it? Sir, you have yourselves voluntarily treated with these Indians. You have pledged your faith to them. It is too late for my friend from Arkansas to object to this treaty, on the ground that it is a State affair. He himself, as a member of the Indian Committee, helped to bring in and supported, at the last session, the amended treaty now before you again. He has sanctioned, by his own act, the proceedings of this Government on this subject. He has drawn the Senate into this matter. He has foreclosed himself from the objection that this is a State interest. But, sir, suppose it to be so: has New York no right to expect your favorable regard? Did she not cede to you all her territorial claims in the Northwest at a trying crisis? Did you not, impliedly at least, guaranty to her, in accepting this cession, the clear and undisputed jurisdiction and sovereignty over all the territory which she reserved to herself within the limits of the State as she defined them? And what else, sir, has she done? By the construction of her great canal, connecting the Western waters with the waters of the Atlantic, she has opened a boundless market to your commerce. She has opened a market equally boundless for the sale of your public domain, West and Northwest of her limits. Besides, sir, the whole policy of the country has been to subject the Indians, the extinction of their titles to lands within the States and Territories of the Union, their removal, and their protection, to the direction and control of the Federal Government.

But the honorable Senator has discovered that the signatures to this treaty have been obtained by bribery and corruption. Sir, has not your whole system of Indian relations been marked by the same species of fraud, bribery and corruption, if you choose to call them so? Have you not always had to make presents of money and goods to their chiefs, at every treaty, in every treaty, which you have ever made with them? Sir, you sent your negotiators to make the original treaty with these Senecas. They agreed to its terms. It was brought here for ratification. You took the liberty to change its whole character. You gave them, without their previous consent, this amended treaty. You took from several of the chiefs the sums of money which, by the original treaty, you stipulated to pay to them. In consequence of this act, this breach of faith on your part, some of these chiefs have refused to affix their signatures to your amended treaty. They had signed the first treaty. You did not fairly and honestly ratify that treaty. And now, sir, having forced an amended treaty upon them, you complain that a majority of signatures have been unfairly obtained to it. You complain that bribery has purchased many of these signatures.

What is it, but the most splendid bribes, that induced the Cherokees and other southern tribes to remove west of the Mississippi? Sir, you had to pay John Ross one million of dollars to induce him to remove his part of the nation. To be sure, the money was given to him on the pretext of defraying his expenses in their removal. But it was a bribe on the largest scale. Millions have been paid to get rid of the Indians in the Southern States. And yet you talk of fraud, of bribery, and corruption, to a paltry amount, to induce the New York Indians to go where their nation may be preserved for ages.

In the acquisition of territory, money or violence must always be used. What, but money, acquired Louisiana for us? A brilliant bribe, paid to Napoleon, gave us that immense and valuable country. But for that, sir, we should never have had the pleasure of sitting in this hall with the Senators from Louisiana and Missouri. The same, sir, has occurred with regard to Florida. We paid to Spain a great bribe for that territory. We not only bribed her with money, but we surrendered, in the bargain, the province of Texas, a part of Louisiana, and a much more invaluable country than Florida. But this, according to the new fangled doctrine, was all fraud, bribery, and corruption! This virtuous indignation at bribery comes too late. You have swallowed the camel; do not strain at the gnat.

The sinister efforts perseveringly made by interested individuals, to prevent the Seneca chiefs from affixing their signatures to the amended treaty, and to induce those who have signed, to retract; the bribery which has been practised for that purpose; missionary and other foreign influences, so impertinently exerted to defeat this treaty, abound in the documents confidentially printed for our use. As much may be said against the conduct of the parties on the one side as the other. We have only, therefore, to look at the whole subject as the treaty itself presents it to us, without regard to the crimination and recrimination which have created all the difficulties in the case. We have only to inquire whether this amended treaty, having already been ratified by the Senate, has received the concurrence of a majority of the Seneca chiefs, and should by the President be carried into effect? He has submitted the matter to us for our judgment and advice.

It has been contended, that a majority of the Seneca chiefs must have signed the treaty in council before it can be considered as ratified on their part. Sir, this argument is not sustained by the resolution of ratification adopted by the Senate. The other New York tribes are admitted to have duly ratified the treaty. What says that resolution? It declares that the treaty shall have no force or effect, until the same, with the proposed amendments, is submitted, and fully and fairly explained, to each of the tribes or bands, separately assembled in council, "and they have given their free and voluntary assent thereto." Where, sir, must they have given their free and voluntary assent to the treaty? Surely, not necessarily in council, but any and every where, at whatsoever place they might choose to select for the purpose of affixing their signatures to the instrument. The amended treaty must have been submitted, fully and fairly explained to the Indians in council; but their assent to it could be given any where. This construction of the resolution is fortified, as regards the Senecas and other tribes, by the first resolution adopted by the Senate at the same time, which requires that the chiefs and headmen of the St. Regis Indians should in general council accept and adopt the treaty as modified. Here it was necessary that the St. Regis tribe should accept and adopt the amended treaty in general council. The other tribes were simply to have the amended treaty submitted, fully and fairly explained to them in council, and then afterwards, or at the time, as they might elect, give their assent to it. It is admitted that a majority, that forty-four out of about eighty of the chiefs, did actually sign the amended treaty. The testimony of Captain Pollard, a distinguished Seneca chief, confirms this fact, the only one necessary to give effect and validity to the amended treaty. Of this chief the United States Commissioner, appointed to negotiate the treaty, states that, "for bravery in war, wisdom in council, and honesty and integrity in all the transactions of life, Captain Pollard has no superior among the New York Indians, and probably not in any of the tribes on the continent." This Seneca chief, so brave, so wise, with such honesty and integrity of character, says, "We have resolved to go West, and settle where our homes will be our own, and where we shall be beyond the example and advice of bad men, who advise us for their own interest. They love their own interest better than they love us, and they have tried to prevent our agreeing to the amendments to our treaty. A majority of the Seneca chiefs have now signed the assent. That is sufficient." Strong, a young Seneca chief, well educated, and highly respected by his tribe, states in substance, that the amended treaty was assented to by only one chief less than the number by which the original treaty was made; that six of the eight principal sachems have signed the treaty, and that nearly all the chiefs would have cheerfully given their assents, had it not been for the conduct of certain white men, and the danger they apprehended from the party of a few chiefs, adverse to a change. Gen. Dearborn, the Massachusetts Commissioner, states substantially the same facts.

Sir, by our resolution of the last session, the ratification of this amended treaty was to be proclaimed, whenever the President should be satisfied that the assent of a majority of the chiefs had been given to it. I know, for myself, that I voted for that resolution under the impression that it was not necessary that such assent should be given in council, but in any way which should satisfy the President that it had been given by a majority. I am prepared, therefore, to vote that the requisite assent has been given by a majority of the chiefs, and that the President ought to proclaim the ratification of the treaty. It is essential to the perpetuation and prosperity of these Indian tribes, and to the welfare of Western New York, that this treaty should be carried into effect, and that they should remove west of the Mississippi. There can be no less objection to all this, because such of the Indians as do not desire a removal can remain where they are for life. And I consider it a futile difficulty to say that the treaty ought not to be proclaimed, because a majority of chiefs have not assented to it, when at least two or three much more important treaties have, under similar circumstances, been carried into effect, and when, after all, we compel the Indians to do, upon all occasions, exactly as we choose to dictate to them.

SPEECH OF MR. ALLEN, OF OHIO.

In Senate, Tuesday, February 11, 1840—On the report of the Select Committee in relation to the assumption by the Federal Government of the debts of the States.

Shall the Federal Government depart from the sphere of its limited powers—shall it intrude into the local jurisdiction of the States—assume the duties of State legislation—tax the people for objects of State concern—shall it thus eventually abolish the State Governments, and itself settle down into one consolidated empire? This, Mr. President, no less than this, is the question presented, negatively, by the pending resolutions, and affirmatively by the substitute proposed. It is the same fundamental question which, at the beginning of the Government, divided this nation into two great parties, impressed upon them an enduring cast, fixed their principles, and has ever pointed the course of all their measures. Thus far has the great struggle involving the ultimate form of our institutions, already progressed; and although our history has been brief, we are now approaching that juncture in our affairs, when strife must speedily terminate in decision. For, sir, by the powerful impulse with which the whole system of civilization is now driven onward, changes more thorough are wrought in governments within a single life time, than centuries could effect, before this era of furious activity. And hence it is that our Constitution, though on the fourth of the ensuing month it will have subsisted but fifty-one years, has even now developed all its latent principles, whether of harmony or of discord, of consolidation or of disunion; whilst, in the mean time, the population has swelled to a magnitude, and stretched over a circuit sufficiently large, to comprehend all the diversity of interests likely hereafter to provoke dissensions. As to these things, therefore, the future has no secrets to disclose. The present generation have now before them all the data essential to the discussion of the question, shall the Union of these States continue as it is, or shall the States sink into a common empire, exposing the people to the hazard of despotism?

Sir, there is no truth, calculated to shed over a generous heart a deeper melancholy than the fact, that, of all objects yet undertaken by the faculties of man, the solid establishment of free institutions has been found the most difficult. The human mind, in its pride and in its glory, ranges through the whole frame of nature, discerns with certainty the laws which hold the members of the planetary world to their appropriate limits, protecting each against the encroachments of the other; and yet, in its utmost efforts, it has been unable to discover like rules of human conduct, to effect the same results between man and man. Most of revolutions have been but changes in the forms of oppression. For there is, in its principle, an elasticity adapting it to every new condition of things, in spite of all the precautions suggested by experience. If driven from the external forms of government by the positive enactments of the fundamental law, it soon reappears in the interior of the social community, and employs that law, the very safeguard provided against it, to protect itself in wrong and outrage upon the people. Nor, sir, do I speak thus without motive; for, in all I have this day to urge, it shall be my object to illustrate this truth I have stated, not by abstractions barren of results, but by the actual progress of events and the present state of affairs in our country.

And now, to begin at the primeval source of these events, where is it to be found? Not in our own history, but in that of our English ancestors; for we are still linked to that country by a chain of social dependencies, although that of our colonial bondage has long been broken.

In the first place, then, the British revolution of sixteen hundred and eighty-eight, which resulted in the expulsion of James the Second, and the coronation of the Prince of Orange, as William the Third, was finally consummated by a solemn compact between the new monarch and the people. He held the throne neither by inheritance nor as victor. By this adjustment of the Constitution, the jure divino right of kings was, as a principle, expressly denied—the ultimate authority of the nation fully recognised—the regal prerogative of levying money, hitherto assumed, torn from the the crown—that power acknowledged to abide alone in Parliament, and the protection of the citizen made the condition of his obedience. Such were the guarantees which Englishmen thought they had obtained, after so many years and scenes of civil war. And why should they not so think? Could they have supposed that a monarch, just called to a throne made vacant by the usurpations of his predecessors, would himself begin with the repetition of crimes so fatal to them? No. The eyes of the nation were therefore turned to Parliament, as the only source of law; and to law, as the sole authority to prescribe the amount and apportionment of the public burdens. They thought of taxes in no other form; they apprehended oppression from no other quarter. But the Prince of Orange was not an Englishman by nativity or affections. His views and feelings were upon the continent. Without sympathies with the isle of his adoption—as a man, brave and sagacious in battle and in the cabinet—ever, and every where, inflexible of purpose—cold, abstracted, collected within himself—ambition domineered in his heart, to the exclusion of all other passions. He came to the throne by invitation, and seems to have thought that less a favor to him than his acceptance a favor to the nation. Regardless, therefore, as it soon appeared, of a compact that trammelled his will, it became the first of his objects to regain the lost prerogatives of the crown, and, first of all, that which brought all others with it—the power to levy exactions, at pleasure, upon the people. His schemes required money—more than he dared to demand, or Parliament to supply; for Parliament was bound to respect the forms of the Constitution, and he the forms of Parliament. Yet even these difficulties in his way, so far from restraining the desires of the Prince, served but to disclose the fearful secret, that the wants of ambition will ever suggest the means of their own gratification. There stood the compact, guarded by all the terrors of a recent revolution; and now, sir, it is to be seen by what process he obtained his object, and the consequences of his success, not to that country alone, but likewise to this.

But, first of all, it becomes important to observe, that of all the modes of levying contributions upon the people, borrowing is the most dangerous and oppressive. In this form, the community are taxed in anticipation—not by law, but by contract. The weight of interest is thus added to the burden of the principal, whilst every check upon Government, in its application, is withdrawn, inasmuch as the present benefit resulting from the immediate use of money obscures the remote oppression its payment may occasion. Thus it is, that public debt is augmented without control. Thus it is, therefore, that each generation struggles, not to diminish, but to roll on, the increasing burden upon its successor; and thus it is too, that despotism, in silence and security, fastens its grasp upon the people, because each additional loan obtained upon the public credit, strengthens the hand which receives, and enfeebles that which contributes.

It was, then, to this form of the taxing power—the power to borrow, at pleasure, to an indefinite amount, upon the pledged property and labor of his subjects, that the King resorted, to reinstate the crown in its former plenitude of prerogative. But to this end, it was necessary first to create a fund to be borrowed. How was this to be done? It could be effected in no other way, than by making it the interest of one class of his subjects to unite with the throne in the plunder of the others. For this purpose, the money capitalists were the only class to whom the sovereign could appeal. But inasmuch as that class had already suffered by advances made to Government, in the recent convulsions of the State, some equivalent beyond ordinary indemnity, could alone induce them to renew those advances. That equivalent was ready. It was nothing less than an absolute power conferred upon them, as a company, over the whole currency of the country; a power to substitute, for a metallic medium, valuable in itself and therefore capable of being the standard of all other values, a paper circulation of the company's promissory notes, in themselves valueless, and for that very reason incapable of measuring the value of any thing else. This power was conferred, and this change in the currency effected, in sixteen hundred and ninety-four, the sixth year of that monarch's reign, by the charter of the Bank of England.

And thus, for the first time in the world's history, were the due bills of an incorporated company forced, by Government, as money, upon a nation. For the first time, were the property and labor of an entire people thus placed under the absolute control of a company; and thus, for the first time, was a counter revolution accomplished in Government itself, by a revolution in the currency—a revolution which, as far as Great Britain and the United States are concerned, has struck more profoundly into society—spread its effects more widely through all the minutest relations of life, than any other event of modern times. Yes, effects, of which, as I shall attempt to show, the matter of our deliberations this day are but the dreadful manifestations. For here, sir, it is that we are to look for the beginning of that succession of events, which has already imposed a debt of four thousand millions of dollars upon Great Britain, and enabled her to to throw two hundred million of the amount upon the States of this Union.

But in order to comprehend all the consequences, both social and political, resulting from the creation of the first English bank, it becomes essential to know the circumstances attending the transaction, as well as the motives and reasons. To these the British historian himself shall speak; and here I ask the strictest attention, that all may judge, whether, in our own history, there has any thing of a like character occurred:

"The scheme was founded (says Mr. Smollett) on the notion of a transferrable fund, and a circulation by bill on the credit of a large capital. Forty merchants subscribed to the amount of five hundred thousand pounds, as a fund of ready money, to circulate one million at eight per cent. to be lent to the Government; and even this fund of ready money bore the same interest. When it was properly digested in the Cabinet, and a majority in Parliament secured for its reception, the undertakers for the court introduced it into the House of Commons, and expatiated upon the national advantages that would accrue from such a measure. They said it would rescue the nation out of the hands of extortioners and usurers, lower interest, raise the value of land, revive and establish public credit, extend circulation, consequently improve commerce, facilitate the annual supplies, and connect the people the more closely with the Government. The project was violently opposed by a strong party, who affirmed that it would become a monopoly, and engross the whole money of the kingdom; that, as it must infallibly be subservient to Government views, it might be employed to the worst purposes of arbitrary power; that instead of assisting, it would weaken commerce, by tempting people to withdraw their money from trade, and employ it in stockjobbing; that it would produce a swarm of brokers and jobbers, to prey upon their fellow creatures; encourage fraud and gaming, and further corrupt the morals of the nation. Notwithstanding these objections, the bill made its way through the two Houses, establishing the funds for the security and advantage of the subscribers; empowering their Majesties to incorporate them by the name of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, under a proviso, that at any time after the first day of August, in the year one thousand seven hundred and five, upon a year's notice, and the repayment of the twelve hundred thousand pounds, the said corporation should cease and determine. The bill likewise contained clauses of appropriation for the service of the public. The whole subscription was filled in ten days after its being opened; and the court of directors completed the payment before the expiration of the time prescribed by the act, although they did not call in more than seven hundred and twenty thousand pounds of the money subscribed."

Here, then, was the first entrance into the world of the banking system, as a source of paper currency. And mark the attendant incidents. In the first place, it commenced in the creation of a public debt, ever to be increased—never extinguished, but by the extinction of the Government itself. In the next place, it began with the corruption of the legislative power; for after being planned by ministers in the cabinet, it was withheld from Parliament, in order that the King might corrupt a majority to its support, before exposing it to the eyes of the public. And then, above all, mark the reasons assigned for the measure: "It would connect the people more closely with the Government." Yes; bind them more firmly within the spell of the throne—render them more tractable—less rebellious to oppression.

But what were the reasons urged against it by the patriots of the day? That it would become a monopoly—engross the whole money of the country—subserve the views of arbitrary power—strengthen the crown against the people—withdraw money from trade—produce swarms of brokers and jobbers to prey upon their fellow men—engender fraud—encourage gambling, and corrupt the general morals. And who so lost to truth—so insensible to crime, as to deny that those fears have been realized? There can be none.

But what, sir, is this I have said and described? Does it relate to the first Bank of England, or to the first Bank of the United States? Where, in the world's history, are two events to be found, more identical in all their incidents—their reasons—their consequences?

The capital stock, consisting as it did, exclusively of Government bonds for near five millions of dollars, advanced by the company to the king; the bank began to loan its promissory notes, issued as a currency, upon the sole security of the bonds, themselves but the evidence of debt. In this manner it was that, whilst the institution, with one hand, drew interest, through the Government, from the people, on the debt itself, with the other it drew interest from them, on its own due bills, issued upon the pledge of the debt. The value of a stock thus yielding, as it did, a twofold profit, invited, of course, all capitalists to make additional investments. From time to time, therefore, was the capital of the bank increased, its charter extended, and its powers enlarged, by acts of Parliament, obtained through the influence of the king, that the institution might be able to make still further advances to him, as often as his schemes of ambition required them. Thus, by the repetition of the same process through a succession of years, the whole moneyed wealth of the empire became eventually drawn within the common reservoir of the bank, and arrayed as a distinct interest, against every other species of property—against the landed and the laboring classes, on whom, by its discounts and circulation, the institution levied an enormous tribute. And thus, too, by this concentration of power in the bank, and its coalition with the king, he was enabled to employ the institution, instead of Parliament, for all the purposes of taxation. The process was plain. When money was to be raised, instead of resorting to the constitutional mode of assessment by law the monarch, had but to apply to the bank in the first instance, and with the means thence obtained, prevail, by corruption, on Parliament, to provide for the payment of the interest. By each successive operation thus augmenting the public debt; the burden of its interest; the capital, powers and profits of the bank; strengthening its connection with the king; increasing his influence over Parliament; diminishing that of the landed and laboring classes in the Government, and concentrating all power in the joint possession of the bank and the throne. I say, sir, the bank and the throne; for as to the two Houses of Parliament, they had, by this state of things, been rendered so notoriously corrupt, as to justify Mr. Walpole, at an after day, in laying it down as an axiom, applicable to English statesmen, that "every man has his price." And now, sir, for the results to that nation, of this paper banking system. A public debt of four thousand million of dollars; taxes intolerable; an inequality of property and condition, ruinous in the extreme; a resulting aggregate of human misery, so wide and intense, as to leave one-fourth of the population, and that the most laborious, with scarcely a shelter by night, without the certainty of daily bread on the morrow—misery driving them on from insurrection to insurrection, for means of appeasing the cravings of nature. Four thousand millions of debt, still accumulating, notwithstanding the enormous tribute annually drawn from an hundred millions of her East Indian subjects; drawn by the torch and the sword; by robbery and murder, by the devastation of the oldest and richest country of the globe; drawn, sir, by a system of complicated and exquisite cruelty, which Attila, at head of his Huns, or Tamerlane, with his Tartars, would have blushed to commit—cruelty reserved for Clive and Hastings—cruelty, at the bare recital of which, by Burke and Sheridan, all England shrieked with compunctious horror—still there stands the debt, undiminished; and that too, although British rapacity, insatiate by the plunder of India, has stretched to a neighboring isle its blighting hand—snatched the last bread from his lips—torn the last rag from the naked limbs of the famished Irishman—undiminished still stands the debt, although generation after generation of her own infant children are worked in factories to the very extremity of life. Yes, notwithstanding these crimes of inhuman enormity—this infant toil amounting to torture—there stands the debt! and England, with her exterior grandeur, her splendid throne, her nobility, her navy, commerce, and colonies, presents the melancholy image of a hospital, whose surrounding colonnade of architectural beauty serves but to mock the sobs of affliction—the cries of despair within.

These, sir, are the direful consequences inflicted by the paper system upon that country, and threatened to this. But when, how, by whose agency, and for what reasons, was it affixed to our soil? Who gave it a lodgement in this Government? The Anglo-Federal party of the United States. From their hands it received life and nutriment; and by them, from the beginning to the present moment, has it been sustained and defended in all its ravages upon the people—in all its tendencies to the destruction of the Government. These were the men; but what were their motives for introducing it? To know them, their principles must be known; and here again it becomes essential—first, to know what were the principles of their founder. For of parties, it is no less true than of Governments, that, at the beginning, they take their principles from the men who lead; and, afterwards, the leading men take theirs from the parties. Who, then, was the founder of that party, and what his principles? Alexander Hamilton was the man. It was he—a man whose mind, of the second order, had been cast in an English mould; was he who founded the party, who prescribed to his followers a class of principles and a line of policy, now and ever cherished by them with all the zeal of fanaticism. But what principles were they? What his scheme of measures to give them effect? These questions he shall answer for himself. Nor shall I do him the injustice to cite his language, incautiously used, on an occasion affording no reason for deliberation and care. No. But language, uttered under the most solemn responsibility that man can incur, the responsibility of organizing the Government of a nation. These, then, were the principles laid down by General Hamilton, and prescribed to his party, in the debate on the adoption of the Federal Constitution, on the nineteenth of June, seventeen hundred and eighty-seven. Thus he spoke:

"My situation is disagreeable, but it would be criminal not to come forward on a question of such magnitude. I have well considered the subject, and am convinced that no amendment of the Confederation can answer the purpose of a good Government so long as State sovereignties do, in any shape, exist."

Again, on the same occasion, he declared:

"I believe the British Government forms the best model the world ever produced, and such has been its progress in the minds of the many, that this truth gradually gains ground. This Government has for its object public strength and individual security. It is said with us to be unattainable. If it was once formed it would maintain itself. All communities divide themselves into the few and the many. The first are the rich and well born, the other the mass of the people. The voice of the people has been said to be the voice of God; and however generally this maxim has been quoted and believed, it is not true in fact. The people are turbulent and changing; they seldom judge or determine right. Give, therefore, to the first class a distinct, permanent share in the Government. They will check the unsteadiness of the second, and as they cannot receive any advantage by a change, they, therefore, will ever maintain a good Government. Can a Democratic assembly, who annually revolve in the mass of the people, be supposed steadily to pursue the public good? Nothing but a permanent body can check the imprudence of Democracy. Their turbulent and uncontrolling disposition requires checks. The Senate of New York, although chosen for four years, we have found to be inefficient. Will, on the Virginia plan, a continuance of seven years do it? It is admitted that you cannot have a good Executive upon a Democratic plan. See the excellency of the British Executive. He is placed above temptation—he can have no distinct interests from the public welfare. Nothing short of such an Executive can be efficient."

And, in the same speech, proceeding to give his plan of Government, he said:

"Let one body of the Legislature be constituted during good behavior or life.

Let one Executive be appointed who dares execute his powers.

It may be asked, is this a Republican system? It is strictly so, as long as they remain elective.

And let me observe, that an Executive is less dangerous to the liberties of the people when in office during life, than for seven years.

It may be said this constitutes an elective monarchy? Pray, what is a monarchy? May not the Governors of the several States be considered in that light? But by making the Executive subject to impeachment, the term monarchy cannot apply. These elective monarchs have produced tumults in Rome, and are equally dangerous to peace in Poland; but this cannot apply to the mode in which I would propose the election. Let electors be appointed in each of the States to elect the Executive. [Here Mr. H. produced his plan]—to consist of two branches; and I would give them the unlimited power of passing all laws without exception. The Assembly to be elected for three years, by the people in districts. The Senate to be elected by electors to be chosen for that purpose by the people, and to remain in office during life. The Executive to have the power of negativing all laws; to make war or peace with the advice of the Senate; to make treaties with their advice, but to have the sole direction of all military operations, and to send ambassadors and appoint all military officers, and to pardon all offenders, treason excepted, unless by advice of the Senate. On his death or removal, the President of the Senate to officiate, with the same powers, until another is elected. Supreme judicial officers to be appointed by the Executive and the Senate. The Legislature to appoint courts in each State, so as to make the State Governments unnecessary to it.

All State laws to be absolutely void, which contravene the general laws. An officer to be appointed in each State to have a negative on all State laws. All the militia and the appointment of officers to be under the National Government."

On the twenty-second of the same month, still intent upon his object, and, as if fearful that he had not yet been distinctly understood, he proceeded to say that,

"In all general questions which become the subjects of discussion there are always some truths mixed with falsehoods. I confess there is danger where men is capable of holding two offices. Take mankind in general, they are vicious—their passions may be operated upon. We have been taught to reprobate the danger of influence in the British Government, without duly reflecting how far it was necessary to support a good Government. We have taken up many ideas upon trust, and at last, pleased with our own opinions, establish them as undoubted truths. Hume's opinion of the British Constitution confirms the remark that there is always a body of firm patriots, who often shake a corrupt administration. Take mankind as they are, and what are they governed by? Their passions. There may be in every Government a few choice spirits, who may act from more worthy motives. One great error is, that we suppose mankind more honest than they are. Our prevailing passions are ambition and interest; and it will ever be the duty of a wise Government to avail itself of these passions, in order to make them subservient to the public good—for these ever induce us to action."

Yes: here, in language the most explicit, under responsibilities the most solemn, did the founder of the Anglo-Federal party pronounce the American people incapable of a Democratic Government of equal freedom. Here did he declare that they were not sufficiently honest—that they were vicious—governed by their passions, turbulent, changing, incompetent to judge or determine aright; that they, as all mankind, were naturally divided into two classes, the few and the many, the rich and the well born on the one side, the great mass, the poor, on the other; that the first of these classes should, therefore, control the Government, in order to check the turbulence of the second. For these reasons it was, as he boldly declared, that he preferred the English form of Government, with all its abuses, with its throne, its nobility, its union of church and State, its standing armies, banking system, its organized corruption, its enormous debt, its ruinous taxes, its opulence of the few, its pauperism of the many. It was for these reasons that he pronounced such a Government "the best model the world ever produced." For these reasons it was that he thought a like Government, if once established over our people, would possess power to maintain itself against their folly and turbulence. And therefore it was, entertaining these principles and opinions, that he proposed, in full convention, to establish, as far as practicable, the same system here, by abolishing the State Governments, and creating a Senate and an Executive for life, armed with all the powers of the King and Lords of Great Britain.

Such were the principles and views openly avowed by the founder of the party. And who can doubt that it was this manifest danger to public liberty, from the very presence of such a party in the country, which prompted the controlling majority of patriots to provide those safeguards in the Constitution against the indirect means to which that party might, in future, resort to accomplish their object? What were those safeguards? That the Federal Government, in all its departments, should originate with the people—be responsible to them—that its powers should be few, and those distinctly expressed, and cautiously guarded—that the general mass of power should remain in the States or the people—that certain rights of men, deemed more essential to liberty, should abide with them, as sacred and inviolable, by either the State or the Federal Government—that no titles of nobility should be granted—that no State should issue bills of credit, coin money, or make any thing but gold and silver a legal tender. These were the safeguards; and, above all, were those provisions so intended which relate to the currency; for, sir, the patriots of the convention knew full well what had been the political and social effects of the paper banking system in England. They knew the desires of the Anglo Federal party here; and, knowing these, could they for a moment doubt what effects would be wrought upon our Government by such a system, in the hands of such a party? But what precautions ever yet proved infallible against the prompting of insidious ambition? None. And here, sir, we have no example—a fatal example, of what I begun with stating—that there is, in the principle of oppression, an elasticity adapting it to every new condition of things, and that, if excluded from the forms of government by the fundamental law, it nevertheless takes its stand in the interior of the social community, and perverts that very law to its own defence, against the resistance of the people. And now mark the illustration of the fact, in the hurried, silent, insidious process by which the British banking system was transplanted into this Government—transplanted, not only in violation of all the constitutional safeguards intended to exclude it, but under the auspices and guarantee of the Constitution itself. Mark, too, the exact resemblance of every incident attending the origin of the Bank of England? And why? Because the author of its introduction here was but an imitator—had made the model of the British Government—("the best model the world had ever produced")—had made that, and the history of British abuses, the chief and favored objects of his study—because he had proposed that model in the convention—had been defeated there—still deemed it practicable—and saw that it could only be introduced by first introducing the paper system, upon which it rested in England.

What were the facts? This Government went into operation by the meeting of the first Congress, under the Constitution, on the fourth of March, seventeen hundred and eighty-nine. On the thirty-first of July, of the same year, the act to regulate the collection of duties was passed, and its thirteenth section provided:

"That the duties and fees to be collected by virtue of this act, shall be received in gold and silver coin only, at the following rates, that is to say: the gold coins of France, England, Spain, and Portugal, and all other gold coins of equal fineness, at eighty-nine cents for every pennyweight. The Mexican dollar, at one hundred cents; the crown of France at one dollar and eleven cents; the crown of England at one dollar and eleven cents; and all other silver coins of equal fineness, at one dollar and eleven cents per ounce.'

Here, then, the whole revenue was to be received in gold and silver coin only. Such was the positive law of the land, passed in strict conformity to the Constitution. Thus, therefore, was the Government fairly launched upon the deep of time, without the beating of a wave or a wind to bear it from the course of its intended destiny. As yet, all was well; and so continued. But how long? To this question I will, in a moment, read the fatal answer.

On the second of September, of the same year, the act to establish the Treasury Department was passed, and on the eleventh of the same month, General Hamilton was appointed to that Department. Now mark the immediate consequences. On the twenty-second of that very month, he, as Secretary of the Treasury, issued to the collectors of the revenue an order in these words:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
September 22, 1789.

SIR: In consequence of arrangements lately taken with the Bank of North America and the Bank of New York, for the accommodation of the Government, I am to inform you that it is my desire that the notes of those banks, payable either on demand or at no longer period than thirty days after their respective dates, should be received in payment of the duties, as equivalent to gold and silver, and that they will be received from you as such by the Treasurer of the United States.

This measure, besides the immediate accommodation to which it has reference, will facilitate remittances from the several States, without drawing away their specie; an advantage in every view important.

I shall cause you shortly to be furnished with such indications of the genuine notes as will serve to guard you against counterfeits, and shall direct the manner of remitting them. In the mean time, and until further orders, you will please to receive them, transmitting to me a weekly account of your receipts and payments.

The Treasurer of the United States will probably have occasion to draw upon you for part of the compensation of the members of Congress from your State.

These drafts you will also receive in payment of the duties, or in exchange for any specie arising from them which shall have come to your hand.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

OTHO H. WILLIAMS, Esq.
Collector of the Customs for Baltimore, Md."

Thus, whilst the law of the land commanded, in the most explicit words, that the revenue should be "received in gold and silver coin only," the Secretary of the Treasury makes arrangements with banks, neither known or recognised to exist by the Constitution or laws of this Government; agrees to receive the whole revenue in their promissory notes, even though not payable on demand, and orders the collectors so to receive them. This he did by this fatal order, promulgated on the eleventh day after his appointment to office, on the fifty-third day after the passage of the revenue law, in the very presence of the Congress which passed it, still in session; and in utter contempt, equally of the Constitution, the law, and the law making power. I say, sir, this fatal order; fatal, because it was the first open infraction of the Constitution, as well as the law, by an officer of Government; fatal, because it went unpunished, unrebuked; because it brought the legislative power under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury; fatal, because it first established the connection of banks with the Government; revolutionized the currency of the country, by opening a breach in the Constitution, for the first Bank of the United States; fatal, because it was the primeval sin, whose consequences, broad and deep, have accumulated upon us with each returning year, until the Congress of the United States have at last received, not an order from the Treasury Department, but a mandate from the bankers and brokers of England, not to take for revenue the notes of banks, but to guaranty the payment of debts we never contracted; debts due to those who command; and this we are ordered to do, on pain of public ruin, threatened to the States, if we dare to disobey. Yet, fatal as was this order, it was but the commencement of General Hamilton's system for the revolution of the Government. He was an imitator; and, as such, saw from the British example that, to displace one Government, and to substitute another, without noise or violence, some machinery more powerful than a Treasury order was indispensably necessary. Well, what machinery so proper as a National Bank? What foundation for a National Bank so solid as a National debt? What materials so handy for a national debt as the debts of the States? None. This the Secretary knew. His party in Congress, he also knew, might be prepared, in advance, for the deed. They had justified his Treasury order in violation of law; and this act of loyalty to him was an invitation to come forward with the balance of his schemes. Ambition needs no second call to usurpation. He took them at the word; and, like the minister of William the Third, presented his plans in full maturity to the pre-engaged favor of legislative servility. And how were they received? With distrust? How acted upon? With deliberation? No. But snatched from his hand, and, with the impatient trepidation of conscious guilt, hustled and hurried through both Houses of Congress. Mark the process.

On the 29th of September, Congress adjourned its first session. On the 4th of January, 1790, commenced its second; passed the act to assume, by the Federal Government, the Revolutionary debts of the States, on the fourth of the ensuing August; on the twelfth of that month, adjourned its second session; opened its third on the sixth of the following December—passed the act to charter the first Bank of the United States, on the 25th of February, 1791, and on the third of the ensuing March, adjourned its third and final session. So rapid did the Treasury order, the assumption of the debts, and the charter of the Bank succeed one another. For, though it required six years for the ministers of William the Third to create a national debt, to revolutionize the currency—to establish a bank in coalition with the Government, concentrating in the hands of the parties coalesced, all the elements of social and political power; yet, General Hamilton, with this example before him, could effect these objects in two.—And why? Because the British Bank was already made to his hand, and he had but to locate a branch in this Government. How, and by what means? In the first place, it was necessary to create a national debt, and to throw that debt into the hands of bankers and stockjobbers in England. To this end, therefore, the Secretary of the Treasury, still faithful in his affection for the British form of Government, proceeded, through his party in Congress, to assume twenty-one millions of State debt, giving to the bonds an irredeemable quality, which he foresaw would, as it did, send them for investment to the money market of London There they accordingly went; and the Government being indebted, and that to foreigners, an excuse was furnished for providing the facilities of payment. How could it be paid without a bank? and how could a bank be introduced, without making this very debt the basis and body of its capital stock? No. These were the only means; the Secretary had so declared; his party in Congress were ready to act upon his judgment alone; and the thing was done. Done, sir, done, within the first two years of the Government—done by the very first Congress—done by the very same men who, but forty-two days before the Secretary came into office, had solemnly enacted, that all the revenues should be received "in gold and silver coin only"—done by men who were elected with no such view, and who, in the haste of their obedience to the Secretary, allowed the people no opportunity, by re-election, to condemn or approve the deed.

But why this hurry to found a national debt—to establish a bank upon capital held by Englishmen—to empower it to change the currency of the country—to receive its notes for all the revenue—to deposite the public money in its vaults—to confer upon the Secretary and his party the power, through the agency of English capital, over the whole property and labor of the country; and, in the end, the power to fix the forms of English Government upon this people? Why this hurry? Was it because they apprehended danger to their scheme from the alarm of the people, if they were allowed time to be alarmed? Was it because delay would concentrate the public affections upon the Government as it stood; or was it because age would give to the Constitution, now green and tender, that firmness and inflexibility with which it could not be bent, without the noise of a break—changed, without the tumult of revolution? Was it for these reasons that this succession of events was hurried along to consummation, in the first two years of the Government, without one word with the people? Let those who stand upon this floor to day—the faithful followers of Gen. Hamilton—they who on this and all occasions put forth their utmost energies to prop and defend these his maxims, and this his system—let them answer these questions to the country.

The debt was assumed, funded, held, by Englishmen—a branch of the English bank established in this Government upon it: I say a branch of the English bank; for what else was the Bank of the United States? Who owned its stock? Who received its profits? Who, by their agents, directed its affairs? Were they Americans or Englishmen? Were they here or in London? Let the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] answer. No; he has answered already—answered upon his responsibility as a Senator—answered upon this floor, in eighteen hundred and eleven, when he thus spoke, on the question of renewing the charter:

"The power of a nation is said to exist in the sword and the purse. Perhaps, at last, all power is resolvable into that of the purse; for with it you may command almost every thing else. The specie circulation of the United States is estimated by some calculators at ten millions of dollars; and if it be no more, one moiety is in the vaults of this bank. May not the time arrive when the concentration of such a vast portion of the circulating medium of the country in the hands of the corporation, will be dangerous to our liberties? By whom is this immense power wielded? By a body who, in derogation of the great principle of all our institutions—responsibility to the people—is amenable only to a few stockholders, and they chiefly foreigners. Suppose an attempt to subvert this Government—would not the traitor first aim, by force or corruption, to acquire the treasure of this company? Look at it in another aspect. Seven-tenths of its capital are in the hands of foreigners, and these foreigners chiefly English subjects. We are possibly upon the eve of a rupture with that nation. Should such an event occur, do you apprehend that the English Premier would experience any difficulty in obtaining the entire control of this institution? Republics, above all other nations, ought most studiously to guard against foreign influence. All history proves that the internal dissensions excited by foreign intrigue have produced the downfall of almost every free Government that has hitherto existed; and yet gentlemen contend that we are benefited by the possession of this foreign capital! If we could have its use without its attending abuse, I should be gratified also. But it is in vain to expect the one without the other. Wealth is power, and, under whatsoever form it exists, its proprietor, whether he lives on this or the other side of the Atlantic, will have a proportionate influence. It is argued that our possession of this English capital gives us certain influence over the British Government. If this reasoning be sound, we had better revoke the interdiction as to aliens holding land, and invite foreigners to engross the whole property, real and personal, of the country. We had better at once exchange the condition of independent proprietors for that of stewards. We should then be able to govern foreign nations, according to the arguments of gentlemen on the other side. But let us put aside this theory, and appeal to the decisions of experience. Go to the other side of the Atlantic, and see what has been achieved for us there by Englishmen, holding seven-tenths of the capital of this bank. Has it released from galling and ignominious bondage one solitary American seaman, bleeding under British oppression? Did it prevent the unmanly attack upon the Chesapeake? Did it arrest the promulgation, or has it abrogated the orders in council—those orders which have given birth to a new era in commerce? In spite of all its boasted effect, are not the two nations brought to the very brink of war? Are we quite sure that, on this side of the water, it has had no effect favorable to British interests? It has often been stated, and although I do not know that it is susceptible of strict proof, I believe it to be a fact, that this bank exercised its influence in support of Jay's treaty; and may it not have contributed to blunt the public sentiment, or paralyze the efforts of this nation against British aggression?

The Duke of Northumberland is said to be the most considerable stockholder in the Bank of the United States. A late Lord Chancellor of England, besides other noblemen, was a large stockholder. Suppose the Prince of Essling, the Duke of Cadore, and other French dignitaries, owned seven-eighths of the capital of this bank, should we witness the same exertions (I allude not to any made in the Senate) to recharter it? So far from it, would not the danger of French influence be resounded throughout the nation?

I shall give my most hearty assent to the motion for striking out the first section of the bill."

Seven-tenths of its capital stock owned by Englishmen, and they living at home—by men of whom many were, at the time, lords and officers of the British Government—by men connected in interest with the English Bank, and by principles, manners, and affections, with every thing English, with nothing American. Well, therefore, when he saw the Bank of the United States thus owned by Englishmen, thus established among us by a party here, openly declaring their want of confidence in the people, their attachment to the British forms of government—a bank in the hands of such a party collecting the whole revenues, its notes the whole currency, its word the whole law to the property and labor of the country; well, when he saw these things, did the Senator from Kentucky exclaim:

"May not the time arrive when the concentration of such a vast portion of the circulating medium of the country in the hands of any corporation will be dangerous to our liberties? By whom is this immense power wielded? By a body, who, in derogation of the great principle of our institutions—responsibility to the people—is access ble only to a few stockholders, and they chiefly foreigners. Suppose an attempt to subvert this Government, would not the traitor first strive by force or corruption to acquire the treasure of this company?"

And again:

"Are we quite sure that, on this side of the water, it has had no effect favorable to British interests? It has often been stated, and although I do not know that it is susceptible of strict proof, I believe it to be a fact, that this bank exercised its influence in support of Jay's treaty; and may it not have contributed to blunt the public sentiment, or paralyze the efforts of this nation against the British aggressions?"

These, then, were the statements, the fears, the sentiments, of the Senator from Kentucky. They were then true, so are they now; for the truth has not changed, though the Senator has.

Can it then, for a moment, be doubted, that the first Bank of the United States, was, in fact, but a branch of the English system?—that General Hamilton and his party, who introduced it here, still entertained their old affections for the forms of the British Government? Can it be doubted, that they yet cherished the hope of engrafting the substantial features of that Government upon our Constitution? Who doubts that they brought in the banking system with that view? And who, after looking to the principles and progress of the system, can doubt that its tendencies, one and all, are infallibly to that result? No! impossible! The very question now pending before us, is but a summary of all the results—a concentration of all the effects of the system, thus far in its progress.

Yet, sir, I will not come too abruptly up to the present period, but return back upon the line of events, to the point where the system made its entrance into our Government.

The Bank was founded upon a national debt, constituting almost the entire body of its capital stock; and why? The reason is obvious. It was devised upon political motive by the founder of a political party; and the party itself was to be organized permanently upon the basis of the institution, as the controlling centre of the paper system. It was, therefore, necessary that such an institution should rest upon a foundation both durable and political by its connection with the Government. The national debt, it was evident, would subsist form any years; and was doubtless intended by the party to become, like that of England, not only permanent, but impossible of payment. Here, then, was a solid basis upon which the party could stand whilst in power, and rally it expelled. Hence it was, that, when overthrown in 1800, the Anglo-Federalists, although in a minority, humiliated with shame, fell back, and, instead of a flight, securely concentrated upon the banking system. Hence it is that we now find them there, still warring for the empire of the few over the rights of the many; and hence it is, also, that we now behold that political phenomenon—a party, every political principle, every instinct of which, originates in, emanates from, and returns back into, the single idea of money; an idea to which, with them, Government itself is secondary; one form being preferred to another, only as one, more than another, may enable the few, "the rich and the well born," to subsist upon the unrequited toil of the laborious poor. Yes, "all communities divide themselves into the few and the many; the first are the rich and well born, the other the mass of the people." So spoke General Hamilton, the founder of the party and the paper system. Thus presenting the idea of money, no matter how acquired, as the fundamental principle of his politics, as the end of government, and government as nothing but the appropriate instrument of plunder. Whilst, on the other hand, his great antagonist, Mr. Jefferson, the illustrious founder of the ever glorious Democracy, with a soul sublimely elevated by an innate sense of justice—by an all-embracing sympathy with his countrymen—with a mind far-reaching to the future, beyond the forecast of the ablest of his age, took, nobly took, liberty as the basis of Government; equal freedom to all as the means of sustaining it, and the happiness of the whole people as its rightful object.

Money, then, being the fundamental principle of the Anglo-Federalists, the paper system the adopted means of making the Government subservient to this end; and the country thus drawn within the central influence of that system in England, can it be surprising that the most intense sympathies should have always subsisted between this party and that country? No: nor can it astonish any man that British instinct should prompt that people to send their capital here, in order to enlarge the paper system—to fasten its hold upon the Government and the country—to sustain a party which rests upon it, and to strengthen those sympathies of interest and affection.

And, sir, I ask, have they not succeeded? Has not the paper system, under the patronage of this party, and the stimulus of British capital, periodically applied, already expanded itself from one bank into a thousand? Has it not pervaded all the recesses of society, changed the whole currency of the country, excluded the constitutional medium, and taken its place, in spite of the Constitution? Has it not acquired control over all property, and all labor—made both tributary to its coffers—impaired the obligations between man and man—transferred the earnings of labor to hands that labor not? Has it not established among us corporate monopolies without number, and a privileged order of men, where equality of rights is enjoined by the organic law? But, above all, has it not secretly and slyly insinuated itself into all the forms of political power—diffused corruption through the whole frame and texture of our Government? Has it not, in thousands of those who claim the first rank in society, brought down every public—every individual virtue—every quality that ennobles and expands the human heart—patriotism, honor, truth, justice, courage, genius—every thing moral and intellectual in man; has it not brought down these, and all of these, in base subordination to avarice alone? Where, in these men, are now to be found that glow of patriotism, those noble sentiments, devoting the whole man to his whole country; that heat and energy of soul which fired their fathers onward to revolution and liberty? No where—no where. But bent beneath the stern despotism of a single passion, and that the lowest in the meanest breast, they prowl through life, servile to the power which enables them to plunder, and insolent to the victim people, who are plundered by them.

Nor yet is this all. Has it not paralyzed the manufacturing energies and resources of the country; countervailed the incidental protection of your tariff—rendered your factories incapable, even with the aid of law, not only of competing with British labor in the market of the world, but incapable, also, of competition on our own soil? Have not such been its effects upon the manufacturing interests, as demonstrated most clearly but a day or two since in the powerful reasoning of the ever-powerful Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN?] And whence, sir, but from this source, have originated our State debts of two hundred millions of dollars? Have not these, to the very last farthing, been incurred by advances made by Englishmen, not in money, but in the fabrics of British factories, to the almost total extinction of our own? But by what process has this been accomplished?

In the first place, the banks of the two countries being, as they are, but parts of the same system, the whole is made by the vital sympathy of the parts, to rest upon and receive its impulse from the central power. That power abides where the capital is aggregated, by which the system is stimulated into life and action. In London, then, the controlling power is found; and how is it connected? With the British Government—British manufactures—British commerce—British labor—British interests and policy—British ambition—with every thing British, and with nothing else. Every British instinct, therefore, necessarily prompts that people to enlarge the paper system among us, because, whilst that country holds the controlling power of the system, her influence over this, both political and commercial, must be proportionate to its enlargement. For this reason it is, that British policy and British capital have ever acted in concert with the Federal party, in multiplying banks, inflating the currency, and riveting the system upon us. For this reason it is, also, that British goods are so readily sent to this country in the form of loans, to be converted into bank capital—into State and company debts. And thus are we not only rendered tributary to them to the amount of the interest, but likewise, in the form of a profit-paying purchaser of manufactures, even beyond our wants, and which we are prohibited from making for ourselves, by the very power that chooses to make them for us. By these means, too, British influence over our public affairs is every hour expanding itself—entering more deeply, more fatally, into all our counsels. No wonder, then, that more than fifty out of the two hundred millions of State debt, incurred to English capitalists, by borrowing their calicoes and broadcloths, should have been invested in bank stock alone. For every additional bank contributes its issues and discounts to swell the paper currency—to increase the desire, and furnish the means, of buying still more British fabrics—to force men, companies, and States, still deeper into debt—to close our factories—to augment our tribute, and to draw this Government and people still more within the control of England. Yes: every new wave which rises upon the onward tide of a currency already redundant, drives still more men from labor to speculation—throws individuals into companies—presses those companies upon the law-making power, for aid to accomplish their objects—imparts the general delirium even to the States themselves, until, in the end, as we now behold, men, companies, States and all, yielding to the irresistible force, are propelled forward to the extremest verge of bankruptcy, when, in the agony of endangered honor, they implore their creditors for still more loans, to pay the interest on debts already contracted.

So far, therefore, as the currency, with all its mighty consequences, can be viewed, Great Britain and the United States are, by this system, consolidated into one people; the former controlling the destinies of both, by having in possession the central power of the system. Whether this state of things shall be allowed to progress, until it produces, in future, a corresponding conformity in the Governments of the two countries; recasting the American, as General Hamilton desired it, in the mould of the English form, must depend upon the sturdy patriotism and fortitude of this great Democracy. There is safety to be found for our institutions, for public liberty, in no other quarter. For such has been, such is still, the general tendency to that result; a tendency given to public principles and public measures, by the Federal party, armed, as they are, with all the vast and complicated powers of the banks, that nothing but the stern resolution of the patriot farmer and laborer of the soil and the shop can arrest that tendency.

And now, to the just judgment of the Senate I appeal. Is not every incident I have stated, throughout the long succession of events, from the beginning of the paper system in England down to the present time, strictly, indisputably true? Are not all the effects and consequences I have ascribed to these events, deducible, infallibly, from them? Is not the grand total of these effects presented in the very question now pending before the Senate? What but the influence of the British paper system, British capital, British policy, British opinions, British manners, British feelings; what but the concentrated influence of all these, acting with dreadful energy upon our country, ever brought this question before us? Nothing. How, otherwise, came it here? What but a British edict, commanding the Government to assume the debts of the States, has called forth these resolutions that we will not assume them? Yes, I say commanded; and are we not? Are not we, the representatives of a people whose ancestors, indignant at England's demand of tribute, rose in mass, and with the sword, instead of complying, cut one half of her empire loose from the other; are not we, the descendants of such ancestors, commanded, and that by English bankers; commanded, with a menace of ruin to the States, in case of disobedience; commanded to mortgage the whole public domain to those bankers; that domain which the valor of our fathers once wrenched from their grasp?

And how has this edict been received by a part of the Senate? Have they spurned it with that high indignation it should have excited? Did they spurn it at all? Have they joined in resistance when offered by others? Or have they, on the other hand, not only declined to condemn the mandate, but even proposed obedience to its utmost exactions, by the indirect pledge of this very domain to those bankers, through the agency of the debtor States?

When, some six weeks ago, the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] with that sagacity in public affairs, which has made him, among his countrymen, the man of men; when, sir, he saw the dangerous influence of England over our councils and our destinies, not only exerted indirectly through the paper system and its political party, but saw, likewise, this influence openly embodied and authoritatively put forth in the edict in question; when he saw the anxious efforts made by British interests and the friends and agents of those interests all around us, to temper and prepare our people and Government for obedience to this mandate; when he saw the danger of delay, and therefore submitted his resolutions—resolutions declaring the constitutional incompetency of this Government to assume these debts; the injustice, the fatal consequences of such assumption; when he enforced these, his views, at large in a speech; when the resolutions were, by the Senate, referred to a Select Committee, (for such was deemed their importance;) when these things transpired, what answer was made? None; none, save the indistinct uneasiness of a Senator or two, obscurely hinting their doubts and misgivings. But, on the contrary, silence, deep and dismal as the dead of night, reigned through the ranks of the Opposition; and so for weeks they continued. But observe the change. The committee now submitted their report, sustaining the resolutions against the assumption; and, at the same moment, the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] fresh from the purifying presence of the bankers and brokers of old England, makes his advent into the Senate. Now for the conflict. No sooner did the sound of the trumpet announce the presence of the herald, than Senators, hitherto in ambush, sprang to their feet, as if a lion had leaped in their midst. One and all now chimed in to swell the chorus of denunciation—of denunciation not of this presumptuous edict, but of the report of the committee advising disobedience to its mandates. It was the report they denounced—objected to its publication—denounced the resolutions themselves—denounced the whole proceedings—its principle and its object. And why this silence broken? Why this rage of denunciation? Under the cover of what pretext is this proceeding so violently assailed? The statement of the debts, and the refusal of this Government to pay them, might impair the credit of the States by depreciating their bonds, already in the hands of the bankers and brokers, by whom this edict is issued. This is the pretext for resisting a declaration by the Government that it will not obey this British mandate. And what, sir, I ask, if, instead of these Senators, those English bankers themselves were upon this floor, what would they, on this occasion, do and utter? They by whom these bonds are held—they from whom this mandate issued—they who seek to make this Government, which never contracted, nevertheless, assume these debts, and that in violation of its fundamental law—what would they do and utter? Would they not utter what these Senators have uttered, word for word? Would they not do all these Senators have done, deed for deed? Who doubts it? What else could they do or say? What other than these things would their interests require, or instinct suggest? Nothing: and if so—if these British bankers, thus seeking to control this Government for their own purposes alone—if they, under the same circumstances, would pursue the exact course which American Senators are pursuing, is it not time for these Senators to pause?

But where, in truth, is the pretext for the objection thus urged to this proceeding? Is it a fact that the credit of the States can be affected by the enumeration and publicity of their debts? Were not the debts created, in the first instance, by the public laws of the States? Have they not been annually reported to the legislative bodies, by the fiscal officers of the States; and by those bodies annually republished to the world? Have the States ever sought or desired to conceal them? No. It would be worse than ridiculous to suppose it. And can it be doubted that these English bankers themselves—they who hold these bonds, who traffic to the amount of many millions in them—they who have issued this mandate—can it be doubted that these men could have exhibited to the Senator from Massachusetts, when lately among them, an exact list and tabular statement of the debts, to the very last farthing—when authorized, how secured, at what interest, and when redeemable? For it is upon these data that the standard of appreciation is fixed, and the chances of profit calculated, in the purchase and sale. And, sir, if this be true, as true it unquestionably is, how then can the publication of facts already notorious, produce an effect which that notoriety did not?

But when did these Senators become the peculiar guardians of public credit? To preserve the faith of the General Government is an object not less essential to the honor of the people than to maintain that of the several States. He, therefore, is not less an enemy to the States than to the Federal Government, who seeks to impair the integrity of the latter, however clamorous he may be in sustaining that of the former.

How, then, did those Senators act, when, on a recent occasion, not only the credit, but even the very being, of this Government was involved? Who has forgotten it? What patriot ever will, ever can, cease to remember the insurrection of 1837? I say the insurrection, not of a few inconsiderate men, prompted by real or imaginary wrongs to lift their hands against public law, and social order? No; but the insurrection of a thousand banks, deliberately planned, and simultaneously executed, throughout the Republic; an insurrection against the whole body of the people, as well as against Government and law; an insurrection of corporations, not oppressed, but enjoying privileges—enjoying the possession and the use of the whole public revenues. The Government had resources, even beyond its immediate wants. Congress had made appropriations for the public service, abundant in every particular—all was in the custody of the banks as the confidential agents of the Government and the public. Stood affairs; when, without a moment's warning, the banks, the whole country over, slammed their doors in the face of the people—refused to pay their notes—refused to deliver up one dollar of the public money—calling this infamous act of treason and rebellion by the soft name of suspension. Thus, in violation of every law, was every man in the nation, and every branch of the Government, openly defied. Thus was every appropriation made by Congress seized by the banks; and the Government, in the absence of Congress, left without a dollar to execute the laws. Congress was instantly called together by the President. The two Houses assembled—they found the banks, in whose vaults the law had deposited the revenue, had not only refused to pay it over for the public service, but still refused to refund, out of the millions on deposite, even enough to cover the compensations of the members themselves. These things were fully stated by the President. He advised that, in future, those corporations should not be trusted with the public money; and that, in the mean time, Congress should provide means, either by a loan direct, or by the use of Treasury notes, to execute the laws, and keep the Government alive. Without these means, it was evident the Government must cease, in all its functions; the mails stand still; the post offices be closed; the courts discontinued; the navy be recalled from the ocean; commerce be left exposed; the army disbanded; Florida given over to conflagration and murder; Congress be adjourned; and the whole structure of the Federal Union be brought in ruins to the ground. This, every man saw, must inevitably follow, if those means were not provided, and that without delay. And yet, in an hour so perilous as this, what did those Senators do? Did they condemn the insurgent monopolies? Did they propose punishment adequate to treachery so infamous? Did they hasten to rescue the Government from a danger so imminent. No, sir; no. But, on the contrary, whilst the Government thus hung upon the verge of ruin, whilst every good citizen expected to see the arm of the law making power quickly stretched forth to save it, here stood these Senators, denouncing, not the banks as traitors, but the Government as bankrupt. Yes, denouncing the Government of their country, and that, too, in a manner to render it contemptible in the judgment of the world, and odious in the eyes of the people. Public credit! Where was then their solicitude for public credit? Nor were they satisfied with this denunciation. From day to day their utmost efforts were exerted to obstruct every measure for the relief of the Government, and to reward the treachery of the banks, by giving them anew the custody and use of the public revenues in future. A bill was introduced to extend to the importing merchants more time for the payment of their bonds for duties to the Government. All voted for it, save the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEVIER,] and he, I now believe, was the only Senator who voted correctly. Another was introduced to afford these deposite banks more time to speculate upon the public money before they refunded it, and this was unopposed. Nothing which favored the banks, however guilty, encountered the hostility of these Senators. Nothing which went to the relief of the Government, however indispensable, escaped their resistance. They the guardians of public credit, What better than such a course, at such a time, was calculated to dishonor the Government—to wound its integrity, both at home and abroad? And did they not—they who are now so sensitive about public credit—did they not then, have they not ever since, sought, by all the powers of denunciation, to depreciate the Treasury notes below even the paper of suspended banks; and for what but to debase the Government?

Truth, however, Mr. President, compels me to admit, that there is, in this proceeding, one feature which may go to discredit the indebted States; and that is the second branch of the substitute proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN] These are the words:

"Resolved, That it would be just and proper to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States in fair and ratable proportions; and that the condition of such of the States as have contracted debts is such, at the present moment of pressure and difficulty, as to render such distribution especially expedient and important."

Here then, whilst in the report and resolutions of the committee, no word is found to question the ability or readiness of the States to meet their engagements, even to the very hour and to the last dollar, this substitute solemnly resolves "that the condition of such of the States as have contracted debts is such, at the present moment of pressure and difficulty, as to render" the "distribution" of the proceeds of the public lands "especially expedient and important." Is such their "condition?" Is such their "pressure and difficulty," that it becomes "especially expedient and important" to pay their debts for them, if they are themselves able to pay? And who is it that makes this declaration? Not we, but the Senator from Kentucky; he who, as a friend of State credit, is alarmed when others merely speak of the debts, though they be already as notorious to the world, as the existence of the States themselves.

Yet, sir, it is for a reason higher than this, that I have read this substitute. I have read it, because it proposes, in the most unequivocal language, the indirect assumption of the debts, by this Government—the very deed we are commanded to do by the British bankers, in their menacing edict. However loudly, therefore, these Senators may have hitherto denied this to be their object, here, at last, when brought to the test, it is in effect openly avowed—avowed, and the reason assigned—that the "condition" of the States, "at the present moment of pressure and difficulty," makes this indirect assumption "especially expedient and important." What more than this have these English bankers ordered us to do? What more could they desire, than that we should thus mortgage to them, through the agency of the indebted States, the whole domain of the Republic? What more, than that the States of this Union should become their factors and brokers, to collect, by the officers of the Federal Government, and to transmit to them, the annual proceeds of a vast domain, larger than five times England itself? No. The British Government, arrogant and ambitious as it is, would desire no stronger hand in the Treasury of this Government—no stronger gripe upon the throats of these States—no better means to produce dissensions among us, than this measure, were it adopted, would afford.

And now, sir, what is the proposition contained in this substitute, but the resulting consequence of that succession of events I have sought all along to pursue? The British paper system, beginning, as I have shown, in a political coalition with the King against the people, founded, in the first place, their national debt; revolutionized the currency; expanded and perpetuated both the debt and itself; drew within its coil the whole moneyed wealth of the empire; imposed a destructive tribute upon all labor and all property, and thus continued, through each successive generation, to increase the inequality of condition and the aggregate misery among men, until, at the origin of our Government, it extended itself to our shores. Here the system assumed the same form, and took the same principle, as the basis of its new empire. It commenced here, as in England, in a coalition with a political party, and selected for its ally that party which affiliated, in feeling and principles, with the forms of the British Government. It founded itself upon a national debt; and, in order to complete its identity with the mother system in England, it transferred that debt to the hands of the same English brokers who controlled the system there. Being thus established upon British capital—under British influence, and in connection with a party who deemed the British Government "the best model the world had ever produced," the system began to effect the same social and political results here, that it had there already produced. It expelled the constitutional currency and took its place; made labor and property tributary to its coffers; expanded from one into a thousand banks; centralized within itself the whole moneyed wealth of the country; communicated English feelings and English manners, wherever it went; diffused its influence through all the forms of our Government; entered into our councils; plunged the States in debt two hundred millions of dollars to British bankers, who, conscious of their power through the agency of the system here, and its party connections, have commanded this Government to assume these debts; and now, sir, we have the result of the whole—we have the direct proposition to distribute the proceeds of the public lands, for that very purpose, made by the political friends of this system, in their place in the Senate. Such, I say, is the result of the paper system; and if, instead of resisting, we adopt the policy of this substitute, we shall soon have fulfilled the utmost wishes of General Hamilton and his party—the destruction of the State Governments, and the establishment among us, of an aristocracy upon the English model.

For is it possible for any thing to be more manifest than that a distribution of the money arising from the public lands is, in fact, a distribution of revenue generally? Who does not see that if, for instance, twenty-five millions of dollars be necessary to the administration of the Government; if, of that amount, five millions are brought to the Treasury from the public lands, and if this latter sum be withdrawn from the public service for distribution to the States, who does not see that you must impose an additional tax, to that extent, to supply the deficiency? Thus, therefore, in order that the Federal Government may, with one hand, distribute five millions to the States, it must begin by collecting, with the other, five millions from the people of these very States by increased taxation. Yes, more than five millions must be collected, because the expenses of collection, in the first instance, as well as those of distribution, in the second, are also to be paid. And what, sir, is the final consequence of this? It is that the Federal Government centralizes in its own hands the whole power of taxation for all objects, local and general. It taxes the people, not only generally for objects within its own competency, but enters the States, takes the place of State legislation, and taxes them anew for purposes solely of State concern. What then of existence, as sovereignties, would remain to the States? What would all their residuary powers be worth? What would they be but dependent corporations—dependent upon the imperial system, to whose centre all powers and resources had huddled together?

Adopt, therefore, the policy of distribution—obey this British edict—pledge the revenue to the payment of those debts—and you will have fulfilled the destiny of the paper system; you will have accomplished the views of General Hamilton and his party; you will have answered fatally for civil liberty; you will have answered affirmatively the question with which I began: "Shall the Federal Government depart from the sphere of its limited powers—shall it intrude into the local jurisdiction of the States—assume the duties of State legislation—tax the people for objects of State concern—shall it thus eventually abolish the State Governments, and itself settle down into one consolidated empire?"

BRANCH MINTS.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 17, 1840.

The bill supplementary to the act entitled, "An act to establish branches of the Mint of the United States," approved March 3d, 1835, coming up on its third reading,

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky hoped that some reasons would be given why this bill should pass. Where was the silver bullion, which it is proposed by this bill to employ these mints in coining, to come from?

Mr. WRIGHT said, that, as the bill had been reported from the Committee on Finance, it was proper for him to make some remarks in explanation of the provisions of the bill as understood by the committee. Mr. W. then explained the provisions of the first section which were intended to remedy defects in the existing law. The second section authorized the branch mints to coin small silver change, if it was ascertained that it could be done with the machinery at present in operation, without material additional expense. In the mines of the South there is always found, in connection with the gold, a considerable portion of silver, and this has, at present, to be sent to Philadelphia to be coined; whereas it was represented to the committee that the silver might be coined with the same machinery used for the gold with a slight additional expense: as, for instance, the half and quarter eagle would answer for the quarter dollar and dime, with the substitution of new dies, which will occasion slight additional expense, as the engraver is employed at a fixed annual salary.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said that, in his opinion, instead of acts to involve us in additional expense for these branch mints, the only act which it was proper for us to pass would be one to abolish them. He considered that their establishment was wholly unnecessary, and a waste of public money, while the mint at Philadelphia was perfectly competent to coin all that the wants and the means of the country required. He recollected with great satisfaction that, when the bill for the establishment of these branch mints was introduced into the Senate, he had given it his most decided opposition; and the recollection of his course on no subject gave him more lively satisfaction. He considered their establishment a mere wasteful expenditure of public money. There were ample means to coin all the bullion of the country. The silver which is spoken of as being collected with the gold in the mineral region of the South, could be sent to Philadelphia, coined, and transported back again, at a less expense than if coined at these branch mints. They were a portion, and, as far as expense was concerned, no inconsiderable portion, of the gold humbugs which characterized the day of their origin. The remainder of these extravagant measures had disappeared, and he would be glad if these mints would follow. He should vote against the bill, and asked for the ayes and noes on its passage.

The ayes and noes having been ordered,

Mr. LUMPKIN said: Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] appears, from the remarks which have fallen from him, to have neglected to examine the provisions of this bill. This bill, sir, if I understand its provisions, will add nothing to the expenditures in sustaining the branch mints. It is intended to increase the business and profits of these mints, without at all increasing the expenses. By the provisions of this bill, additional labor, it is contemplated, will have to be performed by the existing officers of the mints; but no increase of officers or salaries is either intended or provided for.

The Senator considers these branch mints as a dead charge upon the Government, and worse than useless, and desires to know where the silver bullion is to be obtained for the coinage of the small coins, twenty-five cents and under, provided for by the bill. In regard to the expenditures which have been necessary to get these mints into operation, it is proper to remark that these expenditures upon the necessary erection of suitable buildings, and the necessary machinery and fixtures, is chargeable to the policy and act of Congress, creating and establishing these branch mints, and ought not now, in the second year of the operations of these branch mints, to be brought into the account of profit and loss, to exaggerate the ordinary expenditures in the operations of these establishments. This expenditure in outfit will not be necessary again for many years to come. And, sir, although the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has always been opposed to these branch mints, he has not yet been able, with all his admitted ability, to convince me, or that portion of the country which is most interested in this subject, of the inexpediency or inutility of this measure; and I am glad to have it in my power to add, that a majority of Congress have hitherto differed with the honorable Senator on this subject.

A more unfavorable time, to the friends of this measure, could not have been selected, than the present, to discuss the policy of establishing these mints. A variety of circumstances conspire at the present moment to disparage the utility of these branch mints. Nevertheless, sir, I think the closest scrutiny and investigation will but increase the friends of this measure. From the best information which I have been able to obtain on the subject, I feel authorized to express the opinion, that what is termed the mining region of the Southern States, affords inexhaustible mines, sufficiently productive in the precious metals, especially gold, to amply justify the establishment of these branch mints, and to sustain them for generations to come.

To a great extent the best of what is termed the deposite mines will, in a limited period, be measurably exhausted. But should the vein mines prove to be equal to what they are believed and represented to be by gentlemen of high character and intelligence, who have spent much time and labor in investigating and examining the value of these mines, there can be no doubt of the continuance and importance of the mining business in the gold region of the Southern States. I speak in reference more particularly to the gold region of my own State, (Georgia) from whence I derive the information upon which I rely most. Those who have perseveringly pursued the mining business in Georgia for the longest period of time, are the most fixed and settled in their convictions of it being a very profitable business.

Various causes have tended to divert labor from the gold mines of Georgia for several years past. The Indian wars and disturbances upon our borders and in Florida, has taken a great number of laboring men from the mines into the volunteer service of the country. Again, we have been rapidly progressing for several years past, in the construction of several important and extensive railroads, which has created an extraordinary demand for labor, and consequently raised the price of wages beyond what has heretofore been known in the country. Moreover, the very high prices of agricultural products of every description for the last few years have been sufficient to satisfy the industry and enterprise of that most valuable class of the community, the agriculturalist.

Are not these causes, sir, which I have adverted to, sufficient to account for the fact, that much of the labor and enterprise, heretofore attracted to the mining business, should be diverted to the pursuits of other employments, affording such unusual encouragement to labor. But, sir, a few of the past years have been too prosperous for us to indulge the hope of the uninterrupted perpetuation of such days A change has already overspread the whole country. High wages and high prices for our agricultural products are no longer the theme in any section of our wide spread country; but the reverse. The great cause of the distressing change of the times is a subject worthy of the profound consideration of every statesman, but this is not the time or the occasion for that discussion.

My object in adverting to these facts, is to show the probability that the day is not far distant when a much larger portion of labor and capital will be drawn to the mining business. Whatever objections may be justly raised against the mining business, yet it is a hard money, a cash business. And when the products of the country cannot be exchanged for money at a fair price, those who have it conveniently in their power to do so, will turn their attention to raising the precious metals from their beds of obscurity in the bowels of the earth. The profits of mining in Georgia are variously estimated, and I will therefore forbear to enter upon the details of information, which I now have in my possession, derived from highly respectable gentlemen, in whom I have confidence. Suffice it to say, I am well satisfied that no agricultural pursuit in our country affords a more certain or greater prospect of profit than the mining business, provided the investment in mining is conducted with the requisite skill, prudence, and perseverance.

Under all the disadvantages to which I have adverted, and which these branch mints have encountered thus far, yet we find, from the report of Mr. Patterson, the director of the mint at Philadelphia, that, during the past year, 1839, the branch mint at Charlotte, North Carolina, received deposites of gold to the value of $126,836. The amount of its coinage was $162,767 50, composed of 23,467 half eagles, and 18,173 quarter eagles. And the branch mint at Dahlonega, Georgia, received, during the same year, deposites of gold to the value of $113,035; and its coinage amounted to $128,880, composed of 18,939 half eagles, and 13,674 quarter eagles. And the Director adds: "These two mints are in a very satisfactory condition, and are fully able to execute much more work than has yet been required of them."

The director also states in his report, that the capacity of the mint and its branches is now abundantly sufficient for all the gold coinage necessary for the metallic circulation of the country, and recommends a repeal of the act of June 28th, 1834, as he presumes that the provisions of that act, making foreign gold coins a legal tender, is no longer necessary. If the views of the director be correct, and I think they are obviously so, the carrying out of these views would give additional work to our mints, by the recoinage of foreign coins. And, sir, whether their work and utility be increased in this way or not, these branch mints, if sustained by proper legislation, such as we propose in the present bill, will not fail in greatly increasing the metallic circulation of the country.

But, sir, I must not forget to reply to the question of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] where is the silver to be obtained for coinage at these branch mints? My reply is, that wherever mining operations are carried on in gold, some portion, more or less, of silver is found. I understand silver to be the natural alloy of gold. I am not prepared to state, with precision, what proportion or quantity of silver is usually found in the mining operations of the gold region of the Southern States; but I am impressed with the belief, that sufficient quantities are found to make it an object of importance to authorize the branch mints, as contemplated in this bill, to coin pieces of twenty-five cents and under. And, sir, I consider the coinage and circulation of these small pieces of great importance to all that range of the interior of the Southern States, where these branch mints are located. Sir, it is in that section of country that the people suffer most from the circulation of your miserable, worthless, little shinplasters. It is a part of the country far removed from your unsound banking institutions, and manufactories of paper money. The people being ignorant of the true condition and source from whence these paper tickets and shinplasters have issued, as often receive, by imposition, illegitimate as legitimate shinplasters. I wish to legalize and encourage the coinage of small silver shange, to supply the place of that worthless trash, called change bills. I have always been opposed to the circulation of these change bills, and once had a leading agency in my own State in driving them entirely from our circulation. One of the greatest evils connected with what has been the banking policy of our country, has been that of issuing small bills. The banking system might have survived for years yet to come, if there never had been an issue of small bills, by any banking institution—an issue bringing paper into circulation, in competition with the constitutional coins of the country. Experience has now demonstrated the impossibility of keeping up a specie circulation for use, in the every day small transactions of the business of life, while bills of like denominations with our coins are scattered throughout the country Coins, the better currency, will be hoarded by the banks, as well as individuals, and exported abroad when necessary to promote the interest of the holder; and the people of the country will be left to the use of depreciated bank bills, in the place of their own constitutional coins.

Mr. President I am not disposed to conceal from the Senate, that I consider the establishment of these branch mints a subject of deep local interest and importance to the interior of all the Southern States, embracing what is called the gold region, as well as to the adjacent and surrounding country. It is a section of country, sir, which, from its geographical position, derives but little benefit from the vast expenditures and disbursements of this Federal Government. It is a tax paying and not a tax gathering country. It is the country which forms an important portion of your bone and sinew, in peace and in war. These people look not to your Government for special and extraordinary favors in the form of bounties or protection. But, sir, God and nature having placed in the land of their residence and choice, inexhaustible mines of the most precious and valuable metal known to the world when used as the currency of a country; and you having, with a view to the common interest of the whole Confederacy, established these branch mints, for the coinage of the precious metals, which they, with toil and labor, raise from the bowels of the earth, and thereby having taught them them the advantages of their location—I ask, sir, will you now, in the second year of your policy in relation to these branch mints, crush and destroy all the bright anticipations, which you, by your policy, have created? I confess, sir, I am surprised and astonished to hear gentlemen advocate the abolition of these mints—speak of selling out the interest of the Government in these establishments. Surely these propositions are made without due reflection and consideration; especially, coming as they do, from those who are the known advocates of encouraging various branches of domestic industry. During the present session of Congress, a great number of petitions, numerously signed by highly respectable citizens and from various sections of the country, have been presented to the Senate, asking encouragement and protection to the domestic silk interest of our country; and many of these petitions having been referred to the Committee on Manufactures, of which I have the honor of being chairman, has caused me to reflect much upon that subject; and although opposed to protecting tariffs, I am pleased to say that my feelings coincide with the sentiments which I have heard fall from the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] in regard to this branch of agricultural industry. I am clearly of opinion, that a high revenue duty should be laid upon all foreign silks imported into the United States. But, sir, in reflecting upon this silk subject, I have come to the conclusion that no duty on foreign silk, or bounty on domestic silk, would so effectually advance the silk culture in our country, as would the establishment of a ready market, in every neighborhood, for the sale, at a fair price, of all the cocoons which could be produced by the industry and enterprise of our people. A market for all that can be produced, whether in large or small quantities. This, however, is not a work for the Government—it must be left to individual enterprise and capital to effect this object. My object in this digression, from gold to silk, sir, is to present to the Senate more clearly the great advantages of these branch mints to the people in the vicinity of their location. This gold region spreads over a great extent of country, and tens of thousands of the citizens of these States are directly or indirectly interested in the mining business. Since the establishment of these branch mints, every individual who can collect gold, in large or small quantities—whether rich or poor—can get a fair price for his gold, and that in good hard money, and in his own immediate neighborhood. It has established a fair and just trade in the precious metal. The frauds formerly practised by both buyers and sellers, are now rarely heard of.

The Pigeon Roost, and other kindred banks, no longer engross the advantages of the miner's labor. He takes his gold to the mint, and there receives for it a fair equivalent in coin. The amount of bullion received at the branch mints in North Carolina and Georgia the past year, (1839) and chiefly taken from the mines in their immediate vicinities, has afforded a coinage of $291,587; and, from causes which I have already explained, it is believed by those who are in the most favorable positions to the formation of correct opinions on the subject, that the increase of the present year will justify estimating the coinage at $500,000. Sir, this is no inconsiderable item in the circulation of a country which is threatened with the banishment of a sound specie currency. Mr. President, I am not in the least surprised that doubts and opposition should have existed, when the proposition was first presented to Congress for the establishment of these branch mints. But, to my mind, it is most extraordinary indeed, that any reflecting man can, at this time, favor the idea of abolishing these mints. Yet, sir, we find such a proposition before the Senate of the United States; and that, too, when the mints are in their infancy of only the second year; when the prospects of their utility to the country are every day increasing and developing themselves to all who are acquainted with the circumstances appertaining to the subject.

Now that capital and labor to a large extent has been invested in the mining business, improved and expensive machinery procured to carry on the operations, we find this effort introduced here to prostrate both the policy of the Government and the interest of a very numerous and meritorious class of citizens, by a sudden and unexpected abandonment of what was considered the settled policy of the Government.

The mining interest in the gold region is already reviving, and it is altogether reasonable to expect that the mines will be much more extensively worked than heretofore. The investigation of scientific men, aided by ample capital, has resulted recently, and in several instances, in making considerable investments in the mining business. This, in connection with the reduced price of agricultural products, and the increased value of gold, (which is at least seven per cent.) will, with the favorable indications presented by the mines themselves, both for richness and durability, give additional spirit and activity to the mining operations. Under these circumstances, sir, I cannot indulge the apprehension that Congress will fail to pass this bill, and continue to give its countenance and support to these branch mints, until a full and fair trial, at least, shall be made of the utility of their establishment.

Mr. BROWN said, that having introduced the bill, he deemed it his duty to say a few words in favor of its passage. He must be allowed to express the very great surprise which he felt that any gentleman should consider himself called on to oppose a measure so reasonable in itself, and of such obvious public utility.

If it were now a question brought before us for the first time, whether we were to establish these branch mints, then the remarks, which we had heard, in regard to the annual expense occasioned by them, would have been much more appropriately made, and would have formed a fit subject for consideration. They are now, however, in successful operation, and can be made to perform the additional duty of coining the smaller denominations of silver money at a very inconsiderable additional expense to the Government. Shall we not, then, said Mr. B. avail ourselves of a benefit of such acknowledged public utility, as that of increasing the supply of silver change, and especially when it can be done at so cheap a rate?

When gentlemen dwelt so much on the small additional expense which it would require, did it not strike them, that in any one of our large commercial cities alone, the annual loss on shinplasters and small notes, issued by insolvent individuals and corporations, if calculated, would be found to exceed the entire cost of these two branch mints?

The Senator from South Carolina had spoken in a tone of ridicule of the shock which he says the mere mention of the term shinplasters occasions in a certain quarter. It was not surprising that a public nuisance of so odious a character, and so demoralizing in its effects, should shock the moral sense of the community. He regretted that the sensibilities of gentlemen over the way should have been shocked at the mention of small coins. He could see very adequate cause why the former should produce this effect, but none why the latter should.

But we had been told of the gold humbug. That had at once solved the mystery of all this aversion and opposition to an increase of the metallic currency.

It was no longer a matter of doubt or of speculation, that the favorite credit and paper system of gentlemen, as it had been conducted in this country, was the real humbug in regard to currency. The practical lessons on this subject which had been taught by the last four years' experience, had outweighed all the sophisms of theorists, and had left a deep impression on the public mind in favor of greatly augmenting the proportion of metallic currency.

Mr. PRESTON had a very distinct recollection of the discussions, the result of which was the establishment of the branch mints. He was one of those who supported that measure, and though he did not now recollect all the particular reasons which were urged for and against it, he remembered that those in its favor preponderated. Mr. C. after referring to several gentlemen who took part in that discussion, and the arguments they advanced, said that the main argument, and the one which had the greatest weight on his mind, was that the increased production of gold in that region, led to the hope that at no distant period the mints would be profitably employed, and that that region would be a great gold producing country. There was great enthusiasm excited on this subject. The increase of production was then between forty and fifty per cent. per annum; and if it had gone on at that rate, there would have been, by this time, some forty or fifty millions of gold coin in the United States.

But these hopes had not been realized, and so far from the ratio of production having been increased, it had decreased. The enthusiasm on this subject had been passed by, and the gold mines from the Rappahannock to Georgia, had all decreased in their production, and many of them had been abandoned. Mr. P. referred to a convention which had been held in Georgia, which, after an investigation of the subject, had arrived at the general result that labor could be more profitably employed in the different branches of agriculture than in mining. He was very much of the opinion that, at the moment of organizing the branch mints, the most enlightened of those who thought on the subject feared that Congress had acted precipitately. Mr. P. expressed doubts whether the experiment had been successful; he doubted whether the establishments had been found profitable, and whether it would not be the best policy to discontinue them altogether. Mr. P. concluded by moving to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of discontinuing the branch mints.

Mr. CALHOUN hoped that whatever might be the proper course to be pursued in reference to these mints, the motion of his colleague would not prevail. If he understood the object of this bill, it was to superadd the power of coining silver, to that which the mints now possessed of coining gold. The expense to effect the object in view would be exceedingly small, for the bill contemplated that it should not be undertaken, if expense of any account was to be occasioned by it. His impression, upon a view of these facts, was, that there ought to be no opposition to the bill. There was a considerable portion of silver alloy in all the gold found in the gold region of the South, so that one objection that had been urged against the bill was here obviated. He hoped that his colleague would let the bill pass, and if he thought that the mints were not rendering an adequate service, compared with the expense of keeping them up, let him institute an inquiry, and then if the facts shall justify it, propose their discontinuance. It was not fair now to decide that the experiment of these two mints had or had not failed. When they were first established, gold was collected in considerable quantities, though the production was now very much reduced. He had some little knowledge of that region of country, and he ventured to say that the coinage of $120,000, the amount coined by the mint which had done the smallest business, was enough to justify the continuance of it. He believed that gold bullion had risen since the establishment of these mints eight or nine per cent.; which was a clear gain to the producer, who, previous to this, had to exchange his bullion for paper at a serious loss. As to the falling off of the production of these mines, it might be easily accounted for. The mines were divided into two descriptions—deposite mines and vein mines. The deposite mines, from their nature, would be soon exhausted; but the vein mines were scarcely yet begun to be understood, and from them a very considerable production might be expected. There had been powerful reasons why these mines had fallen off. Gold and paper were antagonists to each other. The paper circulation had swollen immensely—prices had consequently risen, and the depression of gold and silver followed. The increased cost of production which lessened the value of the gold with the rise in the price of cotton, took away much of the capital that was employed in mining. He might add to this the demand for labor on the railroads in the progress of construction about that time. If the present state of depression should continue for any length of time, we should have an opportunity of knowing what effect the opposite state of facts would produce. In that event, he thought the products of the mines would be as great as ever. If an expansion of the paper currency again took place, gold would again sink.

There were a variety of opinions with regard to the capacity of these mines for producing gold in any considerable quantities. Some thought that it would turn out to be the richest gold region in the world, while others—scientific men—thought differently. This would be decided by time alone. He did not think, however, that any judicious decision could be made now. Mr. C. concluded by expressing the hope that his colleague would permit the bill to pass now; and, after having collected what information he deemed necessary from the Secretary of the Treasury, bring the subject before the Senate in a distinct form.

Mr. BROWN regarded the opposition to this bill, whatever might be the intentions of honorable gentlemen who made it, as calculated to prevent any increase in the circulation of a metallic currency, and to establish in its stead an exclusive paper system. He did not say that honorable gentlemen were actuated by these motives, but he must say that this would be the effect of the course pursued by them. It was well known by those who were adverse to the circulation of a metallic currency, that the coinage of every half or quarter eagle, or of every quarter dollar, is a sensible and visible argument addressed to the people against the depreciated paper currency, with which they have been afflicted; and hence it was, that those who favored the latter currency, viewed the operations of our mints with uneasiness and a arm. Yes, the coinage of every half eagle or quarter of a dollar was an irresistible argument addressed to the senses of the people against that miserable shinplaster currency, which was its antagonist.

The Senator [Mr. PRESTON] seemed to argue this question as if it was an original proposition—as if the question of establishing branch mints was now before the Senate de novo, forgetting the important fact, that these establishments were now in operation, and that the present bill called for but little additional expense, while it was only intended to authorize the coinage of silver change, which would add greatly to the usefulness of these institutions. The statement that the gentleman made with regard to the coinage and the expense of these establishments, he was very certain was incorrect. He begged leave to refer to the last annual report of the Superintendent of the Mint at Philadelphia, to show that it was so. By this report, it appeared that the amount of coinage within the last year, at the mint at Charlotte, North Carolina, was $162,767 50, in half and quarter eagles. Now, what was the annual expense of that branch? Why, only $12,000, it would be seen, was asked for in the appropriation bill for this year. About the same amount was proposed to be appropriated, also, for the branch mint in Georgia. Could honorable gentlemen, after this, get up and say that the cost of these mints overbalanced the advantages derived from them? By this document it appeared that the considerable amount which he had spoken of, had been coined in gold in the course of the last year at the branch mint at Charlotte; and he had no doubt that if the coinage of silver was authorized, the amount would be greatly increased.

When honorable gentlemen talked of the loss to the country, by keeping up these establishments, let them bear in mind that in each of our large commercial cities, there was a greater loss annually to their inhabitants, from the miserable shinplasters which had usurped the place of coin, than the whole expense thus incurred. He had no doubt but that the people of the United States had lost a half million of dollars annually, in consequence of the worthless trash, in the shape of paper currency, with which the whole country had been inundated. Yet gentlemen talked of the paltry expense of $12,000 a year, (for neither of the branch mints would cost more,) while they kept out of view the immense losses incurred by the people from their favorite paper system. When he heard gentlemen talk so eloquently about the currency in relation to a measure so important to the interests of the people, his mind reverted back to the expenses incurred by the Congress of the United States for matters in which the people had but little interest. Sir, said Mr. B. within the last five or six years there has been a half million or more of dollars appropriated to purchase useless books for the libraries of members of Congress, and for other purposes; and yet these appropriations were made mainly by the votes of gentlemen who now seek to cut off a trifling appropriation, for an object of great public utility. The cost of keeping up these two mints would be less than twenty-four thousand dollars per annum; but this the gentleman stigmatized as great extravagance, forgetting that the throwing into circulation a quantity of small coin would be the means of saving the people of the United States from the great losses they incurred by the circulation of worthless shinplasters.

Mr. B. saw no good reason for recommitting this bill. To delay was to defeat it. The Senate required no additional information on the subject. It had been under discussion for the last two sessions, and the public documents, now on file, contained all the information with regard to it that was necessary. The session was considerably advanced, and there was danger, if the bill was delayed now, that it would be too late to pass it through the other House.

Mr. BUCHANAN had a few words to say in regard to the bill under consideration; and he should speak from memory, rather than from any recent investigation of the facts. For one, when these branch mints were established, he had the misfortune to differ from a large majority of his political friends in the Senate; and he voted under the banner of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] and Governor HILL of New Hampshire, who was also opposed to them. He had seen no cause since to change the opinions he had then formed, though he hoped he might see abundant cause to do so hereafter. That, however, was not the question. These branch mints had been already established, and were now in operation; and the first section of the bill, if he was not greatly mistaken, was intended, not to increase, but to diminish the expense. Under the existing law, the superintendent was obliged to employ a separate class of laborers for each particular purpose of the institution; and at the mint in Philadelphia, he may easily do so without loss or inconvenience; but at these small mints, to confine the laborers employed to a particular branch of the business, necessarily obliged them to be idle for a considerable portion of their time. The object of the first section, then, was to enable the superintendent to employ the laborers at these small mints in different branches, and not confine them to one particular employment.

He would ask the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, who had reported the bill] if he was not right in saying that the first section was not to increase, but, as recommended by Mr. Patterson, was for the express purpose of diminishing the expense?

[Mr. WRIGHT here answered in the affirmative.]

The whole amount of the business done at these mints, heaven knows, has been little enough. He wished to give them some more employment, and the superintendent said that this could be done with very little additional expense; that the silver could be coined by the same machinery that was used for the gold coinage, and that the engraver was under a stated salary. The bill provided for no appropriation whatever, and it was not supposed that any additional expense, of the least consequence, would be involved. Under these circumstances he was willing to give the bill his vote, and at the same time he would say that if the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] or any other Senator, should introduce a resolution to inquire whether it was necessary to keep up these mints, he should also vote for it. He had conscientiously opposed these branch mints at the beginning. He believed that strong arguments could be adduced to show that there should be no other mint besides the one at Philadelphia. He should, however, vote for the bill, and if any gentleman would offer a resolution of inquiry, he would vote for it, also, and regulate his subsequent votes, in relation to the subject, by the information that might be thus elicited.

After some further remarks from Mr. PRESTON,

Mr. BROWN said he would quote one or two facts having an important bearing on the subject. The gentleman had been quoting from the official documents of 1838, by which it appeared that the coinage at these mints had been less in amount than the returns for the last year exhibited. Now the official documents received this session, represented the coinage of the North Carolina branch mint at $162,767 50, and that of the Georgia branch at $128,880, in gold, making together the sum of $291,647 50. He saw in the appropriation bill for the present year, only twelve thousand dollars appropriated for the branch mint at Charlotte, North Carolina, and eleven thousand five hundred for the branch in Georgia. The sums appropriated last year were, he presumed, greater, in consequence of some expense to complete these establishments, which would not be hereafter required. Thus, sir, we have had a coinage at these mints of near $300,000 within the last year, and yet this is considered by gentlemen a very small matter, too trifling to justify the expense of keeping up these mints. Why in Philadelphia, by the failure of a single individual, the community had lost about two hundred thousand dollars, by the worthless shinplasters which he had put in circulation, and never redeemed. Mr. B. then took a view of the great saving to the people of the South, which would be effected by having a sufficient supply of small change. The gentleman, in speaking of the State of North Carolina, understood him to say that that State had always had a larger paper circulation than any other State. This was not so. North Carolina, in proportion to her population, had a smaller circulation of bank paper than many of her sister States. There was no state in which there were fewer small notes in circulation, and none which had a greater proportion of silver change in circulation, having prohibited by law the issuing of notes of a less denomination than three dollars. The gentleman from South Carolina responded very promptly to the suggestion of his friend from Kentucky. Sell out the branch mints, he says. What, sir, sell out these mints when they are supplying an annual coinage of near $300,000? And who shall we sell them out to? To some bank corporation he supposed, or shaving establishment, to manufacture shinplasters in. This might suit the views of the gentlemen who opposed this bill; but it would not be so well received by the people at large.

Mr. PRESTON said he was not so much frightened by this cry of "shinplasters," by which a certain party in this country always attempted to answer the arguments used against them. He had showed that these mints cost twenty per cent. on the amount coined, and the answer of the gentleman from North Carolina was, "shinplasters!" When we speak of defaulters running off to Europe with the public money in their pockets, the answer is, "shinplasters." Gentlemen have their imaginations tortured to death with these phantoms of paper currency shinplasters, and they conjure them up on all occasions, without sense or reason. When it is asked if these mints had added to the specie circulation of the country, it is answered, No—but, "shinplasters!" Have they involved an expense without an equivalent? Yes—but, "shinplasters." Have they added to the Government patronage? Oh, yes; but, "shinplasters." The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BROWN] says that his State is free from the circulation of shinplasters, and had smaller paper circulation than her sister States, in proportion to her population. He begged leave to differ in opinion with the gentleman on this subject. The notes of the North Carolina banks were pushed into the adjacent States, and were known as far as Georgia. With regard to the proposition he submitted, he had no other object in view but the public good. He thought that the portion of the property of this country which had been invested in these mints was unprofitably employed, and he was not disposed, in consequence of a mere party slang, or a dread of bank paper, to impair the interests of the country by suffering it to remain so.

Mr. BROWN would say a few words in reply to the very temperate lecture of the gentleman from South Carolina. He regretted that the sensibilities of the Senator should be excited on this subject, whether by any remarks made by him casually in the course of the debate, or by the mere mention of the odious subject of a metallic currency, he should not undertake to determine. The gentleman, driven from the ground of his argument, driven from the positions he attempted in vain to establish, had endeavored to retreat, under a display of wit, and by ringing all the various changes upon the word "shinplasters." The gentleman possessed considerable powers as an orator and a writer, and he doubtless possessed musical and poetical talents of a high order. Now, he would recommend to the gentleman to turn these words into poetry, and set them to music, and he would then be able to give them more effect, when he wanted to display his wit at the expense of a metalic currency.

At a warmer period of the year, when the sun poured down its burning rays with baleful influence, he had heard of the prevalence of a disease called the hydrophobia, the characteristic of which was that both men and animals, when afflicted with it, were seized with a dread of water. Now, from witnessing the sensibilities of some gentlemen whenever the subject of a metallic currency was introduced, he should suppose that there was such a disease as the specie-phobia, and that those suffering under it are seized with a horror of gold and silver. Whenever it is proposed to adopt measures for increasing the supply of the gold and silver coinage, we are answered with the cry of "gold humbug." When we speak of the abuses of the banking system, and wish to counteract the effects of the bloated paper system, we are answered with the same cry of "gold humbug." When we are called on to prevent the banks from getting absolute supremacy over the affairs of the country, we are again answered with the magical cry of "gold humbug." There was a potency in this phrase that overcame all arguments in the estimation of honorable gentlemen; and he would now recommend to the gentleman from South Carolina, when he is setting his favorite song of "shinplasters" to music, that he will introduce the no less captivating phrase of "gold humbug" in the measure.

But the gentleman said that he did not introduce party politics into the discussion. Did I not, continued Mr. B. hear the words "gold humbug" used from the other side of the chamber? And have I not heard this slang, designed to dupe the ignorant and mislead the unwary, rung again and again, whenever any measure is in agitation to improve the currency of the country? But the gentleman had no design to introduce party politics into the discussion; his soul rises above every consideration connected with party feeling. Nothing of this sort was on his mind when he reminded us of those leg sub-treasurers who have absconded with large sums of the public money. But had the gentleman forgotten that within a very few days past, a bank sub-treasurer in a neighboring city (Richmond) has run off with half a million of dollars? Has he forgotten that other paper sub-treasurers have, in other parts of the country, very recently done the same thing? But when we talk of infusing a greater quantity of metallic currency into the circulation of the country, and preventing the banks from using the revenues of the Government to swell out their issues, we are met with such arguments as "gold humbug," "leg sub-treasurers," and other such phrases so common in the political vocabulary of a certain party.

But, said Mr. B. there was another word which the gentleman had eloquently harped upon, and he thanked him for it. That word was economy. He hoped that they would hereafter give a practical evidence of the sincerity of their professions in regard to economy. He had seen gentlemen voting for near half a million of dollars for books to supply themselves, and furnish profitable jobs to their political partisans, in the course of the last six or eight years; and yet they cannot vote this trifling expense for an object calculated to promote the convenience and interest of the people. When he came to reflect on this, he could not avoid coming to the conclusion, that gentlemen who were so fond of supplying themselves with books, at the public expense, were friends of the paper system out and out. The gentlemen talked about selling out these branch mints, and no doubt they were sincere. And he had no doubt, if they were set up at auction, that some bank would become the purchaser, for the purpose of flooding the country with its irredeemable paper; and we should again have some bank sub-treasurer fleeing from them with his half a million.

The question on a recommitment being taken, it was decided in the negative—ayes 11, noes 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Knight, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, and White—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Wright, and Young—27.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

DEFERRED DEBATE.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 28, 1840.

The resolutions, from the Select Committee on the assumption of State debts being under consideration, Mr. TALLMADGE addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the report. The following were his closing remarks, as reported in the Madisonian:

Mr. TALLMADGE said: Amidst the gloom and darkness by which we are surrounded, I can fancy I see the dawning of a brighter day. To those who have suffered by the folly and madness of this Administration, I would say, if my voice could reach them, be of good cheer—for the day of your political redemption draweth nigh. A few more revolutions of the moon, and the people will come to the rescue. The "Empire State" will be proud to lead the van in this great battle, if it should be assigned to her. She is already panting for the contest. Thrice has she condemned, in a voice which has reverberated from the ocean to the lakes, the destructive measures of this Administration. Thrice has she rebuked her once "favorite son," who has turned his back upon her interests, as well as the interests of the whole Union—who has raised his hand, as it were, against her who bore him—against her who cherished and nourished him, and gave to him all the consequence he enjoys—and whose overflowing kindness he has repaid by "ingratitude more strong than traitors' arms." Sir, she is tired of this Northern man with Southern principles—or rather this Northern man with no principles. She wishes to see an "honest" man at the head of this Government—one, too, who is "capable," and "faithful to the Constitution." And, let me tell the Senator from North Carolina, when she speaks a fourth time, it will be in a voice of thunder, in favor of the "HERO OF TIPPECANOE." The defender of his country in war, I trust he will prove her deliverer in peace. The Senator from North Carolina has given us some of his anticipations. Now, said Mr. T. let me give him some of mine. I anticipate that the 4th of March, 1841, will form an era in our political annals: that on that day, the wand of the magician will be broken: that on that day, he will retire to the peaceful shades of his own native village, heralded by the lamentations of those whom his administration has broken down and ruined. But he will not be forgotten in his retirement. The efforts of our waning commerce, of our ruined manufactures, of our suspended improvements, and of our unrewarded labor, will stand as lasting monuments of the imbecility and destructiveness of his administration; whilst the widows' and the orphans' tears, whose husbands and whose fathers have been sent to untimely graves, will rescue his memory from that oblivion to which the interests and the honor of the country would consign it!

Mr. STRANGE said: I should not have troubled the Senate, Mr. President, had not the Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] done me the honor to notice some of my remarks made on yesterday, perverting them to a far different sense from that in which they were used by me. He was pleased to suppose that I had some sarcastic allusion to the entertainments given to the President during his tour, last summer, through the State of New York. These entertainments were altogether different from the Federal feasts to which I alluded. The latter seem to be given for no object but to produce effect, and act upon elections; the former were the mere rendition of courtesy and the outpouring of good feeling towards a distinguished fellow citizen, upon his return after a long absence from his native State. They were due to the man, but still more to the Chief Magistrate of the nation; and I deeply regret that the political rancor of the Federalists should have caused these public demonstrations of good feeling to be confined to one political party. Of what ingratitude to his State, on the part of Mr. Van Buren, the Senator speaks, I am at a loss to understand. Does he mean to complain that he has administered the affairs of the General Government according to his sense of the true interests of the great body of the nation, and not in reference to the local interests and peculiar opinions of the people of New York? That he has not betrayed the confidence reposed in him by the whole American people by providing mainly for that State with which his own personal fortune and that of his kindred is identified? This I understand to be the complaint, and I must say it is just such an one as I should have expected, not from the personal, but from the political character of the Senator. And as for the word "traitor," which the Senator has seen fit to apply to the President of the United States, I wonder that the utterance of it does not palsy his tongue.

Mr. TALLMADGE was proceeding with some warmth of language to reply, when

Mr. HENDERSON rose, and expressed a hope that the VICE PRESIDENT would interfere, and preserve the order of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT said, that as presiding officer of the body, he considered it was his duty to use all his influence, and all the means in his power, to preserve order in debate, and to sustain the dignity of the Senate; and for this purpose, to induce Senators to abstain from personalities in discussion, which must inevitably tend to disturb the harmony of their social intercourse, which it was so desirable to preserve. For himself, he had been the object of unmerited kindness and confidence on the part of all the members of the body, for which he would take this occasion to make his acknowledgments. He had reflected upon the question, how far it was his duty to declare a member out of order for language used in regard to the President, or to any other person who was not a member of this body, which would be deemed unparliamentary if applied by one Senator to another. It had been a matter of doubt with him whether it was proper or parliamentary for him to interferfere, however severe the personal animadversions of any Senator on the Executive, might be—although he was a co-ordinate and independent branch of the Government. For this reason, therefore, he had not called the Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] to order for personal remarks applied to the President of the United States, which would have been out of order if applied to any member of the body; nor the member from North Carolina [Mr. STRANGE] who had, in fact, retorted one of the offensive epithets. But having been called upon by the appeal of the Senator from Mississippi, he felt bound to say, that, in his opinion, the course of the debate was unparliamentary and out of order. It was his duty to submit this opinion to the Senate for its consideration, and for them to act as would, in their opinion, best comport with the honor and dignity of the body. He did not consider that any injury was done to the character or standing of the President by any personal animadversions or unparliamentary language of members of this body, but he was prompted by a regard for the honor, the harmony, and the dignity of the Senate. It was with this object he had made these suggestions, and not from any personal or party bias; but he would say, that his position, which associated him politically with the President, had alone prevented him from making it a question for the Senate to decide, whether the language used by the Senator towards the President was parliamentary or not. It was very far from his desire to interfere with the freedom of discussion, nor could he interfere with it, even if disposed to do so; and he wished it to be distinctly understood, that no language could be used, however strong or harsh, when applied politically, and not personally, which would justify his interference. He had always confided to the high sense of dignity and decorum which characterized the members of the body as the best preservative of order, and his confidence had not been in vain.

Mr. TALLMADGE then made some remarks explanatory of the phrase excepted to, which he said was a quotation from Shakspeare. He intimated, in reply to Mr. STRANGE, that the reason why the indications of respect towards the President in the State of New York, at the time referred to, were confined to one party, rested upon the President himself, ascribing it to his addressing himself, on his arrival at the Battery, to his "Democratic fellow-citizens."

Mr. STRANGE said he was glad the Senator from New York had introduced this topic, as it afforded him an opportunity to bear his testimony to the great unfairness with which the President had been treated on this subject, and altogether for political effect. Almost as soon as it was known that the President intended to visit New York, there were murmurings in the Whig ranks that there would be no enthusiasm in his reception; that it would be cold, and confined to a few office holders and devoted partisans. His response at the Battery, to the address made him, was seized upon as a pretext to execute what had been long predetermined. It was said he had avowed himself the President of a party, by responding to his "Democratic" fellow citizens. Had any other class of citizens addressed him, and thus entitled themselves to a response? Did not the orator who addressed him speak in behalf, of his 'Democratic fellow-citizens?" Was the President to deny to the orator the character he had assumed? And, if allowing him the character, could he do otherwise than respond to it? Suppose an orator had addressed him in behalf of his Masonic fellow-citizens: could the President do otherwise than respond to his Masonic fellow-citizens? If his Whig fellow-citizens really designed to show respect to the President, would they not have selected an orator to address him, or have united with the Democracy in the selection of a common spokesman? Not having done either of these, could they reasonably expect a response addressed to them from one to whom they had said nothing? The expectation would have been unreasonable. It was never entertained; and an event which every one must have foreseen has been spoken of with affected amazement, and perverted to the injury of one who does honor to his State and country, for party purposes.

Mr. WRIGHT rose and said:

Mr. President, I cannot but feel the remarks which have fallen from the Chair as implying a reproof upon myself; a reproof, sir, I know, not intended, but necessarily following from the discharge of that unpleasant duty which the Chair has felt itself left to perform, to protect the absent from the consequences of language used in debate in the Senate. As a personal and political friend of the President of the United States I thank you, sir, for the manifestation of friendly feeling towards that officer, which you have now given; and my self-reproach arises from the conviction that you must have felt it to be much more the duty of the friends of that individual upon this floor, than of yourself, to interpose that interference, against harsh and unparliamentary remarks aimed at him, which you have found yourself constrained to make. As a Senator from the same State from which the President comes, you must have considered it my especial duty to shield him from such assaults emanating from a Senator from his own State.

I may, sir, have mistaken my duty. I have not been insensible to the delicacy of my position. Had my own feelings permitted that insensibility, the best of friends to the President and myself here have not suffered me to rest in unconsciousness of the impressions produced upon others. They have given me repeated admonitions, while these remarks have been in the course of utterance, that it was my imperious duty to correct the errors, and repel the imputations, with which they were so plentifully interspersed.

Even against these strong exterior influences, and, I must be permitted to say, against the stronger impulses of my own feelings towards a most valued, and esteemed, and abused friend, I must confess, Mr. President, I had made up my mind to preserve perfect silence. Your interference has unsealed my lips, and I now owe it to the Senate, to the respectable auditory present, and to the country, to explain the grounds upon which my determination to be silent was rested.

I doubt not, sir, that I treated the debate, in my own mind, too much as a State matter, as the course of remark of the speaker was calculated to induce me to do. In that sense I felt a confidence which amounted to unconcern. I could not bring myself to believe that the individual who now occupies the Presidential chair required defence from accusations made in the tone and temper to which the Senate was compelled to listen, and resting upon the authority which brought them before the body. The standing, and character, and public course of the President, during a long life of public services, were too well known to me to permit me to feel alarm for his personal or public reputation. Hence my determination to preserve silence, as his friend.

This occasion calls also for an explanation as to my own course. I need not ask the Senate to witness for me the reluctance I have manifested here, upon all occasions, to enter into these angry discussions with my colleague. That reluctance has become so evident to himself, that it has been made matter of charge against me upon this floor, and he calls it lecturing him upon forbearance, good temper, and good feeling. There are limits beyond which even such lectures should not be delivered; and I cannot disguise from myself that that limit, as between that Senator and me, is nearer than even he may suspect.

I shall not, however, follow him now a single step. My original purpose as to him, so far as this debate is concerned, shall be fully and faithfully preserved. I have not risen to reply to him, but to justify myself to you, sir, and to the body. You referred in your remarks to the epithet of traitor applied by him to the President. He answers by saying that the words were not his, but a quotation from Shakspeare. How far he can exempt himself from your strictures by such an apology, I am not disposed to examine. How far an ingenuous mind would feel relieved, after having applied offensive and unmerited epithets towards an individual, epithets confessed to be unmerited, by the apology that the words were quoted, and not original with the speaker, I will not inquire. It is enough for me to know and feel that I would never make such an apology for such an offence, where personal or public character and honor are concerned.

There was one other remark, sir, which you did not notice, and which I thought not less exceptionable. It related to the statement of a fact in the last annual message of the President, and the charge was that the statement was untrue, and that the President knew it to be untrue. Here, however, Mr. President, there was an apology for the assertion, by the way of a qualification to it; and what was that? It was that if the President did not know his statement to be untrue, he proved himself disqualified for the station he holds by making it. My reply to this omission of yours, sir, is, that when the President of the United States shall be under the necessity of appealing to the source of these remarks, either to establish his character for truth, or his capacity for his present office, he will be beyond my reach for defence or justification.

Will you, Mr. President, permit me to address one word to you in conclusion? I pretend to no learning in the rules and orders of a legislative assembly; but when the President of the United States shall be concerned, and my colleague shall be the accuser, I entreat of you, so far as you can possibly make it consistent with your sense of the duties of your position, not to interfere upon any future occasion. Leave to the friends of the President here his protection from assaults of this character and from that quarter.

The VICE PRESIDENT asked leave to submit a single remark. Although he was decidedly of the impression that it was unparliamentary and out of order to make personal attacks on the President of the United States, in debate, as having a tendency to bring members into collision, and produce criminations and recrimination, he should not hereafter feel it his duty to call any member to order, whatever might be the character of his remarks. He had discharged what he had considered to be his duty in submitting the subject to the consideration of the members of the Senate, who were equally interested in the preservation of its decorum and harmony. In answer to the suggestion that the rules of the Senate should not interfere with the freedom and latitude of debate, he would state that he fully coincided in the sentiment, and members might, if they thought proper, resort to the Greek, the Latin, the French, or the English, for phrases to add to the pungency or strength of their animadversions, and however harsh they might be, he would not interfere. In his opinion, however, it was of very little importance, when you inflicted a stab on the person or reputation of your neighbor, whether you inflicted it with your own weapon, or one borrowed for the purpose from another. In speaking of measures whose tendencies were despotic and tyrannical, no language would be objected to by him on account of its harshness. His principal, and his only object was to prevent personalities, which must always tend, in a greater or less degree, to produce disorder and unpleasant feelings among the members.

CUMBERLAND ROAD BILL.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 31, 1840.

The bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road, in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was taken up for consideration; and the question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. CLAY of Alabama to strike out the two per cent. clause,

Mr. WRIGHT said he did not rise to debate the merits of the Cumberland Road bill. That duty he left to those who, from local position and more extensive acquaintance with the utility of the work, could better discharge it. Still he had, for some years now last past, given his vote for these appropriations, and he desired to do so now. He was anxious that the bill should retain its usual form, the characteristics which had distinguished appropriations for this road from those for internal improvements generally. This work was thus distinguished, from the peculiar circumstances which had led Congress to undertake it, and appropriations to continue it could have his support only upon the conditions that these distinctions were carefully and fully preserved.

From these remarks it would be seen that his object was to discuss, not the general merits of the bill, but the particular motion of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY.] If that motion prevailed, the bill would be placed beyond the reach of his vote, and, as he had learned, of the votes of several other Senators. He hoped the motion would not prevail, and he must ask a small portion of the time of the body for an attempt to show to the friends of the measure that it should not prevail.

What was the motion? It was to strike out from the bill the following words:

"Which said appropriations are made upon the same terms, and shall be subject to all the provisions, conditions, restrictions, and limitations, touching appropriations for the Cumberland road, contained in the act entitled 'An act to provide for continuing the construction, and for the repair of the Cumberland road,' approved the third day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven."

A reference to the act of 1837 would show the effect of this proposed amendment, by showing the "provisions, conditions, restrictions and limitations" contained in that act, subject to which the bill, in its present shape, proposes to make these appropriations, but from which the amendment, if adopted, will free them, and leave the appropriations open, general, and unconditional. He was satisfied, too, that this examination would prove that the proposition to amend was even broader than the honorable mover intended or desired; that there were "conditions and limitations" in that act, which even he did not desire to remove; from which he would not wish to relieve these appropriations, in case they were to be made.

What, then, were the "conditions, restrictions, and limitations" in the act of 1837, referred to?

The first was found in the 1st section of the act, in the following words:

"That the said road within the State of Illinois shall not be stoned or gravelled, unless it can be done at a cost not greater than the average cost of stoning or gravelling said road within the States of Ohio and Indiana."

This, he presumed, was a "limitation" which the honorable mover of the amendment, and those who would vote with him, did not desire to repeal.

The second was in the same section, and in the following words:

"That in all cases where it can be done, it shall be the duty of the superintending officers to cause the work on said road to be laid off in sections, and let out to the lowest substantial bidders, after due notice."

Here, again, was a "restriction" which he did not suppose the opponents of the bill would be anxious to remove.

The third "condition" was found in the 2d section of this act of 1837, in the following words:

"That the second section of an act for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, approved the 2d day of July, 1836, shall not be applicable to expenditures hereafter to be made on said road."

The section of the act of 1836 here referred to, requires that the moneys appropriated shall be so expended as to complete the greatest possible continuous portions of the road, "so that such finished parts thereof may be surrendered to the said States respectively." Should the amendment prevail, this section of the act of 1836 would be again restored and made one of the "limitations" upon these appropriations, from which the 2d section of the act of 1837 had relieved them. This would be in no way objectionable to him, though he supposed it would be to the more immediate friends of the work, inasmuch as the limitation, having been imposed in 1836, had been removed in 1837, at their instance.

These were the "conditions, restrictions, and limitations," which he supposed the honorable mover of the amendment had not considered, and some of which, at least, he presumed he would not desire to remove. He felt sure that some other Senators would be unwilling to part with the first two, as he well recollected they had been inserted in the act of 1837, after a severe struggle, and were then relied upon, by the honorable Senator who moved them, [Mr. CLAY of Kentucky,] and those who acted with him, as highly essential.

Yet it was not his object to discuss these points. He had simply referred to them, that Senators might not, unwittingly, adopt an amendment which should relieve these appropriations from conditions and limitations to which they had, upon former occasions, been strongly attached.

He was aware that the honorable mover of the amendment had another object, viz.—to get rid of the 4th section of the act of 1837, which was in the following words:

"That the several sums hereby appropriated for the construction of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, shall be replaced by said States respectively out of the fund reserved to each for laying out and making roads under the direction of Congress, by the several acts passed for the admission of said States into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States."

This is the real point of controversy involved in the amendment; this the "condition" which it is the object of the honorable mover to test by a vote; and this is the distinctive feature of these appropriations, which he (Mr. W.) wished to retain. To this point, therefore, this two per cent. fund, and the propriety of continuing to pledge these appropriations upon it, he should direct his remarks. He would be as brief as possible; but an examination of the origin of that fund, of the appropriations for the Cumberland road, and the present state of facts as to both, would be necessary to make his argument clear and intelligible.

The cession by the State of Virginia to the United States of the territory northwest of the river Ohio, contained, among others, the condition, that of that territory there should be formed not less than three, nor more than five, free Republican States, which under certain limitations prescribed, should be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing in all respects with the original States.

The State of Ohio first made application for this admission, and, on the 30th day of April, 1802, Congress passed an act entitled "An act to enable the people of the eastern division of the territory northwest of the river Ohio to form a Constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes." Among other provisions in this act, Congress, by the 7th section thereof, offered to the convention of the people of Ohio, "for their free acceptance or rejection," three several propositions, intended for the mutual benefit of the State and the United States, and declared that, if accepted by the convention, they "shall be obligatory upon the United States." The third of these propositions is the one material to this discussion, and is in the following words:

"Third. That one-twentieth part of the nett proceeds of the lands lying within the said State, sold by Congress, from and after the thirtieth day of June next, (1802,) after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be applied to the laying out and making public roads, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same; such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the said road shall pass. Provided, always, That the three foregoing propositions herein offered are on the conditions that the convention of the said State shall provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that every and each tract of land sold by Congress, from and after the thirtieth day of June next, shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under the authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years, from and after the day of sale."

Here was a compact between this new State and this Goverment, for the convention of Ohio did freely accept the propositions and conform to their terms and requirements; and here was the compact which gave existence to THE CUMBERLAND ROAD, and threw it upon the hands of the United States.

A single step further will show the origin of the two per cent. fund, as contradistinguished from that five per cent. fund, or "one twentieth part of the nett proceeds of the lands," constituted by the compact last referred to, and devoted to the construction of roads from the Atlantic waters "to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same."

On the 3d day of March, 1803, about eleven months after the passage of the act containing the propositions tendered to the convention of the people of Ohio, and which propositions that convention accepted and complied with, Congress passed an act, entitled "An act in addition to, and in modification of, the propositions contained in the act entitled," &c. being the act of the 30th of April, 1802, before referred to. This act conferred upon the new State, many other and further advantages, beyond those covered by the three propositions tendered to the convention in the former act; but the only one of its provisions affecting this discussion is that found in its second section. It was unnecessary to read the section, which was long. The substance of it was, that three per cent. of the five per cent. reserved in the ordinance which has been read, was directed to be paid over to the State, to be applied "to the laying out, opening and making roads within the said State, and to no other purpose whatever;" thus leaving but two per cent. of the nett proceeds of the lands to be expended "under the authority of Congress," in "laying out and making public roads leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same. This act constituted the two per cent. fund, by taking from the hands of Congress, and giving to the State for expenditure, three per cent. of the five reserved to Congress by the original ordinance.

Still the obligation upon Congress remained of expending the two per cent. in the "laying out and making public roads, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same;" and to discharge that obligation, this great, and troublesome, and expensive work, the Cumberland road, was commenced.

The chronological order of events would here call upon him to examine the first appropriations for the road; but he thought he should be able to accomplish the task he had undertaken with greater brevity, and make himself more perfectly understood, by following first the admission of the States, as far as that should be necessary for the question presented.

The next free Republican State admitted into the Union from the territory northwest of the Ohio, was Indiana, and the act of Congress for her admission was approved on the 19th day of April, 1816. The course pursued by Congress was very similar to that finally adopted with the State of Ohio, and it will not, therefore, be necessary to detain the Senate by the reading of either of the propositions submitted to the convention of the people of this State. It will suffice to say that, upon this point, they varied from the original propositions submitted to the convention of Ohio in three particulars, viz:

1. Two per cent. of the nett proceeds of the lands only are reserved to be expended under the authority of Congress, and that fund is to be expended in laying out and making roads to, and not through the State.

2. Three per cent. is reserved in the ordinance for and to be paid to the State.

3. The three per cent. is to be expended by the State in making roads, or canals, within it.

In all other substantial particulars the compact with Indiana was similar to that with Ohio.

The State of Illinois came next in the order of admission, the act of Congress for the purpose having been approved on the 18th of April, 1818. The compacts with this State differed, in some respects, from both the former, but a short statement should relieve the Senate from reading the propositions, which were long.

1. The two per cent. fund is reserved, as in the case of Indiana, to make roads to, not through, the State; but, as in the other two cases, is to be expended for that purpose, "under the direction of Congress."

2. The three per cent. is reserved for, and to be paid to, the State, but is to be "appropriated, by the Legislature of the State, for the encouragement of learning, of which one-sixth part shall be exclusively bestowed on a College or University."

3. The equivalents are an exemption of military bounty lands from taxation for three years after patents issue, if they continue to be the property of the patentee, or his heirs, and a stipulation that lands belonging to citizens of the United States not residing in the State, shall never be taxed higher than the lands of resident citizens, in addition to the exemption from taxes of all Goverment lands for five years after a sale.

Two remarks seemed to be called for from the compacts with the last two named States. The first was that the two per cent. fund, to be expended "by the authority of Congress," or "under the direction of Congress," was reserved in both. The second was, that the three per cent. reserved for, and to be paid to, the State, was not reserved, in the last two cases, with any reference to the continuation of any road "leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic," to either of the said States, and consequently not to the Cumberland road, because, as to Indiana, the fund might be applied to the making of roads or canals, within the State, at its option; and as to Illinois, the Legislature was compelled, by the very terms of the ordinance, to apply it "for the encouragement of learning." The two per cent. fund, therefore, was relied upon for the roads mentioned in the various ordinances, to be made under the direction of Congress, whether they were to be continued to or through the States which were parties, and not the three per cent. which was reserved for the States, was to be expended by them, at their pleasure, or for works or objects of a character different from these roads.

He was now prepared to go back, in point of time, and examine the appropriations for the Cumberland road, to see how far the action of Congress hitherto had conformed to the basis of these appropriations laid in the ordinances which admitted the three States into the Union.

On the 29th of March, 1806, the President of the States [Mr. JEFFERSON] approved an act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio." This act gave existence to the Cumberland road, and an examination of its provisions will show, what its title so well imports, that it was an earnest beginning of the fulfilment, on the part of the United States, of that compact with the new State of Ohio which has been before recited; that it was the commencement of a road, "leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State." It was not material for his purpose to review the provisions of the act any further than to examine the appropriating section, and see whether it kept to the terms of the ordinances, and to the fund thereby reserved for the object. The sixth section of the act was this one, and was in the following words:

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the sum of thirty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated to defray the expense of laying out and making said road. And the President is hereby authorized to draw, from time to time, on the Treasury, for such parts, or at any one time, for the whole of said sum, as he shall judge the service requires. Which sum of thirty thousand dollars shall be paid, first, out of the fund of two per cent. reserved for laying out and making roads to the State of Ohio, by virtue of the seventh section of an act passed on the thirtieth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and two, entitled 'An act to enable the people of the Eastern division of the territory northwest of the river Ohio to form a Constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes;' three per cent. of the appropriation contained in the said seventh section, being directed by a subsequent law to the laying out, opening, and making roads within the said State of Ohio. And secondly, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, chargeable upon, and reimbursable at, the Treasury, by said fund of two per cent. as the same shall accrue."

Here we are shown fully the origin of this work, called the Cumberland road, the basis upon which its adoption by Congress rested, and the fund from which the expenditures were to be defrayed. In every respect the work was peculiar, as a work of internal improvement prosecuted by the authority and under the direction of Congress.

This very first act, too, as its terms fully show, adopted the principle of anticipating the avails of this two per cent. fund, by a general appropriation from the Treasury, charged upon the fund, and to be reimburseable out of it. It was not necessary for him to defend the wisdom of this policy at that early day. It was sufficient that it was then adopted, and was one of the expositions, by the then fathers, of the powers and duties of Congress growing out of these new and peculiar compacts with the new States. It was too late for him now to question the soundness of the principles upon which they acted, or the wisdom of the policy which guided their course. Nearly every Congress, from 1806 to the present time, had followed in their footsteps, and every President of the United States, from Mr. Jefferson to the present incumbent, had approved bills appropriating money for this road.

Had these bills followed the form of appropriation found in the law of 1806 above quoted? He had taken great pains to answer this inquiry correctly and truly, and, with two single exceptions, upon which he would particularly remark, he believed that every appropriation for the survey and construction of the road had been expressly, in the law making it, charged upon the two per cent. fund, and made reimburseable out of it. He had found some bills appropriating money for the repairs of those portions of the road which had been once called completed, which did not contain this pledge, as he thought they should not. These were mere appropriations for the preservation and security of the property of the United States, as this road when finished clearly was, until transferred to the States, or otherwise disposed of. It was It was barely possible that there might be some further exception of appropriations for survey and construction, but he could not think there were, as he had intended to make his examination full and accurate.

How, then, did the two exceptions stand? The first is an act of Congress, approved on the 15th of May, 1820, when Mr. Monroe was President. It is peculiar in itself, and perhaps ought not to be considered an exception to the rule under discussion. Its title is, "An act to authorize the appointment of commissioners to lay out the road therein mentioned." This will show that the whole object of the act was a survey. The act has a preamble, which is in these words: "Whereas, by the continuation of the Cumberland road from Wheeling, in the State of Virginia, through the States of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, the lands of the United States may become more valuable," thus placing the legislation upon a ground separate from and independent of the compacts with the States and the fund therein provided. The act then goes on to provide for the survey of a road from Wheeling to some point on the left bank of the Mississippi river, between St. Louis and the mouth of the Illinois river, and appropriates ten thousand dollars generally, to be paid out of any unappropriated money in the Treasury, to defray the expense of the survey. The 2d section of this act contains this emphatic proviso:

"Provided always, and it is hereby enacted and declared, That nothing in this act contained, or that shall be done in pursuance thereof, shall be deemed or construed to imply any obligation on the part of the United States to make, or to defray the expense of making, the road hereby authorized to be laid out, or of any part thereof."

Such was the first exception he had been able to discover, and he remarked again, that it was very doubtful how far it could fairly be considered an exception, within the proper limits of the discussion. The act was certainly sui generis, as a piece of legislation relating to the Cumberland road; but such as it was, he had felt bound to present it as an exception to the rule for which he was contending.

The second, and only other exception, which his research had enabled him to discover, was a bill approved on the 2d of March, 1833, at the close of General Jackson's first term. This was a plain case of departure from the rule of charging these appropriations upon the two per cent. fund, as the appropriations made in this law for continuing the construction of the road in the three States, separate from the appropriations for repairs, were direct in manner and heavy in amount He was happy, however, to be able to destroy the force of this exception as a precedent, upon the authority of the then President himself. He spoke from personal information from that distinguished individual, when he said that his approbation of that bill was an oversight, suffered in the hurry of business, at the close of a short session of Congress, when all who have been here know that a great majority of the bills of the session go to the President during the last evening. All who were here at the session of 1832, '3, will remember that it was one of the most exciting periods of our history, and that an unusual number of bills, of the deepest interest, finally passed the two Houses, and reached the President, within the last few hours of the session, which closed with Saturday, the 2d of March.

An examination of this bill will present a further and strong apology for the oversight of the President. Instead of being the usual and ordinary appropriation bill for the Cumberland road, it is an appropriation bill of an anomalous character, coupling harbors, rivers, roads, and a variety of other subjects in the same bill. Its title is a very imperfect index of its contents, and yet it is evidently made up of the substance of the titles of three or four originally independent bills. It is "An act making appropriations for carrying on certain works heretofore commenced, for the improvement of harbors and rivers; and also for continuing and repairing the Cumberland road, and certain Territorial roads." It embraces more than thirty separate and independent appropriations, which take from the Treasury more than one million of dollars. In such a bill, and reaching the President at such a period, it was not in the least surprising to him that the absence of this qualification to the Cumberland road appropriations was not noticed.

Still, whether the apology should be deemed sufficient or not, he was able to state the fact that this omission was not noticed, and that the bill would not have received the approbation of the then President, however important these and the other appropriations it contained, if the omission had been observed. So important did he consider the retention of the two per cent. clause, as it is called, as a principle upon which the appropriations for this road rest, and a marked characteristic to distinguish them from open and unrestricted appropriations for internal improvements.

He was aware it had been said, and would again be said, that the expenditures already made upon the road had more than consumed the two per cent. fund reserved and applicable to its construction, and therefore that the clause in the present bills was wholly useless. He wished to meet this objection to the clause, as he did all other points of this argument, fairly. He was therefore willing to admit that he did not expect the two per cent. fund of the three States would be sufficient to reimburse the Treasury for all past expenses upon this work; but that did not, to him, constitute a good reason for separating this essential feature from the bill, and passing it without it. The practice commenced with the commencement of the work, to anticipate the moneys which this fund was to yield, and if those anticipations had been pushed too far, it was no reason, to his mind, why we should abandon our hold upon that portion of the fund which remains.

All the three States yet embrace within their limits unsold lands, and consequently portions of this fund are yet to be collected from all. The amount too is considerable. He had been favored with an official statement from the General Land Office, brought down to the close of the third quarter of the last year, which showed that the unsold lands in the State of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, at that time, amounted to 26,835,234 acres. Even at the present minimum price of the public lands, the two per cent. from this quantity would, if he had made no error in the calculation, yield to this fund more than $670,000. If, as some suppose, the State of Missouri should be embraced in the estimate of future revenue to the fund, it would be more than doubled. There are 32,154,897 acres of unsold land in that State, and at the minimum price, that quantity will pay more than $800,000 to this fund. But when it is considered that the unsold land in all these States must become more valuable as settlements increase, and improvements in its vicinity are extended, who shall say what limit shall be fixed to this contingent fund? In any event it seemed to him a plain dictate of duty to secure whatever it is to yield to yield to reimburse the Treasury for this expensive work.

Shall we do this, if we pass the amendment now proposed, and thus, by our own act, release the pledge for the future? What is our daily experience now as to the other States? But a few days since the Senate passed a bill to pay this fund to the State of Mississippi. Another bill is now upon its passage, or has already gone to the House of Representatives, to make the same payment to the State of Alabama. These States have come here with demands for the money which we have not found ourselves able to resist. To Michigan and Arkansas, the whole five per cent. was yielded as one of the terms of their admission into the Union. Other new States will come, after these examples, and who can make himself believe that, if we strike out this clause, and thus release our hold upon the future accruing revenue to the fund from the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, those States will not come, when their road shall have been completed, and tell us, up to 1840, you held and expended this portion of our two per cent. fund, but in that year you, by your own express act, refused longer to pledge it for the Cumberland road, and the money which has come into your Treasury, since that period, is ours, upon the principles which have governed your conduct towards the other new States? Who can convince himself that our successors will be able to resist such an application from these States?

To the unconditional opponents of this bill, he was aware that this reasoning would be unavailing; nay, that his very declaration of the importance of the provision to him would add to their anxiety to press the motion, that they might force him and others, who held similar opinions, to vote against the whole measure. Such he knew to be the condition of the honorable mover of the amendment. He was conscientiously opposed to the bill in any shape; and its defeat is the object of his motion. This was fair, and gave no ground of complaint. Any fair and open and manly opposition he had a right to practise; indeed, with his opinions, it was his duty to practise, and such was his present proposition for amendment.

To those, however, who were the friends of this road, who desired appropriations for it, he felt that he had a right to appeal with success upon this question. To them the pledge of this fund could not be objectionable, even if they did not consider it any longer useful. It could do no harm, if it was of no substantial service to the Treasury, and they certainly would indulge those who consider it essential, so long as they ask nothing more than what is looked upon as a nugatory provision. They will not bring the fate of the bill into jeopardy, rather than not discharge it from what they consider, at the worst, but harmless surplusage, and that, too, after they know that others, equally friendly, consider the provision proposed to be stricken out, one of essential, of vital importance.

He must be permitted to believe, therefore, that however far he may have fallen short of producing conviction upon the minds of either the foes or the friends of the measure, as to the importance of retaining the pledge of this two per cent. fund, the simple information that he and others so held it, would induce every friend to the Cumberland road to vote against the proposed amendment.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama claimed the indulgence of the Senate, that he might reply to some of the remarks which had fallen from the Senator from New York. He said the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT] with that adroitness for which he was distinguished in debate, had called the attention of the Senate to other conditions contained in the act of March 3d, 1837, than that which had been the chief subject of his (Mr. C's) remarks, in the previous part of this discussion, the benefit of which he said would be lost if the amendment prevailed. Seizing upon those other conditions and limitations which no one, who had before participated in the debate, had deemed of sufficient importance to be noticed, the Senator had apparently endeavored to deter other gentlemen from supporting the amendment, by remarking with portentous solemnity, that it went much farther than the mover (Mr. C) or others supposed. Mr. C. said, so far as related to himself, the Senator from New York was wholly mistaken—he knew perfectly all the conditions and limitations in the act referred to, and he presumed other gentlemen were not so uninformed as seemed to be supposed. He said the difficulty, suggested by the gentleman, was not so embarrassing or formidable as he seemed to imagine, as he would presently show.

Mr. C. said the most obnoxious condition in the act of March 3, 1837, proposed to be revived and continued by that portion of the bill which he had moved to strike out, was that which held out to the President and the country the false idea and delusive hope that the amount appropriated was to be replaced by the said States respectively, out of the fund reserved to each for laying out and making roads, under the direction of Congress, when no Senator had asserted, or could assert, that any such fund existed, or ever would exist. The Senator from New York himself, had distinctly admitted, with his usual candor, that the whole two per cent. fund which had accrued, or ever could accrue, on the sale of lands in the four States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, was already exhausted. Mr. C. said a knowledge of this fact, and a repugnance to see a bill passed through the Senate, containing a promise of reimbursement from a mere fictitious fund, and of course deceptive and fraudulent, had induced him, as he had before explained, to move to strike it out. If an individual were to draw a bill of exchange, or check, in favor of another person, on a banker with whom he had no funds deposited, and with no pledge that it should be accepted or paid, it would be held dishonorable. The pretence that the General Government was to be reimbursed the amount of this appropriation, when we knew it could not, he said was, in principle, the same with the case he had supposed. We were taking the money of the people, and, to reimburse them, drawing in their favor on a fund upon which we know we have already overdrawn. He appealed to Senators to say whether such a course was compatible with the fairness, candor, and dignity, which should ever be manifest in the proceedings of this body.

But, sir, said Mr. C. what are the other conditions, limitations, and restrictions of the act of '37, referred to in the clause embraced by my motion? They are, "that the said road, within the State of Illinois, shall not be stoned or gravelled, unless it can be done at a cost not greater than the average cost of stoning or gravelling said road within the States of Ohio and Indiana;" and "that in all cases when it can be done, it shall be the duty of the superintending officers to cause the work on said road to be laid off in sections, and let out to the lowest substantial bidder, after due notice." The act also contains a further provision, "that the second section of an act for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, approved the 2d of July, 1836, shall not be applicable to expenditures hereafter to be made on said road." Now, sir, said Mr. C. these several provisions may be necessary and important, and I have no objection whatever to them, if the bill should pass. Neither of them comes in collision with my object; and I am perfectly willing, if the money is to be appropriated, that it shall be applied under all those restrictions, and any others the Senate may deem salutary. Mr. C. said, if his amendment prevailed, a part of the bill would merely be stricken out; and how easy would it be, if the other provisions brought to the attention of the Senate were necessary, to have them inserted. This seemed to him to obviate the supposed difficulty entirely; and none would cooperate with the Senator from New York in effectuating that object more cordially than himself. After my motion prevails, said Mr. C. and the obnoxious clause is stricken out, let him move to fill the blank with the restrictions and conditions alluded to, and he will encounter no opposition.

Mr. C. said, the Senator from New York had again brought to the attention of the Senate the several compacts between the United States and Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, which had been so often read or referred to in the course of this debate. He would not again read them, or pursue very closely the Senator's comments upon them. He certainly had not given any new views upon their proper construction, nor had he proved that, by the terms of those compacts, the General Government was bound to give those States more than the amount of the two per cent. of the nett proceeds of the public lands sold in each after their admission into the Union. On the contrary, he understood the Senator from New York to admit, distinctly, that we were bound for no more by those compacts, for laying out roads leading to the several States; and that the fund reserved for that purpose had long since been entirely exhausted.

But, Mr. C. said, the Senator had dwelt with much emphasis upon the surrender of those States, of the right to tax the lands of the United States, until five years after the day of sale. Mr. C. said, he was not accustomed to deny that such surrender of one of the rights of sovereignty by the new States (for the same had been required of, and assented to, by all of them) was a great sacrifice; nor should he on this occasion. It was true that the General Government had offered, and given to the new States, in exchange, and on the condition they would yield this right of taxing the public domain, until five years after its sale, the section numbered sixteen in every township, for the use of schools; the salt springs within them, with certain portions of the public land to aid in the use of working the same; three per cent. of the nett proceeds of public lands for making roads or canals in the States, and two per cent. for roads leading to them; two entire townships of land for the endowment and support of a seminary of learning; besides land for seats of the State Governments; but it was very questionable whether all these together would furnish an equivalent for the surrender of that single great right of sovereignty. Yet, he said, the new States had assented to these conditions, and made the several compacts, and were bound by them, however hard they might operate where the public land remained long unsold. But he thought it was not just or proper that three or four of those new States should be the continual and exclusive recipients of the national bounty and munificence. If the General Government had not been liberal enough to the new States—and Mr. C. frankly believed it had not, especially in refusing to graduate and reduce the price of the inferior qualities of land, in consequence of which they had not been sold for many years, and never would—let the Senator from New York bring in a bill to make up for all deficiencies, and placing all on an equal footing. Let Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Michigan, first be placed on an equality with the other four new States, by expending for their benefit as many millions of dollars, as had been literally poured out of the Treasury on the Cumberland road; and let your liberality be apportioned amongst the several States, in proportion to the amount which each has paid into the Treasury for public lands, and we shall have less cause to complain of injustice in your exercise of unauthorized power.

But the Senator has made the remarkable discovery that the first bill, which ever appropriated money for the Cumberland road, was approved by Mr. Jefferson, and that even that anticipated the accruement of the two per cent. fund. He then goes through the various bills making appropriations for this road, all of which, except one, anticipated the fund, and contained a clause for reimbursement out of it. The excepted bill, which wanted this clause, was approved by President Jackson; but the Senator does that distinguished patriot the justice to say that he alluded to it afterwards, and said the want of the reimbursing clause had escaped his attention, in the hurry of business, perhaps on the last night of the session, or he should have withheld his approval.

So it would have been, said Mr. C. with the long list of bills making appropriations for the same road, which the gentleman paraded before the Senate as having been approved by the same distinguished Chief Magistrate, if they had wanted the clause promising reimbursement. And so, he said, it would doubtless be with the present Chief Magistrate, if a bill were to pass for the same object, and be presented without such a clause; he, too, professing the same views of constitutional power, would feel bound to return it with his veto. To avoid this result, shall we send him a bill masked in fraud? Shall we send it to him, with the assertion on its face that the money "shall be replaced by the States respectively," out of a fund which has long ceased to exist?

Mr. C. contended that nothing favorable to the general power of making appropriations by this Government, for the construction of roads or canals within the limits of the States, was to be inferred from Mr. Jefferson's approval of the bills which had been alluded to by the Senator from New York for the construction of the Cumberland road. That venerated man never gave an opinion that any delegated power of the kind was to be found in the Constitution; all his principles were opposed to such a doctrine. The only provision of the Constitution, to which such a power could be considered incidental, Mr. C. said was to be found in the last paragraph of the 3d section of the 4th article, which declared: "the Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." This, with the exemption of the domain of the United States from taxation, justified the clause to be found in each of the compacts with the new States, upon their admission—that 5 per cent. of the nett proceeds of the public lands, afterwards sold, should be applied toward making roads within, and leading to, the States. It is very obvious that the construction of such roads would encourage and facilitate emigration, and accelerate the sale of the public domain; it might almost be regarded as proper on the same principle that required the lands to be surveyed, and designated by sections, townships and ranges. Mr. C. said he could suppose this a very justifiable and expedient exercise of power, whilst the public domain was a wilderness, and the means of access to individual enterprise very difficult, or altogether impossible; but when those States had been settled from twenty to forty years, were in a high state of cultivation and improvement, with millions of inhabitants, and with numerous roads leading to and through them, how could it longer be pretended to have any necessary connection with the settlement of the country, or the sale of the public lands?

Mr. C. said the Senator from New York had also urged, as an objection to his motion, that, by striking out the clause of the bill, as proposed, we should release the two per cent. fund. He said the gentleman might dismiss his apprehensions on that score, when it had been, again and again, shown that we had already appropriated money, and taken liens on the fund, to the amount of more than four millions above the largest sum that could ever possibly accue. And the Senator from New York asks, what was the objection to this clause, with those who would vote for the bill without it? Mr. C. expressed his surprise at this question. He asked, in turn, is it no objection to a bill, which is to be sent to the President, to tell him, in effect, that this money is due by the compacts with Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, and that it is to be reimbursed from a particular fund, when we know it is not so due, and, moreover, know that we never can be reimbursed? Sir, such are the facts; and the Senator from New York has admitted them, by telling us he knew that we had already appropriated more money to the Cumberland road than had, or ever would, accrue from the two per cent. fund of the four States. Let gentlemen decide for themselves, whether, because they believe an appropriation constitutional, they can consistently attach to the bill an unfounded assurance to the Executive, and to the country, that the amount is due to us by contract, and will be refunded, when they know it is not due, and will not be refunded.

Mr. C. expressed his profound regret that any of those who supported the present Administration, and with whom he usually agreed, should support a measure of the character of the bill before the Senate. Having shown, as he confidently believed he had, that there was no existing fund of either of the States for whose benefit this road was to be made, out of which we could be reimbursed; and having established, beyond contradiction from any quarter, that no sufficient amount could ever accrue from sales of the public lands hereafter to be made in those States, it followed conclusively that the bill could not be sustained, or justified, under the compacts to which there had been such frequent reference. Under such circumstances, what was the naked question presented to the Senate? Mr. C. said, it was simply whether the General Government could make appropriations for the construction of roads within the States, consistently with the Constitution, or principles of sound policy. That was a question he had thought settled by the last Administration, and he was sorry to see it disturbed by any of those who professed to be friendly to its principles.

He said, it would be recollected that President Jackson, in his veto message on the Maysville road bill, and, in his subsequent messages, on similar measures, had laid down principles entirely unfavorable to the exercise of such power as that now contemplated. The Cumberland road, he thought, had been sufficiently shown to be a mere local improvement, in the proper sense of those terms. Although it ran through several of the States, it was wholly unconnected with any national object—it was entirely in the interior of the country, and could not be said to be necessary to, or even to facilitate, its defence. Not being national in its character, it was without and beyond the constitutional power of Congress; for all must admit that this Government was instituted for national, and not for State, purposes.

Mr. C. said, this was one of the great questions, of most vital interest in the quarter of the Union whence he came. It was well understood that his constituents, with the people of the Southern States generally, were in favor of a strict construction of the Constitution of the United States, and a rigid limitation of the powers of this Government to its legitimate functions. During the last Presidential canvass, when the present Chief Magistrate was a prominent candidate before the people of the Union, amongst the strongest objections urged against him in the South was, that he was latitudinous in his constitutional opinions, and would favor internal improvements by the General Government. This objection was met by his friends and supporters, with his pledge, that he would "follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor"—by the resolution he offered in the Senate of the United States, in December, 1825, declaring that "Congress does not possess the power to make roads and canals within the States," and by his remarks, on various occasions, expressive of his opinion that Congress could not constitutionally exercise any such power. Mr. C. said he was amongst those who then, and still, believed the President a strict constructionist, and opposed to the exercise of the power in question. It was under this confident belief, that the present Chief Magistrate had received such a generous support in the Democratic States of the South. The Republicans of that quarter of the Union thought they were co-operating with brethren of the same political principles, and that, when successful, the Administration would be conducted accordingly. Mr. C. said he now entertained no doubt that, whenever a question involving and coming in conflict with those principles might be presented to the President, it would be met in a proper manner; he was firm and consistent, and would do his duty. He asked, was it fair, then, toward the President, and many of his friends, for another portion of them to unite with those who were opposed to us in constitutional opinions, in throwing around an appropriation (which could otherwise never meet his sanction) such masks and disguises that he could not see its true character? Were not those who pursued this course, in truth, opposing the acknowledged principles on which the Administration came into power, and bringing it into discredit with the Democratic party?

Mr. C. thought that, for a party to act long together, and remain united, they must entertain and act upon some common principles, and for common objects. He said it must be apparent that if one portion of a political party in this country were in favor of a strict, and the other a latitudinous construction of the Constitution—one portion in favor of an economical, and the other an extravagant and prodigal administration—one portion in favor of large appropriations to a certain class of objects in one quarter of the Union, and against such appropriations for like objects in another quarter, hey could not long act together harmoniously. He said the mass of our plain, honest, intelligent, but unsophisticated fellow-citizens, could never be made to understand why millions of dollars could be constitutionally appropriated for a road in Ohio or Indiana, Illinois or Missouri, while it was held to be unconstitutional to do the same thing in Tennessee or Alabama, South Carolina or Georgia. They could not be made to understand—he hoped they never might—that the Constitution meant one thing north of the Ohio, and another thing entirely different on the south side of the same river. They understood that the Constitution was intended to impose equal burdens, and dispense equal benefits and blessings throughout all the States of the Union. Equality of rights and privileges, burdens and benefits, amongst all the free citizens of this great and enlightened Republic, was the great principle which laid at the foundation of all our institutions. Disregard and destroy that distinguishing characteristic, and you jeopard the happiness and prosperity of this great people, if not the existence of the Government itself.

Mr. PHELPS followed in opposition to, and Mr. SMITH of Indiana in support of, the bill, when,

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Kentucky,

The Senate adjourned.

DEBATE IN SENATE,

MONDAY, March 30, 1840.

The bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes was taken up at one o'clock, on the motion of Mr. HUBBARD, and, having been read,

Mr. HUBBARD remarked, that he regretted, and the Senate would regret, that his friend, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, was absent from his place. The charge of this bill would have devolved upon him had he been present. And not until within a few hours did he (Mr. H.) suppose that his honorable friend would not be able to be in his place. He was aware that the severe indisposition of a member of his family had occasioned his absence. The Committee on Finance had met this morning, and had assigned to him the care of this bill; and as they regard immediate action upon this measure of great importance, if not of indispensable necessity, they had instructed him to press this bill upon the consideration of the Senate, without any delay.

The bill which has passed the House, and is now before the Senate, provides—

"That the regulations and provisions contained in the act passed the twelfth day of October, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty seven, entitled 'An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes,' and the subsequent acts in addition thereto, be, and the same are hereby, renewed, and made in full force, excepting the limitations concerning the times within which such notes may be issued, and restricting the amount thereof as hereafter provided."

And the same bill further provides—

"That under the regulations and provisions contained in said act, Treasury notes may be issued in lieu of others hereafter or heretofore redeemed, but not to exceed in the amount of notes outstanding at any one time the aggregate of five millions of dollars, and to be redeemed sooner than one year, if the means of the Treasury will permit, by giving notice sixty days of those notes which the Department is ready to redeem; no interest to be allowed thereon after the expiration of said sixty days. And that this act shall continue in force one year and no longer."

As this bill, so essential to the public service, so intimately connected with the preservation of the public credit, had been opposed with so much determination, he felt himself now called upon to ask the candid attention of the Senate, while he went into a full examination of its provisions. And in the outset he must be permitted to say, that this measure is no bank in disguise; that it has no direct or remote relation to any such institution. It is simply a measure to borrow five millions of dollars for the use of the Government. It originated where such measures should originate, in the popular branch; and the bill is to be sustained, and sustained only upon that clause of the Constitution which gives authority to Congress "to borrow money on the credit of the United States." He should not attempt to sustain the bill upon any other principle. It was then, in his judgment, nothing more nor less than a bill to borrow a specified sum for the use and upon the credit of the United States.

As the first section of this bill seeks to revive the provisions of the act of the 12th of October, 1837, authorizing the issue of Treasury notes—and the acts having connection therewith, which were subsequently passed by Congress, he proposed to examine those acts with much particularity, in order to show that the character of this measure was such and such only, as he had given it.

The act which was passed on the 12th of October, 1837, was "an act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes;" was an act, in other words, authorizing the issue of certificates of public debt. And the notes which were issued under and in pursuance of the act of October, 1837, were but the promises of the Government to pay the amount of money specified. And he was unable to distinguish between the issue of these notes by the Government, and the issue of notes for a like object, by individuals, so far as it went to give a definite character to the transaction. If an individual wished to raise money for his convenience, he issues his own written promise to pay. It is evidence of the debt of the individual, and it is evidence of the engagement of the same individual to redeem that debt. And precisely so with the Government; it wanted money; it issued in the mode required by law its evidences of debt, and its promises of payment. In both cases the want of immediate means for use induced the transaction. And as no doubt could be entertained that in the case of the individual it would be a loan upon his credit—equally clear is it that in the case of the Government it would emphatically be a loan of the ten millions obtained under the act of October, 1837. The issue was made upon the credit of the Government; the means were procured upon that issue by the faith of the Government which was pledged for the redemption of the debt incurred. And if it so happened that these Treasury notes entered into the circulation of the country, that circumstance did not tend to change the character of the transaction. The negotiable paper of an individual, upon which he may obtain a loan, may enter into circulation; it may pass from hand to hand by assignment and delivery, but the original transaction is, nevertheless, the same.

By the first section of the act referred to, the President of the United States is authorized to cause Treasury notes, for such sum or sums as the exigencies of the Government may require, to be prepared and issued, limiting the amount of issue to ten millions of dollars—giving to that responsible officer of the Government, in other words, the power to borrow ten millions of dollars, if the exigencies of the country should demand it. The notes which were to be issued, signed, and countersigned, could not be regarded in any other light. And if they should get into circulation—pass from one to another—it may be answered that the certificates of the funded debt were alike assignable, and passed from one to another. By the second section of the act of the 12th of October, 1837, the true character is given to this transaction. It is there expressly provided that these notes shall be reimbursed and redeemed by the United States, at the Treasury, after the expiration of one year from the dates of the notes, respectively. The same section provides that the rate of interest shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President, and that they shall not draw interest after the expiration of said year—distinctly evincing the period of duration for this loan, and solemnly pledging the faith of the Government for the reimbursement of the notes issued, or of the loan contracted. The true character is here given to this transaction.

The exigencies of the country then required the use of ten millions of dollars. The President was authorized to make the loan in the mode prescribed. The faith of the United States was pledged for its redemption.

The third section of the act of October, 1837, designates the manner of executing these certificates of the public debt, and requires the Secretary to account for the notes delivered to him.

The fourth section repudiates the idea that this issue of Treasury notes was to be regarded as paper money, and unqualifiedly establishes the position before assumed, that the issue was but to carry out the loan which had been contracted by the Government. That section provides that the Secretary of the Treasury, under the direction of the President, cause a portion of said notes to be issued in payment of debts due by the United States to such public creditors as may choose to receive such notes in payment. And the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized, with the approbation of the President, to borrow, from time to time, such sums as the President may think expedient on the credit of such notes. There seems to be no room left for cavil—it is as clear as light—that this emission of Treasury notes is not to constitute, by the act of the Government, any portion of the circulating medium of the country, but merely to enable the Executive to perfect the loan which, by the terms of the act, he is authorized to obtain, and to issue these notes as evidences of the debt, and as engagements to refund.

The fifth section, in terms, makes them of the same negotiable character as the old certificates of the funded debt, and makes them assignable like the negotiable paper of individuals.

These Treasury notes are made receivable for duties, taxes, and for public lands. The other portions of the act of October, 1837, need not be particularly quoted. They provide that the holder shall receive the principal and the interest specified. They give authority to the Secretary to purchase the outstanding notes. And the act further provides for the punishment of all persons who shall counterfeit said notes. And it requires the Secretary of the Treasury to cause a statement to be published monthly of the amount of all Treasury notes issued or redeemed in pursuance of the provisions of the act. It gives no authority to reissue the notes once issued, or to issue new notes in their stead.

By the act of May 21, 1838, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue new notes in place of such as have been or may be issued, under the authority of the act of October, 1837, and which have been, or which may hereafter be, paid into the Treasury, and cancelled. By the act of March 2, 1839, an authority is given to issue, at any time prior to the 30th of June then next, the remainder of the Treasury notes authorized to be issued by the act of May 21, 1838, to meet the current expenses of the Government.

Such has been the legislation of Congress heretofore in relation to this subject. And the bill now upon the table proposes to re-enact and revive for one year the pre existing legislation of Congress upon this same subject-matter. And he would address himself to the intelligence and patriotism of the Senate, whether the bill is objectionable in terms—whether the condition of the Treasury does not imperiously require the immediate adoption of this measure. He was sure he should not make this appeal in vain. He held in his hand a statement which had recently been received from the Secretary of the Treasury, and which went to exhibit the true conditiyn of the Treasury at the present time; and if this paper could be relied on, and he could not doubt that it merited our entire confidence, there was a necessity for immediate action upon the bill before the Senate.

Receipts and Expenditures since January 1, 1840.

EXPENDITURES.

In January,	$1,255,753
In February,	1,427.687
In March,	1,650 000
Aggregate for ordinary objects,	4,333,440
Since the 1st of January, redeeming Treasury notes, paid about	1,400 000
Available balance in Treasury, say	1,646,560
	$7,230,000

NOTE.—The above expenses include what has been actually paid for pensions, but would have been larger, if all called for had been advanced, by about $500,000

This amount has been postponed a few weeks.

If the usual appropriation bills had passed, there would have been due and paid under them more, by near 1,000,000

These two last amounts will soon be required, and, besides them and the ordinary expenditures in the rest of the year, almost one million and a quarter more will be needed to redeem Treasury notes falling due in May.

It will be seen, by a reference to this communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, that the amount in the Treasury on the 1st of January exceeded, by about seven hundred thousand dollars, the sum estimated to be in the Treasury by the Secretary, in his annual report upon the finances. The difference undoubtedly arose from the receipts from imports and from the sale of lands exceeding the estimate of the Secretary for the quarter ending the last December, 1839.

It may be said here, as it has been said elsewhere, why is this measure now called for? Why did not the Secretary, in his annual report, state distinctly and directly that this amount would be required? There has been a misapprehension upon the subject of that officer's annual report in relation to this very matter. It had been said, on the floor of the Senate, on a former occasion, that the Secretary had estimated the means and the expenditures for the current year, and had informed Congress that the former would enable him to meet the expenditures as estimated, and leave in the Treasury, on the 1st day of January, 1841, over a million of dollars.

This is true to the letter; and the Secretary has not, in his recent communication, retracted any part of the statement made in his annual report. In that official document, he distinctly stated, not only the aggregate amount of the available means in the Treasury, but he also officially transmitted to Congress an estimate of the expenditures of the year. This estimate of expenditures that distinguished public officer is in no way responsible for; it is made up at the several Departments, and the heads of those Departments inform the Secretary of the Treasury what sum will be necessary for the support of his own Department. The Secretary arranges these various communications, and, upon a proper classification, he reports to Congress what sums are estimated as the aggregate of the public expenditures for the current year; and his statement that there will be in the Treasury, on the 1st of January, 1841, a million of dollars, is predicated upon the fact that all the means he has estimated shall be available, and that the expenditures do not exceed the estimates. He could make no other report; and he would have been false to his trust, if he had given an honest account of the means, and a faithful exhibit of the estimated expenditures, and it should result, from such an expose, that the former would exceed the latter by a million of dollars, if he had said, I want from Congress a still further sum of five millions of dollars.

Such a course of conduct is not in accordance with the known vigilance, fidelity, and uprightness of that public officer. But let it not be supposed that the Secretary has made any concealments. What has he said in his report? After giving a detailed statement of the means with which the Treasury may be supplied in the course of the year, as follows:

"From the best information possessed by this department, it is computed that the aggregate of means available for public purposes, will not exceed $18,600,000, viz. from

Customs	$15 000,000
Lands	3,500,000
Miscellaneous	100,000
Add to these the balance available and applicable to other purposes, which it is supposed will be in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1840	1,556,385
The efficient means in that year will then amount, in the aggregate, to	20,156,385
If Congress should make appropriations to the extent desired by the different departments, the expenditures for 1840, independent of the redemption of Treasury notes, are estimated at	20,000,000
Including all the Treasury notes to be redeemed, the aggregate expenditure would be about	22,750,000
This would leave a deficit in the Treasury, at the close of the year, amounting to	2,593,615
But there will be due from the United States Bank, in September next, on its fourth bond about	2,526,576
The principal now due on the Treasurer's deposites in other banks, which suspended specie payments in 1837, is	1,149,904
Should all these claims be collected in 1840, they would prevent a deficiency, and leave an available balance in the Treasury, of nearly	1,082,865

He adds, for the information of Congress, and most properly adds, that "it is not, however, considered prudent to rely exclusively on the collection of these debts." And in another part of the same report, the Secretary, after informing Congress of the aid which had been given to the Department in time of temporary embarrassment—by authorizing the issue of Treasury notes—had further added that

"The Department is now without any resort, temporary or permanent, in case of material deficiencies; and considering all the circumstances before mentioned, with the dangerous liability in law to have the whole of the outstanding Treasury notes paid in at any moment for public dues, without a power remaining to issue others in their stead; considering, also, the present revulsions in the commercial world, which affect so seriously the receipts from both duties and lands; considering the disasters which are befalling the banks, and rendering our collected funds in some cases wholly unavailable, and the advances necessary to be soon made for the large payments of pensions, and Treasury notes falling due in March, the earliest attention to new legislation on this subject seems highly prudent, if not indispensable, for the effectual security of the public credit."

In the extracts made from the Secretary's report, it is manifest that he has put Congress in possession of all the information which could be material for their action. And by more recent communications the same facts are repeated.

The Secretary says, in a report made by him to the President, under date of 15th of February, that "after the lapse of nearly three months, the views expressed in his annual report remain unchanged."

This bill is called for at this time not for the reason that the ordinary means coming into the Treasury will not be sufficient to meet the ordinary expenditures, but for the reason that the expenditures have been extraordinary in the month of March, and will be unusually large in April and May. The statement from the Secretary shows for what purposes the expenditures have been made up to this time. It is known also that there is now outstanding Treasury notes amounting to a million and a half of dollars. This sum must be paid in April and May. These considerations should induce the Senate now to concur with the House in the passage of this bill. It is a fact known to him that the Departments have been without pay for the last quarter; that our judges are without their quarter yearly salaries; our courts without the necessary means for their support.

It is true that the current appropriation bills have not passed the House, and owing to that circumstance the Treasury Department has been enabled hitherto to sustain the credit of the Government. And all he had to say in conclusion was, that he hoped the Senate would co-operate with him in now passing the bill before us. It is a measure called for by every consideration of public justice; by every feeling of patriotism; by the unavoidable expenditures of the Treasury Department which have recently taken place, and which are in prospect. It is not to be regarded as a permanent measure, but merely to afford that temporary aid and relief which an extraordinary expenditure of public money in the recent payment of pensions and in the extinguishment of a large portion of the public debt, has occasioned. He trusted, then, he should find the Senate prepared to carry this measure through without delay.

After some remarks from Mr. WEBSTER,

Mr. HUBBARD said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I rejoice that the Senator from Massachusetts concurs with me in opinion that this bill ought to pass. I anticipated such an avowal, as we are both members of the Committee on Finance, and of course presumed to be acquainted with the present financial condition of the Government; and he, as well as myself, could not doubt, from what has been communicated to that committee, that the present wants and necessities of the Treasury called for the immediate passage of the bill before us. This fact was well known to me; and the knowledge of this fact must have led the honorable Senator to declare that he should make no opposition to this measure. In this, then, we agree: that the amount specified in this bill, at least, Congress is now bound to provide for the use of the Government. We also agree in another fact: that this bill is nothing more nor less than giving authority to the Administration to contract a loan upon the credit of the Government for five millions of dollars. I stated in my opening remarks, and I now repeat, that this bill can be sustained upon no other principle than as a loan. Under that clause of the Constitution, authorizing Congress "to borrow money upon the credit of the United States," I have heretofore defended measures similar to the bill under consideration. Under that same constitutional provision alone, I now sustain and defend this measure. I regard it as a loan, and nothing but a loan. It is of no earthly importance what are the peculiar terms of the bill, or what are its general provisions. The object is clearly set forth in the act of October, 1837; which act the bill before us seeks to revive; and, as I said when up before, that, from beginning to end, that act gave authority to contract a debt of ten millions of dollars; to borrow that sum upon the faith of the United States; to issue, in the form of Treasury notes of the denomination of fifty dollars and upwards, as the evidences of this debt, and pledged the faith of the United States for its ultimate redemption and payment. The present bill is substantially the same; of itself it contains no important provisions; it re enacts merely the law of 1837. True it is, that it proposes to borrow only five millions of dollars; but, in all other essential particulars, it is like, and is to be determined by, the act of 1837, and the subsequent acts of Congress upon this subject. With the Senator from Massachusetts, then, I entirely concur that this bill is merely a proposition for a loan; and, notwithstanding the character which has been formerly given on this floor to kindred measures, and the character which has been given elsewhere to this very measure, notwithstanding it has been violently assailed as a Government Bank, that it conferred the power to issue Government paper, and that that paper was designed to enter into the circulation of the country as money. Notwithstanding these attacks upon, and these objections to the bill, I cannot but regard them all as without foundation. I have endeavored to examine well this whole matter; I have, with much care, looked into the former legislation of Congress, and I have come to the conclusion that such attacks were wholly unwarranted; that such objections were wholly unsustained; and I have not been able to come to any different result than the one expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts, that the bill gave authority to contract a loan for the use of the Government. All its other provisions were but mere details to carry into effect the object in view. I not only regard the measure before us as a proposition for a loan, but I regard the mode and manner of contracting this loan with great favor. It comes strongly recommended to my mind. I have reflected much upon the objections which have, time and again, been urged against this particular mode of making a loan, and I must say that it is, in my judgment, greatly to be preferred to the usual and customary mode of contracting loans by the Government. The mode pointed out in the bill upon the table avoids all the delays necessarily incident to the other. There are no public advertisements; no circumlocution; no opening of books for subscription to the loan; no carrying our wants abroad; no humiliating appeal to the moneyed power of Europe; no seeking accommodations from the bankers of England, Holland, or France—all this is avoided. The amount wanted is named in the bill, the Treasury notes or certificates of debt are at once issued of every denomination of fifty and exceeding fifty dollars, and an appeal is at once made by our own Government to the subjects of that Government. Every individual of the community has the opportunity of contributing to its aid and relief. Experience has already shown that this mode of negotiating temporary loans has been most successful. The local institutions of the States; individuals in the interior sections of the country, as well as the capitalists of our cities, have, with alacrity, come to the relief of the Government with a strong and controlling feeling of patriotism; they have advanced their means as the exigencies of their country demanded. It is for such considerations that I have an abiding predilection for this mode of negotiating and perfecting a loan. In time of peace, in my judgment, it should be invariably adopted. As unforeseen and unanticipated expenditures may be necessary, as deficiencies in the Treasury may arise, as there may be for a time a want of immediate means to carry on the operations of the Government, and to sustain the public faith, in all such events, I would resort to this mode of pledging the public credit, in preference to others, in order to relieve the Treasury from such temporary embarrassments. In no point of view, therefore, is this mode of raising money for public purposes objectionable, in my judgment. I would invariably resort to it to meet such an exigency as now exists, to afford that temporary aid which the condition of the Treasury at this time so imperiously requires. These are my views. They have been formed after a full consideration of the act of October, 1837. I gave that measure my support. I gave to the acts of May, 1838, and of March, 1839, my support. I shall give to this bill my support.

I do not purpose, Mr. President, to follow the Senator in many of the remarks which he has submitted, having no immediate connection, as I can see, with the bill before us. The Senator has, however, gone into a full examination of the present condition of the Treasury, and its past, present, and prospective means, its past, present, and prospective expenditures. I will give to this part of the Senator's remarks some notice. The Senator has adverted to the tariff as it now exists, and to such a modification of the tariff as he would desire to have established. He has told us that he would, for the purpose of supplying the Treasury with available means, impose at once a duty upon silks. He has informed us of the gross amount of the importation of that article for the last year, and has deduced from that fact that even a moderate duty would bring millions annually into the Treasury. I agree to all this, and shall be as ready as that Senator, or as any other, so to regulate at once the tariff, as to impose duties on all luxuries now exempt from duty. I may add silks, as a luxury, are a most legitimate object for an impost duty, and I feel myself bound by no pretended compromise. But on this point the gentlemen upon the other side do not concur in opinion. Sir, I well remember that a most distinguished advocate of a protective tariff—a political friend of the Senator, on a certain occasion, contended, according to my best recollection, that this very article should come in free of duty, to enable the wives and daughters of our industrious farmers to dress themselves in silks on public occasions. But I go with the Senator from Massachusetts for the duty; and whenever a bill shall come from the other House, where such measures must originate, I will follow the lead of the Senator as far as he has indicated, with this qualification, my object will be to regulate a tariff of duties for the purpose of revenue, and for the purpose of revenue alone, and if protection shall incidentally be afforded, so be it; but I go not for a tariff looking to protection; against such a policy I enter now my entire and unqualified dissent. Revenue, and revenue alone must be the great object of any tariff of duties which can receive my aid. I will go with the Senator, also, to keep the duty off from tea and coffee. These articles are of such universal use—enter so largely into the consumption of the poorer classes of the community—that I look upon them, as they are looked upon by those very classes, as necessaries of life. While a member of the other House, I went to repeal the duties on tea and coffee, and to reduce the duty on salt. The same considerations which induced the one act induced all; and whenever a proper occasion shall come, I shall be ready to go with my worthy friend upon my left, [Mr. BENTON] to repeal the remaining duty on salt. I regard this article as an indispensable necessary of life. I would have it come to us as free from duty as the air we breathe, or the water we drink.

[Mr. BENTON here signified his satisfaction with the last remarks]

But, Mr. President, my friend from Missouri must not infer that I am prepared to go with him for the repeal of the fishing bounties, or the allowances given to our fishing vessels. I am not prepared at this time of day to support to that extent the project of the Senator from Missouri. I hope that when that subject shall come before the Senate, that I shall be prepared to show that other and important considerations induced this system of bounties and allowance than the mere amount of foreign salt used by the fishermen.

I have said, Mr. President, that I was in favor of this bill, and in favor of this mode of obtaining money for the use of the Government. I have said that, for temporary purposes, to relieve the Treasury from some sudden and unlooked for embarrassment, this manner of procuring money upon the public credit was altogether desirable. If the question was a loan of long continuance, I might think differently. But with reference to this particular bill, it meets with my entire approbation. I do not agree, however, that this measure is to borrow five millions of dollars for the period of two years. It is true, that the Secretary of the Treasury may, on the last day of the past year, if there are no certificates outstanding, make a new issue of the whole amount for one year. But the bill itself is limited to a single year, and the Secretary of the Treasury is bound to redeem within a less time, if the means of the department will enable him to do it on giving sixty days' notice. I have no fears then that this loan is to be fastened upon the Government for the term of two years. In the nature of things, it appears to me, that such a scheme could not be accomplished. I have full faith in the head of the Treasury Department, and experience will show that he has not over-estimated his means, and that even before the expiration of one year, most of the notes will be redeemed, and redeemed with the means within the control of that Department—and if the Secretary has not erred in his estimate of the receipts into the Treasury for the current year; if he has not fixed too high his available means; and if Congress shall keep the appropriations within the estimates, instead of there being any occasion for the issue of Treasury notes at the end of the first year to, sustain the credit of the country, there will then be in the Treasury, subject to draft, over a million of dollars. What earthly reason, then, could possibly induce the Secretary to issue five millions of dollars at the close of the present year? I know of none—and I believe it would be difficult to conceive of any, consistent with the known integrity of that officer. Let the bill pass, and my word for it the five millions will find their way back to the Treasury Department before the expiration of a single year, should peace remain within our borders, and no unusual or extraordinary appropriation of the public money be called for.

The Senator from Massachusetts has remarked upon the estimate of means and expenditures as contained in the Secretary's annual report on the finances; and from the course of his argument I infer that, in his opinion, that officer has overestimated the one, and underestimated the other; and that, instead of there being in the Treasury on the first of January, 1841, a million of dollars, that there will be a deficit; and that even the amount intended to be raised by the bill before us, will prove insufficient to cover that deficit; that at the commencement of the Administration of 1841, the Government will find itself involved in a national debt of millions. This may be so. The estimated means may not prove available. In that event, no blame could be imputed to the Treasury Department, or to the General Administration. The expenditures may go far beyond the estimates. In that event, no blame could be imputed to the Administration. Congress itself is alone responsible for the public expenditures. The Secretary of the Treasury has nothing to do with the public appropriations; he submits to Congress an estimate of the expenditures required for the year; he makes known the means at his command, and the character of those means. If Congress make appropriations in disregard of his estimate of expenditures, or if the means on which he relies should fail him, it would indeed be true, that an entirely different result would follow from such a state of things, than that stated in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury. But, Mr. President, there is no mystery in this whole matter; that statement is made with great precision and clearness; it discloses the means of the Department, the character and source of those means; it exhibits the expenditures required; and unless the Government should have some collision with England—unless our country should become involved in war—it is idle to talk of a public debt being fastened upon us at the commencement of another year. No such event will or can take place, unless our existing controversies with Great Britain should involve us in war, of which I admit there is some probability: and I would rather have it come, with all its evils, than to see a rood of our soil surrendered, or the honor of our country compromitted.

Is there any probability that the Secretary will not realize all the means he has estimated? Is there any doubt that the receipts into the Treasury during the course of the present year, from all sources, will amount, in the aggregate, to $20,000,000? Will he not realize fifteen millions from customs? Will he not receive three millions from the sale of the public lands? This estimate of receipts was made at the commencement of the quarter ending on the last of December. He then told us that there would be in the Treasury, on the first of January, 1840, a million and a half of dollars. Has not his estimate been exceeded? Does it not distinctly appear, from a communication he read to the Senate when he was up before, that the balance in the Treasury, instead of a million and a half, was two millions and two hundred thousand dollars? He commences the year, then, with more means than he anticipated; and this excess beyond the estimate must have been derived from imports and from land sales; it could not have in the main been produced from payments on the debts due the Government from the old deposite banks, for it distinctly appears from the paper read, that from that source the Secretary has received the sum of seven hundred thousand dollars. It follows, then, from this exhibit, that seven hundred thousand dollars were received into the Treasury in the last quarter of the last year more than were anticipated. It also results, from an examination of the same communication, that the receipts into the Treasury for the first quarter of the present year have exceeded the average estimates for that quarter; and if the coming quarters do not fall short it will be found that the Secretary has not overestimated his available means, arising either from the customs or the lands. It is true, the Bank of the United States may not promptly pay the sum falling due in September next; and it may so happen that the old deposite banks may not extinguish the balances against them; but this is not to be presumed; but should it so happen that the entire indebtedness of these institutions should not be cancelled, is there no way to supply the deficiency which might thus be occasioned, without a resort to a loan? Yes, sir, there is a mode, and in my judgment it is our bounden duty, by immediate legislation, to adopt that mode, by correcting the judicial constructions given to the tariff act of 1833, in consequence of which, millions will be, without right, and against the intention of Congress, abstracted from the Treasury. Let there be prompt legislation upon this subject. Let the existing tariff acts be fairly executed. Let them be carried into full effect; and, as the Senator proposes, let there be even a moderate duty now imposed on silks and other luxuries, and we shall find from these sources an accession to the available means of the Treasury in the course of this very year, of at least three millions of dollars. And why should not all this be done, if the existing tariff laws have received such judicial constructions as to deprive the Treasury of the pecuniary benefit which it was designed they should afford. Why not correct, by an immediate declaratory act, the evil? It in no way affects the compromise bill; for it in truth would be carrying out the true intent of that bill. Why not impose the duty on silks? Such a duty is called for by every consideration. I would then, without delay, afford to the Department all the aid which would result from such legislation; and from a document I have seen, coming from the head of that Department, if this be done, then, without any interference with compromises, we should, without doubt, add to our means at least the sum I have before named. But there is another source of revenue which may come in aid of the Treasury. Should the graduation bill at this session become the law of the land, the effect would be to bring a million or two millions of dollars immediately into the Treasury from that source. I am aware of the opinion that the strong friends of this measure entertain on this point; but I deal in no extravagances. If that bill passes at the present session, I firmly believe that within a year from its passage, the Treasury will derive the aid from that source which I have stated. But even if there should be no legislation of Congress with reference to the judicial construction of the tariff act of 1833; if there should be no duty imposed on silks; if there should be no graduation bill passed; yet I have full confidence that the Secretary will be able to count on the means he has mentioned. If so, all will end well. I have, Mr. President, since the committee assigned to me the defence of the bill before us, endeavored to ascertain what has been the action of the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House with reference to the public appropriation bills; and I am most happy to say that they have been reported to the House, and that they will be found to be within the estimates; in truth, it will be seen that a less sum in the aggregate has been reported in the general appropriation bills than was estimated.

If, then, there is to be no material deficiency in means, as the experience of the quarter just ended evinces; if there is to be no appropriation materially exceeding the estimates of expenditures, as the bills which have already been reported to the other House show, then it follows that, instead of being in debt at the end of the year, we shall have in the Treasury an available balance, exceeding a million of dollars. Instead of the five millions of Treasury notes remaining unpaid, we shall find that the fidelity and perseverance of the head of the Department, before the coming in of another Administration, will have extinguished every such certificate of public debt.

Whatever may be the sentiments of others, I have read with much satisfaction the Secretary's annual report upon the finances. I have discovered, in the perusal of that document, the leading purpose of that public officer—to take no more money from the people than is wanted for the use of the Government. I admire his estimate of means and expenditures, and the result of these estimates as exhibited in his report. There will be a million of dollars in the Treasury after meeting all the public expenditures indispensably necessary. This is as it should be. Why or wherefore should money in taxes, direct or indirect, be drawn from the pockets of the people, more than is required for an economical administration of our Government? Why should the balance-sheet show millions upon millions in the Treasury at the commencement of every year? Why shall this be done, unless for the purpose of hoarding up the money unnecessarily abstracted from the people? I know that this practice was condemned by those who opposed the passage of the Independent Treasury bill; and in the perusal of the Secretary's report, I have seen that this Administration can be in no sense obnoxious to any such charge. Another benefit results from every such expose of our financial affairs; it teaches economy; it prevents useless and extravagant appropriations; it leads Congress to husband their means, and look well to their expenditures. And while I frankly avow the satisfaction I experienced in the perusal of this report of the Secretary, I believe that I do not mistake public opinion, when I add that the tax payers of the whole country will give to it their unqualified approbation.

The honorable Senator has given us a statement of the expenditures of the Government for the last three years. He has referred to the deposite act of 1836; to the obligations under that act to deposite with the States what should be in the National Treasury on the first of January, 1837, after deducting therefrom the sum of five millions of dollars. He has informed us that the Administration has failed to deposite the last instalment with the States, as required by the act of June, 1836; and that this sum of nine millions went—with the five millions reserved for public use in the Treasury on the first of January, 1837, with what had been collected from the Bank of the United States within the last three years—to swell the extraordinary means of the Government to twenty millions of dollars at least.

I wish to offer a word or two in relation to this matter, although it seems to have no very direct connection with the Treasury Note bill. It has, Mr. President, heretofore been urged that the States had a right to this nine millions of dollars; that the Government was bound to make a deposite with the States of the entire amount in the Treasury on the first of January, 1837, after the deduction of the five millions; that it was due to the States, and due to the States from the General Government. Against these positions I entirely dissent. The money was the property of the United States, and not of the individual States; and when and where deposited was for the benefit and to the credit and on account of the former; and in the event of any pecuniary embarrassment occurring after the passage of the deposite act, if the Administration had continued to withdraw the public moneys from the public Treasury and deposite them with the States, it would have been false to its trust, and would have justly merited the condemnation of the American people. I admit that the Secretary of the Treasury did not, under the act of 1836, deposite with the States the last quarter of the amount on hand, January 1, 1837; and why and wherefore was this? Is not the reason known and well understood? Did not all the local banks of the country suspend specie payments in May, 1837? Not only those institutions having the public money, but others, as it were, by a united concert, at a given moment, refused to pay their paper and to redeem their debts? I refer to these facts to show for what reason the General Government failed to place in deposite with the States the remaining portion of the public funds required under the act of 1836. It was because the failure of the local banks of the country had put the public money without the control of the Government. The Senator has very correctly stated that the nine millions, in addition to the amount in the Treasury on the first of January, 1837, and in addition to the five millions received from the Bank of the United States has, since that period, been expended by the Government beyond the ordinary receipts into the Treasury. The Senator has very correctly stated that the amount which had been collected from the Bank of the United States; the balance in the Treasury on first of January, 1837; and the sum remaining not deposited with the States, as required by the act of 1836, formed an aggregate of over twenty millions of dollars, and that these were extraordinary means placed at the disposal of the Administration; and that since that period, this whole sum, together with the usual receipts into the Treasury from all other sources, had been almost wholly exhausted—so that the balance in the Treasury on the first of January last, was reduced to a million and a half of dollars; and hence the Senator would have us believe, not only that the expenditures have been extravagant, but that the estimates of the expenditures for the current year must of necessity be too low. Little indeed did I suppose that the honorable Senator would have stated—as he has most correctly stated—the amount of the extraordinary expenditures for the last three years, without having distinctly informed the Senate what had taken place to have rendered such an extraordinary expenditure of the public money indispensable. Surely the Senator well knows that during this whole period we have been engaged in a most disastrous and expensive war with the Seminoles. Mr. President, I have not before me the official reports in relation to the great expenditure for the prosecution of the Indian war. But it has been said heretofore by Senators in the Opposition that this war had already cost the Government over twenty millions. Not exactly so; but there can be no doubt that it has called for the appropriation of nearly fifteen millions of dollars. And can this Administration be charged with extravagance—with a want of economy—because this cruel and exterminating contest had cost the nation fifteen millions of dollars? Should the Administration stop to count the cost, and leave the border inhabitants to the tender mercies of a savage foe? No, sir—no. Such a course of policy no patriot would for a moment justify.

The war was unavoidable; its consequences, dreadful as they have been, in the sacrifice of human life, and in the expenditure of human means, have nevertheless been inevitable. Well, sir, I then start with a credit to the Treasury of fifteen millions for the expenses of the Florida war. Is this all? Have our Indian relations called for no other expenditures within the last three years? How have the treaties with the Creeks and Cherokees been executed? Have not those tribes been removed beyond the Mississippi, at a cost of over seven millions of dollars. Yes, Mr. President: such are the facts; such is the language of official documents. We, then, have had an extraordinary expenditure of the public money, within the last three years, in the prosecution of the Florida war; in the removal of the Creeks and Cherokees, of more than twenty-two millions of dollars; exceeding the aggregate of extraordinary means, as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts. But, Mr. President, we have concluded other Indian treaties within that period, requiring the expenditure of public money, all of which may be classed under the head of extraordinary expenditures. I contend, then, that the facts to which the Senator has adverted furnish no ground of charge against the Administration for extravagance. These expenses were necessary to maintain the honor and the justice of the country, and they might have occurred under any other Administration. Nor do these unusually large expenditures, for the last three years, tend in the least degree to show that the Secretary of the Treasury cannot get through the current year with an expenditure of only twenty millions.

Where is the evidence of extravagance? and where is the evidence that the Secretary has under estimated the public expenditures for the current year. Sir, it may be well to look a little into history, in relation to the public expenditures. We shall find that the current expenses of the Government, for ordinary, as well as for extraordinary, objects, have been reduced, within that time, more than seven millions; and the estimated expenditures for 1840 are less, by at least fourteen millions of dollars, than in 1837. The time has come when there will be no hoarding of the people's money—when no more will be drawn from the pockets of the people than is indispensably required for public use. And there can be no doubt that, unless the continued suspension of the banks shall sensibly derange our commercial operations, reduce the amount of duties, and diminish the sales of the public lands, the head of the Treasury Department will leave no national debt behind him, should he retire in 1841, to be cancelled by his successor.

The Senator from Massachusetts has, in the course of his speech, signified his intention not to oppose the passage of this bill; but he has presented an argument against this mode of borrowing money for the use of the Government. He has remarked that the greater part of all the Treasury notes issued since October 1837, have borne an interest of six per cent; and that the rate of interest on an issue of Treasury notes must be higher than would necessarily be required upon a loan contracted in the usual manner. I have already expressed my views as to the mode. I would merely add, in answer to the objection, that, as a citizen of our own country, I would greatly prefer to borrow money at home than to obtain it from abroad, even if such negotiations could not be accomplished as favorably in a pecuniary sense. There is, ever has been, and ever will be, an undue influence exerted by a moneyed power; and when, in our negotiations for loans, that power is concentrated in, and can be exercised by, a foreign Government, or when that power is concentrated in, and can be exercised by, the bankers of any foreign country, then, in my judgment, "the jealousy of a free people ought to be awake;" for I regard such an influence as most dangerous to our free Republican institutions. I would then, at all times, borrow money here, among our own citizens, whenever the exigencies of the country shall require it. I regard such a policy as founded in wisdom, as calculated to cement stronger and stronger this bond of union.

This is the first answer I would make to the argument of the Senator, if it were founded on fact; but the Senator will find that he is in error on this point. I have before me a table which has been prepared at the Department, which shows the exact amount of Treasury notes which have been issued under the respective acts of Congress, and the rate of interest given upon every issue. I shall not stop to read this table at length at this moment, but merely refer to it; and will state for the information of the Senate, that on averaging the rate of interest upon all the issues of Treasury notes under the various acts, of Congress, it will be found that the rate of interest upon that average will not exceed four per cent. per annum. It is contended that a loan in the common mode, as it is called, might be negotiated at a rate of four and a half per cent. Admit it for argument. Here then is a direct saving to the Government of one half of one per cent. in the kind of loan sanctioned by the recent acts of Congress, which is the same as is contemplated by the bill before us. But, Mr. President, is it true that, since 1837, a permanent loan could have been accomplished at a rate of interest of four and a half per cent.? Have the States been able, within that period, to negotiate loans on terms so favorable? Not so.

In order to show what amount of Treasury Notes has been issued under the different of Congress, and at what rate of interest, I have subjoined the following table:

STATEMENT of the amount of Treasury Notes issued quarterly, bearing the several rates of interest.

Years.	At 6 per cent. per annum.	At 5 per cent. per annum.	At 2 per cent. per annum.	At 1 mill per annum.	Total.

The Senator will, I trust, find himself also mistaken in his allegation, that in March, 1841, the public debt would amount to eight or ten millions, according to his estimate. It may be so; but I am totally at a loss to know upon what principle the Senator has made his calculation. The bill before us authorizes only a loan of five millions, and authorizes, as the Senator says, the continuance of this loan for a period of two years. How this debt of five millions is to be doubled, is beyond my poor ability to comprehend. This very bill is to give to the Secretary of the Treasury the means of redeeming every outstanding certificate of public debt. Admitting that the Treasury shall not be able to redeem, within the year, a single note issued under the authority of this bill—that the whole five millions shall then be outstanding—I would ask, in sober earnest, what would then be the aggregate of the public debt? Could it, by any rule of arithmetic known among us, exceed the sum of five millions? No, sir. But the Senator will, I think, be most agreeably disappointed; he will find, if peace shall continue, that this issue of Treasury notes will be faithfully redeemed within the year, by the means at the command of the Department. It may not be unprofitable to state what amount of Treasury notes was issued under the different acts of Congress, and what amount has been redeemed.

On referring to the subjoined table, it will be seen that, under the act of October, 1837, ten millions of Treasury notes were issued; under the act of May, 1839, $5,709,810 01 were issued; and under the act of March, 1839, $3,857,276 21 were issued; making, in all, the sum of $19,567,086 22. And now, Mr. President, what amount has the Government already redeemed? It will be seen by the annexed table that on the 26th of February, 1840, there were only two millions one hundred and sixty-seven thousand two hundred and thirty-one dollars and sixty-seven cents outsanding.

	October, 1837.	May, 1838.	March, 1839.
Issued,	$10,000,000 00	$5,709,810 01	$3,857,276 21
Redeemed,	9,830,426 07	5,531,299 40	2,035,129 08
Outstanding,	[$169,573 93	$175,510 61	$1,822,147 13

	1st.	$169,573 93
	2d.	175 510 51
	3d.	1,822,147 13

Do.		2,208,263 67	1st do. do.
		$41,032 00	Redeemed in Feb.

FEBRUARY 26, 1840.

And since that time, the amount of Treasury notes has been redeemed to that extent; that according to a statement from the Treasury Department, which I read to the Senate when up before, there will not be, after the first of April, over a million and a quarter unredeemed. In a little more than two years, then, the Department has taken up nearly the whole amount of the nineteen and a half millions of the Treasury notes issued under the different acts of Congress. I infer from these facts, that there exists a disposition faithfully to apply the means of the Government not only for its proper support, but also to relieve it from its indebtedness.

There is another fact referred to by the Senator, which I feel bound to notice. The Secretary of the Treasury, it has been said, has issued portions of these notes, at different times, for the purpose of depositing with certain local banks in this country; and the fair inference following from such a statement, must be, that such deposites were made for the accommodation of the banks. There is no public officer connected with the Government, who receives so frequently from the Opposition charges of dereliction of official duty. He certainly can be no favorite of theirs. On all occasions, he seems to be selected as the object upon which was to be spent the whole venom of his political adversaries. He has been accused of almost every thing; but he must have the proud consciousness that these charges, be they what they may, have in no respect degraded him in the estimation of the American people. Unaffected and uninfluenced by the attacks of his enemies, he has gone on steadily and faithfully to do his duty, with all fidelity to the Government, and with the approbation of his country. In relation to this particular matter, adverted to by the Senator from Massachusetts, I wish merely to say in reply, that I challenge the most rigid investigation into the official conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury, under the various acts of Congress authorizing the issue of Treasury notes; and I hazard nothing in saying, that in no one instance will it be found that he has issued a Treasury note unless the exigencies or convenience of the country, or the interests of the public creditors, required it.

I hazard nothing in saying, that on no occasion, or under any circumstances, has he issued Treasury notes for the purpose of being deposited in banks, "but to facilitate the exchange of specie for notes without the delay and expense of transporting it to this city, and then carrying it back for expenditure, to effect such an object." Specie may have been placed in certain banks, and Treasury notes to a corresponding amount may have been afterward, and not till then, issued in favor of such depositors. This is the sum and substance of the connection the head of the Department has had with banking corporations in the execution of the Treasury note acts—and this is all.

I would ask the Senator how, in what way or manner, the Government could suffer, in a pecuniary point of view, by such an arrangement? If it so happens that one of the public creditors should reside at New Orleans, and the Secretary, with the assent of said creditor, should issue a Treasury note for a hundred thousand dollars in payment of his claim, and it is done, the note sent, drawing the rate of interest specified upon the face of it, from the moment it leaves the Department, to perform its destined office. The debt is cancelled—the note is received—it is endorsed to answer the purposes of the creditor—it is sent to Baltimore—from thence to New York, and there it is paid at the custom-house for duties. From thence it finds its way back to the Treasury. This, all will admit, is a fair business transaction, an every day occurrence; but instead of all this, suppose that the Bank of America should say, or that some individual should say to the Secretary, "one hundred thousand dollars in specie shall be placed in the bank to the credit of the Treasurer, for which Treasury notes at the same rate of interest, shall be received," and this is done; and with the assent of the same creditor, he takes a draft direct upon this Bank of America, in payment of his claim. Would there be the least difference in the charge upon the Treasury? The public creditor would be paid in both cases. His debt would, in the one case, be satisfied by a Treasury note, sent directly to him—in the other case, a Treasury note would be sent to a holder of specie, and the claim would be paid by a draft upon that fund. In both cases the roll of interest would be the same, and the charge upon the Treasury the same. The Senator resides in one of our Northern cities, where such negotiations have been made, and made with an institution with which he, as well as myself, have some acquaintance; and, my word for it, that the most minute examination of the contracts with the Merchant's Bank at Boston, will show that the Government has made no issue of Treasury notes in favor of that bank, but for the accommodation of the Government itself. I will say nothing more on this matter, but merely advert to the resolutions offered by the Senator from Massachusetts himself, in relation to this same subject, and to the answer made to those resolutions by the Secretary, and by the Treasurer. They give the true character to this transaction; and by no ingenuity can it be perverted. The idea that such an issue of Treasury notes has ever been made to banks or individuals, on the previous deposite of a like amount of specie, but for the convenience of the Government, is truly "a humbug."

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 2d, 1840.

SIR: I have the honor to submit this report in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, passed 23d instant, in the following words:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury inform the Senate what proportion of Treasury notes, issued under the authority of the act of October 12, 1837, and subsequent acts, has been paid to public creditors of the United States, in discharge of their claims, and what proportion has been used for the purpose of borrowing money from the banks or individuals; together with a statement of the rates of interest borne by the notes of the several issues, respectively.

"And that he also inform the Senate whether Treasury notes, bearing interest, have been deposited in banks for the purpose of raising a credit to be drawn against by the Treasury Department; and if any such deposites have been made, to state the dates and amounts thereof, and the dates and sums of the drafts made thereon."

In answer to the first inquiry, I transmit herewith a statement prepared by the Treasurer, showing the rates of interest and the proportions—whether in exchange for specie or in payments of the issues of Treasury notes under the authority of the act of the 12th of October, 1837, and subsequent acts, as required by the resolution.

In reply to the other inquiry, I would observe, that no Treasury notes, issued under the authority of either of the acts mentioned, have been deposited in banks by this Department or by its sanction, for the purpose of raising a credit, to be drawn against by the Department. But, to facilitate the exchange of specie for Treasury notes, without the delay and expense of transporting it to this city, and then carrying it back for expenditure, numerous individuals and corporations have been permitted to place specie in special deposite to the credit of the Treasurer in certain specified banks; and Treasury notes, to a corresponding amount, have been afterward, and not till then, issued in their favor upon the certificates of deposite, as shown by the Treasurer's accompanying statement.

It may be proper to add, that, by pursuing this course, many risks have been avoided, as well as the payment of any commissions to bankers or brokers for selling the notes, and, at the same time, the disposal of any of them by the Government, except at par; and for any thing except specie or its equivalent, has been effectually prevented. Respectfully,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. R. M. JOHNSON,
Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 24, 1840.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose a statement, prepared in answer to a resolution adopted in the Senate of the United States on the 23d instant, relative to Treasury notes, "issued under the authority of the act of the 12th of October, 1837, and subsequent acts," and referred by you to this office, for a report thereon.

None of the notes issued under the aforesaid acts have been deposited in bank for the purpose of raising a credit to be drawn against by the Treasury Department. Those issued on certificates of deposite, were issued in exchange for specie funds deposited in banks to the credit of the Treasurer, which funds were drawn for in common with other funds, and not specifically. I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,
WILLIAM SELDEN,
